PRELIMINARY DISCOURSE.

THE study of History is of all others the most useful and entertaining, when in the pursuit of it we make use of proper discernment to direct us to the choice of such histories alone whose authenticity may be relied on, and in which the events related are of such importance as to merit our attention.

A general knowledge of the history of all nations is justly deemed no inconsiderable part of polite education; but it is an accomplishment which may, with strict propriety, be confined to those alone, who by birth, situation, or capacity, may form reasonable expectations of being called to the management of public affairs—To the rest of mankind the study of universal history is rather likely to be detrimental than advantageous; for the shortness of human life, and the various employments of it, render it impossible for the generality of men to devote so much time to this study as is necessary to enable them to derive those advantages from it which constitute the true use of all history—such as, the improvement of the human understanding—the enlarging our ideas—the removing our early imbibed prejudices—and the attainment of every social virtue; the result of long and unwearied meditations and reflections on the characters we find described, and the general course of events related in history; and without some such improvements as these are made, all study is vain, but chiefly that of history; for if it tends not to make us more useful members of society, and better subjects of the state we live in, it will only serve to render us arrogant, impertinent, prating pedants, or mere antiquaries and sceptics, wasting the short space of time allotted us for nobler purposes, in idle speculations, and nice disquisitions, which perplex and bewilder, but never improve the understanding.

Since then the real benefits that arise from the study of universal history are to be acquired only by long and painful application, which is by no means adapted to the situation and circumstances of by far the greatest part of mankind, it becomes necessary to point out that particular branch of history, which every man may study with propriety, and which few or none ought wholly to neglect; and that is, their own national history; a thorough knowledge of which is so necessary a qualification in the subjects of a free state, that, in this happy region of liberty in particular, the man who is unacquainted with the history of his country will neither prove a loyal subject or a good citizen; for, ignorant of the blessings he enjoys above the subjects of less happy states, he will neither be zealous himself in the defence of his country, nor kindle the spirit of patriotism in his neighbour: while he who has studied the English annals with care and attention, will be found ever ready to maintain and support the generous plan of freedom handed down to him by his renowned forefathers, and boldly to oppose every domestic and foreign enemy to the civil and religious liberties of his dear country, secured to him by the protestant succession, and firmly upheld at this time by the best of kings.

A thorough knowledge of the history of our country forms us for the commerce of the society we live in; it brings us acquainted with it long before we enter into it, and it gives a just idea of men and their actions, without the fatal consequences that often attend the acquirement of this knowledge from experience: but then, in the study of this history, we must not make the gratification of our curiosity a principal object, lest we should spend too much time in idle and fruitless researches into the intricate mazes of antiquity. The fabulous and traditional, being the conjectural and uncertain part of history, we should but slightly run over, and afford it so little attention as hardly to permit it to dwell on the memory.

The facts which an historian who writes to instruct, and to which the reader who means to improve by the study of history should pay the strictest attention, are such alone as, by their absolute importance and utility, may tend to influence the conduct of the present, or to train up the rising generation to public and private virtue.

All the faculties of the mind should be engaged to mark the first rise, the future progress, and the several changes of our manners, laws, and customs—the origin of our dignities—the establishment of our parliaments, which are the foundation of our civil and religious liberties—to distinguish the several innovations and encroachments that have been made on these inestimable blessings; and to admire the wisdom, magnanimity, and perseverance of those heroes, who nobly opposed every attempt to subvert our excellent constitution, and were the happy instruments of transmitting to the present generation the best system of government in Europe.

Again, our utmost attention should be employed to reflect philosophically on the changes to which human events have ever been subject. A careful review of the most remarkable revolutions that have happened in this land, will furnish us with the strongest motives to public and private virtue; for in them we may see how short and incomplete have been the triumphs of vice, how permanent and indelible the effects of virtue.—There also we may learn to give credit to this universal truth:—That the utmost efforts of human wisdom cannot secure the fate of one single event, while causes, the most unlikely to produce their designed effects, often succeed to admiration; and to the utter confusion of the boasted power of human prudence, foresight, and precaution.

In selecting the characters we propose as examples to ourselves or society, we must examine them as faithful historians present them to us—at whole length—naked and unmasked—stripped of all that praise and adulation, as well as of that calumny and reproach through which they were misunderstood when living; and in applying these characters, as well as the events recorded in history, to our own or our superiors conduct, the similarity of the case with that from which we take the example, must be strictly scrutinized in every circumstance; for a misapplication of particular characters or events may induce us to form wrong judgments, and lead us into the most fatal errors in public and private life—it may make us bad subjects, bad citizens, and bad men.

Before we yield assent to the truth of any material fact related in any one history of our country, it will be necessary to compare it with another, and not to rest its authenticity on the evidence of any single author; for, besides the defects arising from partiality, many of our historians, through ignorance, indolence, or inattention, have misrepresented, altered, or abridged, many remarkable events, while they have paid too much regard to the useless and uninteresting part of our history: that a right judgment, therefore, may be formed of characters and facts by just comparison, it seems necessary that a variety of authors should be consulted on this important point.

To enlarge the field of comparison is the design of the present undertaking; in which the author proposes to place in a more conspicuous light than his predecessors, those characters and events which tend most to inform and instruct the present age; and so to arrange the barren unprofitable part of the English history, as to allow it to take up very little of the reader's time.

From about the close of the fourteenth century, the history of our country becomes important and useful for the better knowledge of the present times; before that period the scene is entirely closed, the events that happened, the causes that produced them, and the series of effects derived from them, are ceased, and leave little or no instruction or example for the service of the present age: but soon after this æra new systems of policy were established; new accessions of property took place; a new constitution of government was formed, which totally changed our manners, laws, and customs; and to this change our present method of conduct as a nation in some measure owes its origin. From this period, therefore, the English history must not be read only, but studied with the utmost care and application. The most striking and important events in this modern part of our annals the editor of the present History means to expatiate on and elucidate with candour and precision; for at this æra we began to be what we now are, the happiest people on earth—arrived, as a state, almost to the summit of human grandeur; and as men, to the first degree of reputation for wisdom, valour, integrity, and humanity.

I N T R O-

INTRODUCTION

HISTORY of ENGLAND.

THE formidable and renowned island of Great-Britain, the largest in Europe, but not in the known world, as modern authors have asserted *, is most commodiously and pleasantly situated, for the security, ease, and convenience of its inhabitants, as a commercial people, being bounded on the east and west by the German and Atlantic Oceans, which by their union form the British Channel, its barrier, on the south; and on the north it is defended by the Deucalionian Sea: its form is universally allowed to be triangular, and its circumference to contain, including the irregular windings of the coast, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six English miles: its nearest vicinity is to the coast of France, which lies only eight leagues distant from Dover, in Kent †.

This happy spot, thus admirably secured by nature from the incursions of neighbouring states, is still further indebted to her indulgent bounty for every necessary and convenience of life, and for a temperature of air, which, while the inhabitants lived according to her sober laws, and sought not the destruction of their health by the introduction of foreign liquors, and pernicious drugs, afforded more frequent instances of remarkable longevity, than any other part of the known world.

The origin of the first inhabitants of this island is not to be traced with any degree of certainty; all the assistance that tradition can furnish is vague and romantic; and the only universal and probable opinion is, that it was peopled at various times from different parts of the continent: but the precise time when this first settlement commenced is buried in oblivion. The earliest account that we can absolutely give credit to, seems to be that of a colony of the subjects of Teutat, king of the Celtæ, embarking from their own coasts, and landing and settling without opposition on the coasts of Britain, not barely with a view to lead a life of indolence and pastoral simplicity, but strongly influenced by a desire of encreasing and extending their commerce, to which they were animated and encouraged by their sovereign, who, on account of his attachment to the commercial interests of his people, was stiled Mer-cur, or Merchant.

It is highly probable, that the first embarkation succeeding, a second took place, and that Teutat encouraged several private families to accompany his trading subjects, the better to establish a settlement in the island: these, and these only, having no concern in the commercial schemes of their brethren, retired to the inland parts of the island, where they formed themselves into a distinct society; and, devoting themselves wholly to a religious life, by degrees became almost a different people from the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, with whom, however, they must have had some intercourse and communication, because they neglected the cultivation of their lands, and consequently must be under a necessity of supplying the deficiency by procuring many of the necessities of life from the inhabitants of the sea-coasts ‡.

In process of time the Belgæ, who were a branch of the Gauls as well as the Celtæ, becoming too numerous on the continent, transported them-

* The island of Borneo is eight hundred miles in length, and seven hundred in breadth; whereas the utmost extent of Great-Britain amounts only to six hundred and sixty miles, and its breadth to four hundred and fifty. Vide Salmon's Geographical Grammar.

† The pretended separation of England from France by the Deluge, or some other violent shock of nature, we think unworthy of the least historical credit, being merely founded on the similar appearance of the cliffs at some particular parts of the two coasts, and easily refuted by every judicious navigator, who has surveyed the coasts of Flanders and Zealand from the Dunlow Channel.

‡ Dr. Smollett has taken great pains to prove that Britain was found by the Phœnicians already populous and powerful, some ages before the Christian æra; and tells us, that they built castles, and fortified that province now called Cornwall for the protection of the traders, and the preservation of their commerce; and further adds, that Meneg, part of Cornwall, is of Phœnician derivation, as well as the names of several of its towns; but this only proves that the Phœnicians first discovered the western part of the island of Britain; and finding on it valuable mines, settled their own countrymen upon it, and erected castles and fortifications to secure them in the possession of it, not against the attempts of the inhabitants, but of the Greeks and Romans, their rivals in navigation and commerce. Had the islanders been powerful and populous, as the doctor asserts, certainly he must have found some traces of a treaty of commerce betwixt the inhabitants and the Phœnicians, or some account of a contest between them before the Phœnicians could make their intentions known to the inhabitants, who must consider them at first as formidable invaders.

selves to the British shore; and being descended from the same original stock as the Celtæ, already established in Britain, and using the same language, manners, and customs, were hospitably entertained, and permitted to settle and intermix with the inhabitants of the sea-coasts.

From some of these new-settlers, we may justly conclude the name of Britain is originally derived; for they preserved a great veneration for the names of the states they had quitted, and bestowed on some of our maritime counties the same names as other counties bore on the continent; and as a large colony of them came from the coasts of Bretagne, it is not improbable that they either became so numerous and powerful, as to give this name themselves to the maritime part of the island, or that the Phœnicians who traded with them gave it that general appellation; at least this conjecture is as well founded as any other on the same subject, which at best is but of little moment*.

The Celtæ, who first retired into the inland parts of the island, never acknowledged the name of Britain, but constantly distinguished themselves from the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, calling themselves Cumri; alluding to their supposed descent from Gomer, the son of Japhet. Julius Cæsar justly imagined that these were the first inhabitants of the island, and describes them as a numerous people; but gives us a very imperfect account of their manners and customs, in which they differed very little from the Gauls for some ages. In their persons they were indeed taller, better proportioned, and more robust: their hair, which was generally yellow, they wore loosely flowing over their shoulders: their faces they constantly shaved, except the upper lip, the hair on which they permitted to grow intolerably long: they stained their bodies with a sea-weed, called Woad, which not only defended the pores of the skin in winter from the inclemency of the weather, but gave them a formidable tremendous aspect. The dress of the nobility and gentry, according to some authors, was a kind of party-coloured plaid, which descended from their waist to the middle of their legs. This they must have imported; for it does not appear that they had the least notion of manufacturing their wool. Those who held any office of dignity wore likewise chains of gold round their necks, and the women bracelets of the same metal; but the generality of the antient Britons had no other covering than the skins of wild beasts, nor any other ornament than a coarse painting of flowers, and figures of animals, on different parts of their bodies. From this account of the slightness of their apparel, we may readily conceive that they were extremely hardy; and, as they delighted in manly exercises from their youth, it naturally follows that they were early enured to hardships and fatigue, and acquired that fortitude and valour which filled even Cæsar and the Romans with astonishment and admiration. Their habitations were a sort of huts or cottages; sometimes formed of boughs, in the nature of harbours; and at others of mud and clay, according to the season of the year, and generally covered with turf. Their towns and villages consisted of a number of these huts irregularly placed at small distances from each other, and commonly situated in woods, for the conveniency of pursuing their favourite diversion hunting, and of fortifying themselves in these habitations with the trees they cut down and cleared, in order to form their towns. It does not appear that they confined themselves to any particular spot where they erected habitations; but, on the contrary, that they often quitted them for more convenient or agreeable situations; so that very little pains were bestowed on building these temporary huts; and frequently they only set up a number of tents, which they struck when they grew tired of the spot; and thus moved from place to place†, and formed a kind of encampment in different parts of the country, according to the different seasons of the year: in summer they generally inhabited the most fertile vales, which afforded the greatest plenty of pasture and water for their cattle; and in winter they removed to the hilly countries, as being drier and more healthy.

The usual diet of the first inhabitants of Britain was milk; and the flesh of such animals as they killed in hunting; and their common drink was water; but when the Belgæ settled in the maritime parts of the island, they brought with them from the continent a tolerable knowledge of agriculture; and soon taught the inland inhabitants the method of cultivating their land, so as to procure the necessary grains for making that wholesome food, which we to this day distinguish by the name of bread. This they made sometimes of wheat, but most commonly of rye and barley mixed; with this bread they generally eat apples; and, to heighten this plain and simple repast, on particular festivals and occasional solemnities, they drank different kinds of fermented liquors, made of apples, honey, and barley, which they sometimes drank to such an excess, that they grew intoxicated, and were extremely quarrelsome; but this is so general an effect of intoxication, that it is hard to distinguish it as the characteristic of any particular people‡.

Though the natural abundance of the island afforded them a most extensive variety of food, yet they were either ignorant of the proper use of many of the gifts of nature, or abstained from them on religious principles: to their ignorance of the method of making it, we may ascribe their want of butter and cheese; and to their superstitious veneration for domestic fowls and animals, their breeding of hares, geese, and hens, which they never destroyed upon any occasion. To the same cause we may attribute their abstaining from all kinds of fish; for they certainly paid religious adoration to the ocean, which they deemed the sacred habitation of the gods, and thought that all it contained was consecrated to their use alone.

The same uniform plainness and simplicity which

* A party of these new settlers, sailing up the river from the Kentish coast, are said to have been the founders of the city of London, which they distinguished by the name of Tre-novant, or New Town; and from hence the inhabitants of the several counties surrounding this New Town, were called Trenovantes, or Trenobantes. Geoffry of Monmouth, a monkish historian, calls the city of London, Troinovant, and concludes that it was originally founded by Trojans; but this account is wholly incredible, while the other is attended with every mark of reasonable conjecture, though not with the full evidences of historical truth.

‡ Some historians, without any foundation, make this effect of liquor peculiar only to the Thracians and the Britons.

appeared in their persons and their way of living, extended to their manners and customs, which, except in some particulars, were agreeable to the general laws of nature, and the pure dictates of human reason. They were divided into two classes, being either priests or soldiers, and were distinguished by Cæsar, and all the antient authors, as a brave, warlike, generous people, remarkable for their honesty and sincerity, and for their singular hospitality; ever deeming the persons and effects of strangers inviolably sacred, and esteeming it their duty to afford them protection and defence against every insult. This account of their hospitality is remarkably confirmed by their suffering a continual inundation of new settlers from the continent to take peaceable possession of the sea-coasts, the natural bulwarks of the whole island. In public and private life they held effeminacy and indolence in utter abhorrence; in all their transactions they were open and candid, disdaining every species of deceit and flattery, and every subterfuge of low art and cunning: even in war, they rather chose to rest the decision of a battle on their personal bravery and intrepidity, than submit to make use of mean and despicable snares and stratagems to obtain a victory; and to this public virtue the Romans were indebted for their success in almost every engagement with them, constantly employing the whole force of their great military skill and cunning against the untaught valour, the native fortitude, of a people, almost unarmed and undisciplined, who scorned to owe even the preservation of their liberty to any other but the most honourable means of defence. This is their general character, and they stand charged with but one public vice, unbounded and incestuous concubinage; which, however, gradually declined in proportion as they became more civilized, and at length was totally disused.

The form of government which at first prevailed in Britain, differed very little from that of Gaul: the whole island was divided into a great number of petty states, and the administration of government in each state was vested in an assembly or council of the nobility, who annually elected one of their body to the dignity of supreme magistrate, and conferred on him the power of life and death. As the majority of the nobility were Druids, this dignity generally fell to the lot of a Druid, which, with the additional circumstance of their holding general annual assemblies in the isle of Anglesey*, the chief seat of the Druids, has induced some historians to assert, that the Arch-druid was the supreme magistrate, or king of Britain: but this was so far from being the case, that they never conferred any more than a limited, temporary power, on any person, till after the invasion of the Romans. Their usual method was, on extraordinary emergencies, when they were threatened with insurrections at home, or invasions from abroad, to convene a general assembly, to which the several petty states sent their deputies. This assembly elected a chief commander, who being the captain-general of their forces, and the sole dispenser of justice, was, by Livy and other Roman authors, stiled Rex: but this supreme magistracy was by no means equal to the power and prerogative of the regal antiquity; for it was a temporary office, which generally subsisted no longer than the urgent cause that gave birth to it; nor was it always centered in one person; for sometimes two generals were chosen, and invested with equal power and authority. Some authors have maintained, that this dignity was bestowed for life; but I find no example of it on record: as for the case of Divitiacus, it is foreign to the purpose; for he was an invader and a conqueror, not a general, elected by the suffrages of a free people.

The same conformity to the customs of the Gauls prevailed in the religious, as in the civil constitution of Britain: they were both equally subject to the power and authority of the Druids †, whom they revered as gods. The Druids were a society of men who had a most extensive influence in civil affairs, and in all religious concerns a most absolute and unlimited authority ‡.

The society of Druids consisted of three orders, the chief of which had the inspection of all public affairs, but not the entire management of them, though their consent was necessary to give sanction to every decree: they were all subject to one high-priest, stiled the Arch-druid, who had a power of calling their supreme magistrates to account, and even of deposing them; but this part of their authority they very rarely exerted: they presided over and regulated all the ceremonies of their public sacrifices, and they gave their final approbation to sentences of death pronounced against criminals, without which they could not be executed. Thus every public transaction falling, in some degree, under their jurisdiction, it is no wonder that they gained likewise the knowledge of men's private concerns, and in time gained such an ascendancy over the minds of an ignorant people, that they were little less than adored.

The second order of Druids was distinguished by the name of Bards. To these were committed the care of educating the children of their princes and nobility, who were frequently initiated into their mysteries, and afterwards admitted into the first order of Druids.

To the Bards likewise was assigned the province of composing verses in praise of their heroes, and other eminent persons, which, according to Lucan, they sung to the sound of the harp.

The third order were the Eubates, according to Strabo and Ammianus Marcellinus; but a modern author says their real appellation was Vuids, or Vates. However that be, these entirely devoted themselves to the study of astronomy, augury, divination, magic, natural philosophy, and physic: in short, they were skilled in every art and science that could contribute to excite the astonishment and fix the veneration of the people, who regarded them as demi-gods endowed with more than mortal wisdom, and illumined by celestial inspiration.

* In the isle of Anglesey various remains of the customs, and monuments of the residence of the Druids, still subsist, as may be seen at large in Rowland's Mona Antiqua.

† The appellation of Druid is derived from Dryw, the old British word for oak, which these priests held in great veneration, and on that account were called Druids, or Worshipers of the Oak, and not from the place of their residence, as some have conjectured.

‡ Carte is of opinion, that the Druids were the immediate descendants of the Curetes of Greece, from whom, he imagines, they borrowed the rites and ceremonies of their religion: but this conjecture is built solely on the authority of Pezron's Antiquité des Celtes, and no other historian of any repute has adopted it.

To the immortal honour of the Druids, all historians agree in allowing that they exercised the functions of their office with becoming dignity, incorruptible integrity, and uncommon fortitude and perseverance; frequently exposing their lives for the service of the state; sometimes rushing, unarmed, on embattled armies, braving every danger, and bravely opposing the powerful influence of superior virtue and eloquence to the rage of war, which they often assuaged, and sometimes totally extinguished, by their prudent admonitions, even at the very crisis when the fate of arms was on the point of deciding the quarrel.

Such were the antient Druids, so justly renowned in history, who, setting aside the cruelties they exercised in their superstitious rites, were the wisest and best society of priests that ever subsisted. Being composed of the principal nobility, they were by birth, as well as education, devoted to the service of their country: being absolute strangers to every species of effeminate luxury, they were also ignorant of its attendant vices; one of which is, the erecting a private interest in opposition to the public welfare; and maintaining the former at the expence of the latter: in a word, they seem to have been the Mandarines of that age; and monuments of their exemplary virtue have been preserved, to be an eternal disgrace to the Jesuits, and some other religious societies of the present age.

The nearest resemblance of the Druids to the modern religious potentates, seems to have been in their contention for the supreme ecclesiastical dignity. When the Arch-druid died, he was generally succeeded by the next in dignity, superior learning, and exemplary piety; but as it often happened, even in those early ages, that the relation or particular friend of a prince or chief magistrate advanced, by irregular steps, to posts of dignity they could have no pretence to, in the direct order of succession; it also often happened, that superior learning, exemplary piety, and popular esteem, stood in competition with nobility and dignity of office, and produced a number of candidates with different claims to the vacant post of honour. The contest sometimes grew warm, and was referred to the decision of arms. Thus we see that religious wars were the disgrace of the dark ages of ignorance and barbarity. Would to God! we could say they have not served as examples to later and more enlightened æras; and that the horrid copy has not outdone the original.

There are some remains of the druidical maxims that do great honour to that order, and convey instruction to every age; others there are, which are built upon the Socratic and Pythagorean philosophy, and afford more food for curiosity than for improvement. The rest are either peculiarly adapted to the singular superstitions of their religion and the policy of their government, or are the effect of their physical knowledge; and they all seem to have been copied chiefly from the Gauls, but in some particulars from the Phœnicians.

We shall endeavour to separate the ore from the dross; and shall give the first place to those tenets which are to this day held in universal esteem.

"There is but one supreme God, infinite and omnipotent.

"All things derive their origin from Heaven.

"The soul is immortal.

"The world will be destroyed, if at all, by fire or water.

"There is another world.

"Great care is to be taken of the education of children."

These are all the remains of their religious principles that merit the least attention: we shall now meet with some few political ones worthy of regard, if not of imitation.

"Children must be brought up apart from their parents, till they attain the age of fourteen years.

"Upon extraordinary emergencies, a man may be sacrificed for the good of his country.

"The disobedient or disloyal must be excommunicated, deprived of the benefit of the law, secluded from society, and rendered incapable of any public employ.

"He that comes last to the assembly of the states merits death."

The rest of their maxims we throw into one table, as a relic of antiquity, curious, but not interesting.

"Money lent in this world will be repaid in the next.

"They who kill themselves to accompany their friends to the next world, will live with them there.

"Letters given to dying persons, or thrown on their funeral piles, will be faithfully delivered to those they are addressed to in the other world.

"All masters of families are supreme lords of their own household: they have a power of life and death over their wives, their children, and their slaves.

"It is lawful to slay a man, in order to predict future events from the manner in which the body falls, from its motions when fallen, from the flowing of the blood, from the appearance of the wound, and from the inspection of the vitals.

"Prisoners of war are to be slain on the altars as offerings to the gods, or burned alive, inclosed in wicker, in honour of them*.

"All commerce with strangers is prohibited.

"None must be instructed but in the sacred groves.

"The arcana of the sciences must not be committed to writing, but to memory.

"The moon is a sovereign remedy for all things.

"Mistletoe must be gathered with reverence, if possible, on the sixth day of the month: it must be cut with a golden bill.

"The powder of mistletoe makes women fruitful."

From these maxims may be deduced the general principles of the religion of the antient Britons; but though there is no notice taken of any inferior deities, yet they paid divine adoration, and performed different sacrifices in honour of Mars, Apollo, and Mercury; and, after the invasion of the Romans, they added to these Minerva, Diana, and Hercules. The external form of adoration consisted of invocations, oblations, expiatory sacrifices, and thanksgivings, which they expressed in hymns and songs composed and performed by the bards, accompanied with musical instruments, in praise of the particular deity who had been propitious to them; for each deity had his province assigned him; Mars having a supreme power over the events of war, Apollo in the cure of diseases, and Mercury in the success of commerce. To these acts of devotion they added feasting and dancing, and various games and sports after the manner of the Greeks: their religious tenets, their laws, and the vocal part of their adoration, were all composed in verse, the better to fix them on the memory, agreeable to one of the druidical institutes.

The places set apart for the adoration of their gods were consecrated groves, fenced in and surrounded with oak, for which they had so great a veneration, that, in every part of their religious ceremonies, they found means to make use of some part of this divine tree; covering their altars, and adorning their victims, with its leaves and boughs; and obliging every person employed in performing the sacrifices to wear garlands of it. The mistletoe, which grows on some of these trees, was an object of most profound veneration, being esteemed a peculiar gift of Heaven, a panacea in medicine, and particularly sovereign in the cure of barrenness. It was sought for annually in the spring of the year with great solemnity in all parts of the kingdom; and the first day of a new moon was generally set apart for this superstitious ceremony, which was performed amidst the acclamations of the multitude, who assembled from all parts to attend the sacrifices offered on this occasion. As soon as it was found, the Druid, dressed in a kind of surplice, ascended the tree, and, cutting it with a sort of pruning-knife, received in his garment this precious boon from Heaven, which was regarded as an omen of success for the remainder of the year.

Having thus given an account of the authority, the general character, the religious principles, and the superstitious ceremonies of the Druids, we must beg leave to wave all vague and romantic descriptions of their persons and dress, and of the remains of their public and private edifices, about which no two authors agree, these being wholly unworthy the regard of an historian; but falling directly under the province of professed antiquaries, who out of rude heaps of stones, dispersed up and down in woods and on barren mountains, can form incontestable monuments of antiquity, turning every conical eminence of stone into an altar, the remains of quarries and broken rocks into antient temples, and druidical mansions; but, that the curious may not be at a loss, we refer them to the Mona Antiqua, Gildas, Camden, and other antiquaries*, and shall close our account of them with one remark from Tacitus, which merits attention. "It was an opinion universally established in all the countries where the religion of the Druids prevailed, that to suppose the presence of the Deity to be confined within any enclosed place, or to represent him in an human form, or by any material image, was derogatory to his honour, and incompatible with his divine attributes."

From the commodious situation of Britain, it might be supposed that the antient Britons early applied themselves to commerce; but this was partly impeded, with respect to the inhabitants of the inland counties, by the druidical maxim, which forbid all commerce and intercourse with strangers. What little commerce they had, was by this means confined to the maritime ports in the western part of the island, particularly in Cornwall, where the tin-mines furnished them with the first branch of foreign commerce they had any knowledge of. The Phœnicians discovered this part of the island, according to some authors, long before the Trojan war, and bought great quantities of tin of the inhabitants, of which they made a considerable gain by selling it to other nations, and gave the Britons in exchange pearls, ivory, silver, and gold: the two first they manufactured for their own use for some time; but at length brought them to such perfection, that we find them exporting ivory bridles, collars, &c. to foreign parts; probably re-vending them thus manufactured to the Phœnicians themselves; for they did not venture their persons with their commodities in foreign parts, and therefore did not attempt to build any vessels of burden. The utmost extent of their sailing, before the arrival of Julius Cæsar, seems to have been confined to the coasts of Gaul; and this they performed in open boats, very poorly constructed, of wicker, secured with pitched hides, but wholly unfit to out-live a storm†.

Thus circumstanced, they must appear to every impartial judge wholly unprovided to resist a formidable invasion from a powerful enemy, resolutely bent on conquest, and spurred on by ambition, avarice, and revenge. The principal ports of the island were inhabited by different colonies of the Celtæ, forming a distinct people from the inland counties; and the whole island was divided by domestic faction and discord, at the time when Cæsar meditated his invasion. Some years before this, they had been unable to withstand the incursions of Divitiacus, king of the Sueffones, who,

* If the reader cannot procure, or does not choose to pore over so many volumes of antiquities, he will find the copyists of these authors minutely transcribed in Smollett's notes to his History of England, vol. I. and in Rider's History, vol. I. from page 30 to 50.

† A modern author has attempted to display his ingenuity by furnishing the ancient Britons, in the earliest times, with a formidable fleet, and giving them the same sovereignty over the seas that we at present enjoy. The two circumstances he refers to, in order to prove the strength of their marine, are what Cæsar has related: "That he could get no information concerning the country or its ports, because the inhabitants permitted none but merchants to visit the island, and forbade even those to travel far into the country;" a regulation that argues power and policy! Very true, but it is no proof of a marine force; for the ports might be defended by the inhabitants without shipping; and it is most probable, that if they had sent any vessels to sea, either on a trading or warlike expedition, Cæsar would have been able, by some means, to have procured the intelligence he laments the want of.

The other circumstance is equally inconclusive. "The English, says he, succoured the Gauls both by sea and land, which surely could not be performed in leathern boats, used only for fishing; but must have been in stout vessels." I see no reason for this supposition; for a great number of land-forces might be transported from the Kentish shore to the coast of France in open boats, even at this time, if there were no interruption from the enemy; and it does not appear, from Cæsar's own account of his expedition into Gaul, that he covered the coasts with a fleet to prevent the inhabitants receiving any succour by sea; so that there could be no necessity for a formidable British fleet barely to land their army on the coast of Gaul.

aided by some of the Belgæ inhabiting the maritime coasts, had marched into the heart of the country, reduced many of the inland counties to his obedience, and had garrisoned them with Belgic troops, with whom they could not be supposed to live in great harmony, when they received the melancholy news of the Roman expedition. To this want of union must be added a total ignorance of all military discipline, and of almost every offensive as well as of every defensive instrument of war, and that the Britons inhabited an open country wholly destitute of all fortification; having nothing to shelter them from an enemy, but mountains, defiles, woods, and bogs. The only arms they originally made use of were sharp-pointed sticks, which they used for javelins, and long poles, cleft at one end, to receive a sharp-edged flint, which was secured by a band of copper, to which they hung a kind of bell of the same metal, with the noise of which they designed to terrify their enemies; but, at the time of Cæsar's invasion, they had learned from the Phœnicians and the Belgæ, who had an intercourse with the Suesones, the use of the sword, the dagger, the target, and the chariot of war, which they decorated superbly, and managed with astonishing dexterity, turning and stopping it when in full career. They fastened sharp iron, resembling a scythe, to the nave of the wheels of these chariots; and thus furnished, they drove them with great impetuosity through the thickest ranks of the enemy's infantry, cutting down, and driving over, all that opposed their passage. Having performed this service, the charioteer left the chariot on the field of battle; and the warriors, returning to the action, fought on foot, till, unable longer to endure the fatigue, they returned to their chariots, and thus continued the engagement. But the assistance these machines afforded them would not have been sufficient alone, unpractised as they were in military discipline, to have enabled them to repel the united strength and skill of the embattled legions of the warlike Romans, if they had not been endowed with uncommon valour and perseverance, and enured to extreme hardships and fatigue; valour still more remarkable, as it extended to the female-sex; for their very women accompanied them to the field of battle, furiously charging the enemy, rallying the repulsed, and animating the faint and timid by their presence and heroic example. They advanced to encounter an enemy much in the same manner as the Indians, clashing their arms, shouting, and making a wild uproar with the sound of uncouth instruments; designed, no doubt, to intimidate the enemy: but as they approached pretty near their adversaries, they began dancing, and singing the heroic deeds of their ancestors. Cæsar bestows great encomiums on the undaunted bravery, and remarkable impetuosity, with which the Britons began an engagement, and their great intrepidity in returning to the charge after severe repulses: in a word, they were equal to the Romans in point of personal bravery, but deficient in military knowledge, and still more in want of that union which was necessary to support the common cause: they were unhappily divided into such a number of petty states, each governed by their own senate and supreme magistrate; and tho' some of these had united and incorporated themselves into large principalities, yet it was extremely difficult to get these to act in concert, and form one embodied force for the defence of the island against foreign invasions; and as for those states that lay at a great distance from the coasts, the first scene of hostility, these could not be made sensible of their danger, nor consequently be induced to prepare for their defence, till the enemy approached them. Under these fatal circumstances, Cæsar found this brave and intrepid people an easy prey, who, had they been under a regular form of government, and assembled under an able commander, would, in all human probability, have spared all historians the pain of recording the fatal success of Cæsar's expeditions against Britain.

The FIRST EXPEDITION of the ROMANS to their FINAL RETREAT to the CONTINENT.

P A R T I.

AT the time when Julius Cæsar formed the design of invading Britain, the military genius of the Romans was arrived at its meridian splendor; the same insatiable thirst of glory animated at once the generals, the senate, and the very citizens of Rome; even the common soldiers fought less for plunder than for the honour of their country; and one general spirit of emulation prevailed in all their armies, which was cultivated and kept alive by two of the greatest generals that Rome had ever given birth to. The victorious Pompey had already spread the renown of the Roman arms over the greatest part of Africa; and, in order to put the finishing stroke to the immortal fame he had acquired, had reduced Syria, Judea, and Arabia, and had planted the Roman eagle on the borders of the Red Sea, while Cæsar, his only rival in power and military fame, lay inactive in Gaul, having totally conquered that country, the government of which was assigned him as his reward. Fired with the news of Pompey's extensive victories, he meditated a blow, which should at once strike his countrymen with astonishment and admiration, and efface the remembrance of Pompey's great and distinguished services; and this was no other than the invasion of Britain, which, if attended with success, he had no room to doubt would raise his name far above his rival's, and enable him to stand in competition with Alexander the Great, whose heroic exploits filled the world with terror and admiration, when the name of Cæsar was scarcely known. Pompey had, indeed, extended his conquests to the banks of the ocean, which the Romans believed was the boundary of the world; and they never thought of carrying their arms beyond it. No other motive, therefore, need be assigned for Cæsar's expedition against Britain than his unbounded ambition, which at first animated him to bear away the palm of honour from his professed rival, and afterwards to equal the renown of Alexander, which he constantly aimed at acquiring to the very last period of his life*.

* Suetonius, in his life of Cæsar, says, that his motive for invading Britain was his being enamoured with the largeness of the British pearls, which he frequently poized in his hands. Cicero likewise insinuates, that both Cæsar and his army had great expectations of finding mines of silver on the island; from whence some authors pretend, that avarice was Cæsar's principal motive to invade Britain: but Suetonius himself allows, in another place, that avarice was no part of Cæsar's character; and as to what Cicero says, it serves rather to confute, than to establish this opinion. His express words, while the expedition took place, are, "It is certain there is not a grain of silver to be found in the whole island, nor yet any profit to be made but by slaves;" and, after Cæsar's landing in Britain, Cicero says, "I have received letters from my brother and from Cæsar; they have done their business; they have got no plunder; but yet they have ordered the payment of some money." Now, what could Cicero mean by saying, that they had done their business, though they had got no plunder, but that the end for which Cæsar had undertaken this expedition was answered? His own fame was raised to the highest pitch of glory, and the arms of the Romans were carried into a new world; that is, beyond the boundaries of the ocean.

In planning this expedition, Cæsar appears as much the politician as the general; by an easy trajet of only eight leagues, he proposed to acquire more honour than Pompey had procured by a long and harrassing campaign in the sultry desarts of Arabia. The first step he took towards putting it into execution, was to send for the merchants who traded to the British coast, and enquire of them the situation of the coasts and harbours, the extent of the island, the nature of its fortifications, the number and genius of the inhabitants, the strength of their forces, and the state of their finances. Of most of these the merchants were entirely ignorant, not being allowed by the natives to travel far into the country, and their traffic being chiefly confined to the western part of the island; nor is it probable that they chose to communicate to Cæsar the little knowledge they had; for his expedition was likely to interrupt the advantageous commerce they carried on with the inhabitants; and, by making it universally known, to deprive them of that profit which they had long enjoyed secretly among themselves. Cæsar, therefore, met with a great disappointment in his enquiries, and indeed more than he at that time suspected; for some of these merchants, probably from the motive just assigned, privately set sail, and gave early intelligence to the Britons of Cæsar's intended invasion. In the mean time, Cæsar, to supply this failure of intelligence, sends out C. Volusenus in a single ship to reconnoitre the coasts, while his troops were marching to the general rendezvous for embarkation, which was the coasts of the Morini, where he ordered Volusenus to rejoin him as soon as he had made what discoveries he could with safety; and here likewise he ordered the fleet to meet him that he had fitted out, the preceding year, against the Veneti, together with the several vessels lying in the neighbouring harbours.

While these preparations were making, the Britons, dreading the impending storm, and willing at least to gain time, held a general assembly to deliberate on the intelligence received from the merchants; and it was resolved to send ambassadors to Cæsar, to engage him to lay aside his expedition, to offer him hostages for their future good behaviour, and to make all due submission and acknowledgment of their fault in having assisted the enemies of Rome, and the fairest promises of paying great respect hereafter to the Roman state*. Cæsar received this embassy with great complacency, and treated the ambassadors with great respect; but this submission, which was in fact all that the Roman government could require, by no means answered Cæsar's purpose; and therefore he reassumes the artful politician, and dismisses them with very fair promises; exhorting them to fulfil their engagements, but giving them no positive assurance that he would put off his expedition: but with the ambassadors he sends Comius, a creature of his own, but a Briton by birth, whom he had lately made king of the Atrebates. Him he charges with his instructions, which were to persuade the Britons, amongst whom he knew he had a very extensive influence, to form an alliance with the Romans, and to put themselves under Cæsar's protection; and, at the same time, to inform them, that he intended shortly to pay them a visit in person. Comius had no sooner delivered his commission, than the Britons imprisoned him, and loaded him with chains, as some imagine; treating him as a traitor, who had deserted his country; but most probably because they found from their ambassadors, who returned with him, that the doubtful behaviour of Cæsar, and the continuance of his warlike preparations, were inconsistent with the fine speeches and fair promises made by Comius, whose commission they might rather deem an insult than a friendly embassy.

While this event happened in Britain, Cæsar finding he could make no further discovery, Volusenus, after coasting about for five days, not having brought him any material intelligence, and all things being in readiness, he embarks two legions on board of eighty vessels, leaving orders for the horse to be embarked on board eighteen larger ships, which then lay wind-bound in another harbour, and to follow him as soon as possible; but whether they continued wind-bound, or that they were delayed by mismanagement, his orders were not executed in proper time, and had well nigh proved fatal to his affairs.

The wind proving fair, he set sail about midnight, and arrived on the coast of Britain, the next morning, being the 26th day of August, and fifty-five years before the Christian æra.

The Britons, who had not been idle, but had prepared to receive the invaders from the moment they had imprisoned Comius, appeared on the rocks and cliffs about Dover, armed with darts, and in readiness to dispute their landing. Cæsar, seeing such multitudes prepared for defence, contrary to his expectation, and so admirably situated as to command the landing-place, dropped his anchors, and determined to look out for some place where his men would not be exposed to the darts of the enemy, without being able to annoy them from the height of the cliffs. In this resolution he remains at anchor in Dover-road till the afternoon, when, after calling a council of war, and delivering his last instructions concerning their landing, wherein he particularly recommends to them celerity in the management of their ships, so as to be ready to favour unexpected motions, and to guard against the inconveniencies arising from the surf of the sea, which they had not been accustomed to †, he weighs anchor; and, sailing with the wind and tide about eight miles along the coast, he found an open level shore, where the Britons, who had watched his motions, were in readiness, as before, to oppose his landing ‡; but with this difference, that they had no

* Cæsar's public pretence for invading Britain, was their having assisted the Veneti, and other Armorican cities, against the Romans; and that they had made their island an asylum for the ringleaders of the Belgæ, whom they had spirited up to revolt from the Romans, and who, being routed, fled to Britain. This was the public charge which served to cover Cæsar's private ambition, and to justify him to the Roman senate, in case he failed in his enterprize; for it was a custom with the Romans always to revenge themselves on all the allies of their enemies.

† Vide Cæsar's Commentaries.

‡ The most authentic historians agree, that Cæsar landed at Deal, which is eight miles from Dover, and lies on a level hills nor rocks to defend them: so that Cæsar, finding this the most proper place to attempt a landing, ordered his fleet to advance as near as possible to the shore; but they drew so much water, that they could not come near enough the shore for part of his troops to cover the landing of the rest. This threw the Romans into great confusion, being obliged to leap overboard, encumbered with heavy armour, to attack an unencumbered enemy, who were drawn up on the shore, resolutely determined to prevent their landing. The first onset was furious, and greatly in favour of the Britons, who rushed with their war-chariots into the sea, and made a dreadful havoc among the Romans; striking them with so much terror and astonishment, by their undaunted resolution, and uncommon manner of fighting, that the Romans, according to Cæsar's own account, began to give way; and the native fortitude of the Britons for a short time prevailed over the boasted intrepidity of the Roman veterans. At this juncture, Cæsar, with an amazing presence of mind, ordered his galleys to be rowed within shore, and to attack the enemy in flank with slings, engines, and other missile weapons. This stratagem succeeded, in part, by abating the courage of the Britons, who were struck with a panic by the unusual form of these galleys, the management of the oars, and the working of the balistæ; but the Romans, though they found the Britons began to fall back, had met with so warm a reception, that they did not shew any readiness to quit their ships, which the standard-bearer of the tenth legion observing, he nobly leaped overboard, exhorting his legion to follow him, unless they meant basely to betray the Roman Eagle into the hands of the enemy*. Stung with this well-timed reproof, and animated by the noble example of the standard-bearer, united shame and emulation soon overcame all sense of danger; the whole legion followed him, which encouraged the rest of the army; so that the whole force of the Romans soon advanced towards the shore; but were once more so strongly opposed, that they were very near losing the day; for as they quitted their ships in great confusion, being vigorously assaulted by the Britons, and encumbered with heavy armour, they could not avail themselves of their discipline, each soldier ranging under the first colours he could make up to, so that no order could be maintained. Cæsar, observing their confusion, orders all his boats to be filled with fresh troops that had not yet engaged, and which he had kept as a corps de reserve for any unforeseen event. These boats he orders to row about; and where they found any legion more warmly pressed than the rest, to pour in a fresh supply of men. This happy expedient supporting the drooping valour of his legions, who, thus reinforced, soon made the shore; and, forming according to the rules of their famous discipline, the armour, which before encumbered, now defended them from the enemy's javelins, and decided the fortune of the day; the naked Britons, who had only their personal bravery to trust to, being obliged to quit the field. However, the victory was far from being complete, owing, as Cæsar himself says, to his want of cavalry to pursue the routed islanders; not daring to put his infantry on so dangerous a service in an unknown country†. The discomfited Britons, dreading the effects of further opposition to an enemy whom they now deemed invincible, determined to sue for peace; and, as the first step towards obtaining it, they release Comius, and send him back to Cæsar with their ambassadors, who were empowered to tender their submission a second time, and to offer hostages for the performance of their covenant. Cæsar, after warmly remonstrating against the inconsistency of their conduct, in sending ambassadors to him on the continent to atone for their fault of aiding the enemies of Rome, and to promise to shew respect to the Roman state; and afterwards, not only receding from their treaty by making preparations to oppose his landing, but, contrary to the law of nations, imprisoning his ambassador, attributed the whole to their ignorance, and granted them peace; but demanded a considerable number of hostages, and those of no mean condition. Some of these they immediately delivered up to him; but as policy had suggested to him to require some of the leading men of every province, these could not so easily be collected, nor, in fact, were they ever delivered; for the peace was broke before they could be procured.

The Britons having thus secured themselves from immediate danger by a temporary peace, entered into probably on both sides, but most certainly on theirs, with no view of keeping it longer than necessity required, immediately disband their forces; and, assembling the heads of their several petty states, send deputies to Cæsar to join with him in the management of the affairs of the island: this general assembly was yet sitting, when advice was brought them that the eighteen ships which Cæsar had left behind him to take his cavalry on board, had appeared off the coast sailing with a fair wind, which suddenly changing, a storm arose that had dispersed them and driven them back to the ports of Gaul; that the same storm had likewise made most dreadful havoc in Cæsar's fleet in the Downs, and that in the night the flood tide had risen so high, that the galleys which Cæsar had ordered to be towed on shore were filled with water; and that this unexpected accident, joined to the damage the fleet had sustained, and the disappointment from the ships, with the cavalry, being obliged to put back to Gaul, had spread such universal terror and

* The loss of their colours was almost an eternal disgrace to any of the Roman corps that met with that misfortune.

† The signal bravery, perseverance, and military obedience of a Roman soldier in this engagement, merits the reader's attention: his story is recorded by Valerius Maximus and Plutarch, both authors of undoubted veracity. This soldier, by name M. Cassius Scæva, with four other, landed on a rock possessed by a few Britons, whom they attempted to dislodge from their post; but the islanders proving too strong for the Romans, Scæva's companions provided for their own safety by flight: thus deserted, he maintained an unequal combat for some time, employing the weapons to advantage that his fellow-soldiers had left him, making a great slaughter among the enemy, in sight of both armies; till at length, having his thigh wounded with an arrow, his face bruised, his helmet battered to pieces with stones, and his shield pierced through in several places; seeing himself in danger of being overpowered, he retreated to the water-side, and throwing himself into the sea, swam to his ship, where his regard to the strict disciple of the Romans became a fresh object of admiration; for, instead of demanding a reward for his services, he, in the most submissive manner, asked pardon of his general for fighting without orders, which he obtained, with a centurion's command.

consternation among the Romans, that they did not appear to be the same people; and that this confusion was heightened by a scarcity of provisions, and the want of materials to repair their fleet.

Such an opportunity as this was too precious for the sons of liberty and freedom to neglect: the hopes of retrieving their country from slavery again revived and roused the warlike spirit of the generous islanders; their deputies, after taking due notice of the small extent of Cæsar's camp, from which they judged his forces were not so considerable as they had imagined, secretly withdraw from Cæsar, and joining their countrymen, assembled in council, confirm the report of the disasters that had befallen the Roman fleet, and exhort them to take up arms for the recovery of their freedom at this favourable crisis, while the Romans were deprived of every means of retreat: thus urged, they agree to collect their scattered forces, and make head against the enemy, and in the mean time to endeavour to cut off all supply of provisions for the Roman camp.

Cæsar, who was too great a general not to know that true friendship never subsists between the master and the slave, and that a forced peace is soon followed by a war, judged that the Britons would embrace this opportunity, which so strongly favoured a revolt; that he might be prepared against all events, orders the harvest to be got in from the neighbouring fields, and forms a considerable magazine of corn within his camp; and, that nothing might escape his vigilance, he sends to Gaul for proper materials to repair his shattered fleet; and, till the arrival of these, he orders them to be refitted, in part, from the fragments of such ships as the storm had rendered totally unserviceable: his troops laboured with indefatigable industry, and in about ten days completely refitted the remains of his fleet, twelve ships being destroyed by the storm.

The harvest was by this time almost over; but a particular field at some distance from the camp remained still unreaped, which became the scene of the first hostilities on the part of the Britons; for the seventh legion being sent out to bring in the corn from this field, the Britons, as soon as they began to reap it, fell upon them from a neighbouring wood, where they had concealed themselves for that purpose, and must inevitably have cut them to pieces if the advanced guard of the Roman camp had not fortunately, for them, perceived an uncommon cloud of dust, from which immediately guessing that their countrymen were attacked, they sent to inform Cæsar of this unusual appearance, who, without further hesitation, calls off the advanced guard, who lay readiest for marching to the field, orders their post to be filled by others, flies to the assistance of the distressed legion, and arrives just time enough to prevent a general slaughter of them; for the Britons had overpowered them; and, to hinder their escape, had surrounded them with their war-chariots. The presence of Cæsar inspired the falling legion with fresh courage, and put the Britons to a stand, who did not think proper to come to a general engagement, because they had determined to distress the Romans by protracting the war, in hopes of harrassing them so much, as the winter came on, that they would be quite wearied out, and quit the island of their own accord: Cæsar likewise appears to have declined the battle; for, after he had rescued the legion, he remained a short time on the field, in order of battle, and then retired to his camp.

Various conjectures have been formed, and many reasons assigned, by different authors, for Cæsar's conduct on this occasion, which appears very inconsistent with his general character; for he is said never to have fought but with decisive advantage; but, if so, here, for the first time, he was worsted. It is in vain to assign any other cause of his retreat; the Roman authors themselves are of this opinion, though they own it but faintly, and with reluctance. Had the advantage gained over the seventh legion been but trifling*, can any one doubt but that Cæsar, having once put the Britons to a stand, by his sudden arrival, and reinforcing the legion, would immediately have chastized the Britons for their fresh revolt, and have spared himself the trouble of future contests; till, therefore, it can be proved that Cæsar ever neglected improving an advantage, or delayed his vengeance when in his power to exercise it, we may be allowed to maintain, that if in this engagement victory may be said to have resided with either army, it certainly was with the Britons.

A series of tempestuous weather kept both armies inactive in their camps for some days, during which the Britons sent dispatches into all parts of the island, inviting the chiefs of the several petty states to join with them all their forces, and, by forcing the Roman camp, at once to cut them off and free their country from the galling yoke of slavery; and, as a further inducement, the messengers were ordered to represent the Romans as in a weak defenceless condition, and quite dispirited for want of their cavalry, and their number greatly diminished. Thus encouraged, and led on besides by the hopes of great booty, numerous forces were collected from the different provinces, who joining in one body with the army that had lately attacked the seventh legion, they boldly advanced and attacked the Roman entrenchments, but with very bad success; for Cæsar was prepared to receive them; and mounting his general officers on the thirty horse that Comius had brought with him to Britain, in his retinue, that they might be the better able to give their orders throughout the whole line of battle, he drew up his army before the camp so as to cover it, and gave the undisciplined Britons a fresh proof of his superior military knowledge; for, thus arranged, his forces soon repulsed the unfortunate victims of Cæsar's ambition, who were many of them slain in the action, and the rest put to flight; and, to add to their calamity, the victorious army, in the barbarous spirit of conquest, set fire to all the habitations for several miles round Cæsar's camp. In this dreadful crisis they again sue for peace, which was far from

* I can see no reason why Smollett should assert, that this advantage was trifling, and only the effect of surprize, when every authority that he could possibly consult, would have informed him that the legion was routed, and would have been totally destroyed; if Cæsar had not rescued them; but this northern historian is very sparing of encomiums, when the Caledonians are not concerned.

being disagreeable to Cæsar; for his want of horse prevented him from improving his victory, by pursuing the scattered enemy into the inland parts of the island; and, without taking this step, it was impossible to secure his conquest; for though he had defeated the Britons, yet it was far from being decisive, as it was not a general engagement; and he had reason to fear that the same love of freedom which had led them so often to the field, would soon furnish them with a formidable army, which the situation of his affairs would by no means allow him to cope with; for provisions began to grow scarce, his army, though victorious, had suffered greatly, and were as much averse as their general to wintering in an unknown island; and the approach of the equinox made him dread another storm. Thus circumstanced, it is no wonder that Cæsar readily gave audience to the ambassadors, and immediately entered into a treaty with the Britons, requiring only double the number of hostages that he had formerly demanded to be sent to him on the continent, but which was never complied with. Having thus granted a peace that he was not in a capacity to refuse, sensible of his own dangerous situation, he made all possible haste to return to Gaul, and re-embarked his army about the middle of September. On the 20th, about midnight, he set sail with a fair wind, and, after a short passage, arrived safe at the port from which he had embarked, two of his transports only being missing; who, having landed their complement at a neighbouring port, the inhabitants, the Morini, ordered them to lay down their arms, or to expect no quarter.

The Romans, observing that the enemy were but few in number, stood their ground, and received them with great intrepidity; but, fresh forces coming to the assistance of the Morini, they were obliged to send messengers to inform Cæsar of their distress, who tells us, that it was four hours before the cavalry he detached to their relief came up with the enemy; but that, as soon as the Morini perceived them, they threw away their arms, took to flight, and were pursued with great slaughter*.

Thus ended Cæsar's first most inglorious expedition to Britain; which, however it may be varnished over by those historians who are dazzled with the splendor of heroic actions, and never enquire into the justice of them, will brand the name of Cæsar with eternal infamy, among the friends of virtue, freedom, and independence; who must ever look upon Cæsar's invasion as the cruel and oppressive act of a lawless tyrant, who sacrifices honour, justice, humanity, and the law of nations, to his fatal ambition. The Romans, indeed, extolled him to the skies, and ordered a public thanksgiving for his success against Britain; which is not to be wondered at, as they were actuated by the same spirit of tyranny and oppression as their general; and, to gratify their boundless ambition, had trampled on laws human and divine, solely to acquire the vain title of being masters of the world. But let not Englishmen admire, much less justify, these bold invaders of the natural rights of mankind, nor set up the Greek and Roman name as the standard of imitation; for, upon a strict, impartial examination, more virtue and true heroism will be found in a few very confined periods of the English history, than in all the annals of the boasted republics of antiquity†.

Our brave ancestors were no sooner freed from the presence of their cruel oppressors, than they determined not to comply with the shameful conditions to which their unhappy situation had forced them to assent. The first public act of liberty was shewn in not sending the hostages Cæsar had required of them: he, indeed, mentions two cities that gave him this token of slavery; but these, we may suppose, were under the direct influence of his creature Comius, and acted contrary to the general spirit of the people. The Roman general put his troops into winter-quarters; and, after leaving orders with his lieutenants to prepare a fleet of transports, and make the most vigorous and powerful preparations for a more formidable invasion of Britain in the spring, set out for Italy to pass the winter there, as was his usual custom.

While Cæsar's officers were making their warlike preparations, and collecting stores and rigging from Spain, to fit out their fleet, the Britons were not idle spectators of the approaching storm; but wisely entered into a general association for the preservation and defence of the common cause, and, for the first time, elected a commander in chief of all their forces. As this was a new office, of the highest honour, and greatest trust, the contest for this dignity was warm and spirited, and lay between the chiefs of the Cassii‡ and of the Trinobantes||, the two most powerful states in the island, who had united and incorporated into their bodies several petty states. The supreme magistrate, or governor of the former of these states, was Cassivellaunus, who had reduced several of the neighbouring provinces to his obedience, and had acquired the highest reputation for valour and wisdom; nor was Imanuentius, the general of the Trinobantes, less renowned; but in this dispute he proved unfortunate, and lost his life in the contest by the treachery of Cassivellaunus. His son Mandubratius, dreading the same fate, fled to Cæsar, and put himself under his protection.

Cæsar, on his return to Gaul in the spring, found that his men, notwithstanding the difficulties they had to encounter from a scarcity of materials, had laboured with such indefatigable industry, that they had provided him a fleet of six hundred new transports and twenty-eight galleys, which, with the remains of his old fleet, he judged fully sufficient for the designed embarkation; and being strengthened with a fresh accession of interest among the Britons, by the desertion of Mandubratius, he ordered his navy to repair to Port Itium, which was the most commodious harbour

* It is hardly possible to conceive that the Morini would venture to commence hostilities against the Romans on their landing, when Cæsar's whole force lay so contiguous as four hours march, if they had not considered the whole army as the fugitive remains of an unsuccessful expedition.

† The candid reader is desired to look into Smollett's History of England, vol. i. p. 22. where he will find Cæsar's retreat from Britain ascribed only to his fear of crossing the seas in crazy vessels, and the authority of all other historians overturned; who uniformly maintain, that Cæsar's army had suffered greatly by the defeat of the seventh legion, and that it was owing to his distressed circumstances that he returned so suddenly to the continent.

for embarkation, and lay nearest to the British shore. To this port he ordered his officers to conduct the forces destined for the expedition; and, while they were performing this service, he applied himself to composing several differences that had arisen in his absence among the princes of Gaul, and had caused some commotions amongst them, particularly in the province of the Triviri, where Indutiomarus attempted to raise a general insurrection, and had formed a considerable faction in opposition to Cingetorix, a magistrate of Cæsar's peculiar appointment. To quell this tumult, Cæsar entered the territories of the Trivini at the head of a strong force, reduced them to obedience, reinstated Cingetorix in his office, and carried off all the relations and adherents of Indutiomarus as hostages; and, the better to prevent their forming any combinations in his absence, that might interrupt or divert him from his grand plan of conquest in Britain, he ordered all the cavalry of Gaul to accompany him in his expedition: but it does not appear that this order was obeyed; and we find no mention of any of them embarking with him, except the Æduan cavalry, who, after the death of their general (who fell nobly defending his liberty in opposition to this order of Cæsar) joined the Romans, and went with them to Britain.

Having thus settled the affairs of Gaul, he marched to the rendezvous at Port Itium, where he found that forty of his ships had suffered greatly by a storm as they were under sail to join the main fleet: this and some other incidents it is supposed retarded the embarkation at least twenty-five days after his arrival; at length, about the beginning of August*, all things being ready, the wind at west, and having committed the custody of the port to Labienus, with orders to supply him with what provisions he might want, and to send him the earliest intelligence of all occurrences in Gaul, he set sail at sun-set with a fleet consisting of eight hundred vessels, having on board a large force consisting of two thousand cavalry and five legions of infantry. They got under sail with a gentle breeze at south-west, but at midnight found themselves becalmed, and by break of day carried greatly to the left of our island; but on the turn of the tide, they made such good use of their oars, that the whole fleet arrived safe about noon off Deal, the place where Cæsar made his last descent.

The formidable appearance of so large a fleet had diverted the Britons from their first design of defending the coast, and disputing the enemy's landing; so that Cæsar, to his great surprize, found the shore quite desolate, and landed his men without the least opposition: as soon as they were all set on shore, he chose out a convenient place for forming his camp (which appears to have been on Barham Downs); and after he had marked out the ground, he left five thousand foot and three hundred horse, under the command of Q. Atrius, to guard his camp †, and to fortify it with all expedition, that it might be a secure retreat in case of necessity. He set out in the dead of the night with the main body of his army in search of the Britons; after a march of twelve miles he discovered the enemy very advantageously encamped on an eminence, with the river Stour in their front, and a thick wood in their rear; by this disposition it is evident that they had no design of coming to a general engagement with the Romans at this place, but to obstruct their march by opposing their passage over this river, which they endeavoured to defend with their war-chariots and cavalry; but the Roman cavalry charged them so vigorously, that they soon forced their passage, and repulsed the Britons, who abandoned their camp, and retreated to the wood in their rear; all the avenues to which they had fortified by blocking them up with large trees cut down and laid across one another to a considerable height: to this wood the Romans pursued them, and found a more difficult service than they had ever known or could expect from the Britons.

Besides the strong, though rude, fortifications at the several avenues to the wood, in the center of it there was a very strong fortress which had been formerly made use of in the civil wars in this part of the country; from this fortress they sallied out in detached parties, and so successfully harassed the Roman cavalry in their attempt to force the entrances into the wood, that they were obliged to resign this service to the infantry, who probably would not have been able to have forced these fortifications, if the seventh legion had not made use of that celebrated part of the Roman military discipline, the tortoise; by the assistance of which they had forced several places fortified by the strictest rules of art, and defended by the best disciplined forces ‡. An attack of this kind, so new and unexpected, could not but fill the astonished Britons with surprize and terror; nor can it be wondered at, that they made little or no resistance, but soon retreated in great confusion ||. Here again Cæsar neglected to pursue them, contrary to his usual method, though from the confusion they were thrown into there he had great reason to expect a complete victory; but he certainly acted with more caution and deliberation in all his con-

* Fifty-four years before the birth of Christ.

† Smollet says, that he left this force to guard the ships that lay at anchor in the Downs; but if the Britons were fled up the country, and had no armed force at sea, what occasion could there be for such a force to defend an empty fleet riding at anchor at some distance from the shore?

‡ The tortoise was so called from its forming a covering and defence for the soldiers, who found as much safety in it as the tortoise does in its shell; to which it likewise bore some resemblance. It was formed by the soldiers raising their shields to an equal height over their heads, and joining them together in so compact and firm a manner, that it formed a compleat stage, which it was not in the power of the besieged to break or unfix. On the stage a second body of soldiers mounted, and formed in the same manner; and by this means they raised as many stages as were required to equal the height of the fortifications they wanted to force. This account of the tortoise is taken from the Roman Antiquities; but we cannot help expressing our astonishment at the amazing strength of the first body of soldiers, who had to bear the weight of as many stages as were necessary to equal the height of the walls of cities. It resembles the fabulous legend of Hercules supporting the globe; yet it stands on authentic record; and almost all the military exploits of the Romans have more or less of the miraculous cast.

|| It is amazing, that, of all the historians who have related this action, not one of them agrees with Smollett: they represent the advantage gained by Cæsar to have been at the expence of great labour and conflict, and the utmost exertion of military skill; and, in this account of their forcing the wood, Cæsar himself supports their credit; expressly avowing, that his cavalry were repulsed. Vide Cæsar. Comment. But this ingenious North Briton makes so slight of the brave defence made by our ancestors, that one would conclude, from his account, that Cæsar's presence alone was sufficient to put them to flight.

tests with the Britons, than with any other enemy, which is no small proof of the high opinion he entertained of their personal valour and intrepidity.

On the morrow after this engagement he divided his army into three bodies, and sent them out on different routs in pursuit of the scattered islanders; but the last division was scarce out of sight, when he sent to recal them, on receiving the alarming news that his fleet was almost intirely destroyed by a violent storm: upon this information he countermanded the pursuit, and set out for the sea-coast; here he was an eye-witness of the havock the storm had made; and, upon examination, found that forty of his vessels were rendered wholly unfit for service, and that it would require much time and labour to refit the rest: however, that no time might be lost, he set all his carpenters to work, and sent for others from Gaul: and, to prevent such a misfortune for the future, as soon as the ships were refitted, he ordered them to be drawn on shore, and to be inclosed within his camp, the trenches of which were extended so as to surround them.

This most astonishing service being performed by the great industry of his soldiers, who applied themselves to it for twelve days and nights, with very little intermission, Cæsar writes to Labienus for a fresh supply of ships to be built and sent to him with all expedition; leaves a proper force to defend the camp, and sets out for his former station, in order to resume the design interrupted by the misfortune that had befallen his fleet.

The Britons had taken advantage of the posture of Cæsar's affairs, and in his absence had greatly increased their force, which they had drawn together in the wood, from which they had lately retired. Cassivellaunus, their general, as soon as he was informed that Cæsar was on his march, detached some of their cavalry and war-chariots to harass and obstruct him on his way; this brought on several skirmishes, the Britons occasionally breaking out on a sudden from their coverts, and falling upon the Romans with their horse and chariots, and retiring to their hiding-places as soon as they found themselves likely to be worsted. In these sallies they were generally repulsed, and at last obliged to retire to their rendezvous in the wood; but they were not disheartened; for, while the Romans were very busy in fortifying their camp, Cassivellaunus, judging it highly impolitic to give them time to compleat their work, made a general sally, and rushing upon the enemy with great fury, made the advanced guard give way: Cæsar observing this, sent two cohorts to their assistance, who, terrified at the uncommon execution the Britons had done, durst not proceed, but made a full halt instead of joining the advanced guard; encouraged by this, the enemy soon broke through them with amazing rapidity, and routed them with very little loss. In this action Quintus Laberius Durus, a tribune, and several other Roman officers, were slain; and, from Cæsar's confused manner of relating the event of this engagement, we may fairly conclude that the Romans were worsted, if not defeated; though he does not say so in express terms: his words are "That on his bringing up more men to reinforce his army, the Britons were checked."

The following day the British forces appeared upon the hills at some distance from Cæsar's camp, but their number was small, consisting only of a few scattered parties, and seemed to decline coming to an engagement: however, in order to make trial of their disposition, Cæsar sent out three legions and all his horse to forage, under the command of Tribonius; this detachment, formidable as it was, the Britons had the courage to attack, and, falling upon the horse, they penetrated to the legionary troops; but the Romans had now learned the utility of supporting their horse with their infantry; and the Britons being attacked by a compact body of horse and foot, were entirely defeated. From this time they fell into their old factions and divisions; and the troops that had been assembled from the counties returned home, leaving Cassivellaunus to his fate: so, that after this defeat, they never made head against Cæsar as an united people.

The British confederacy being thus broken, the Trinobantes, whom the fear of Cassivellaunus had kept hitherto within the bounds of their duty, seeing that he was no longer able to keep the field with any considerable force, went over to Cæsar, put themselves under his protection, returned to their allegiance under young Mandubratius, and entered into a treaty of neutrality with the Romans, in which they were followed by several counties. Cæsar, thus strengthened, and free from the danger of a general opposition, turns all his force against the unfortunate, deserted Cassivellaunus; he marches towards the Thames in order to penetrate into that general's dominions, and arrives at Coway, opposite the Oatlands, where the river was fordable by his infantry; on the opposite bank he perceived a considerable body of the enemy very advantageously encamped.

Besides the natural difficulty of the ford, Cassivellaunus had added every obstructions that good policy could suggest; he had fortified the bank, on which his army was encamped, with sharpened stakes, and had fixed a great number of the same sort at the bottom of the river; but Cæsar, who was apprized of this by deserters, sent in his cavalry first, and supported them with his infantry, who plunged into the water with great alacrity, even up to their chins, though they were hardly able to support the weight of their armour; the enemy, being struck with consternation on seeing that no obstacle could stop the ardour of the Romans, abandoned their camp, and left them a free passage into the country. The British general, finding it in vain to resist the fortune of the Roman arms, dismissed all his forces, retaining only four thousand chariots to harass the Romans, and to endeavour to cut off all supply of provisions, by carrying off the corn and cattle that lay in their route: this conduct made Cæsar very cautious how he advanced, for fear of sallies from the woods, and other ambushes; and determined him to keep his men as much as possible in a body; so that, not daring to make the least excursion in search of provisions, they suffered great distress in their march; but they plundered and burnt all the villages they found in their way.

While Cæsar was on his march, the Cenimagni (the inhabitants of Surry) finding that the Trinobantes, by their treaty with the Romans, were freed from the calamities of war, and lived quietly under Cæsar's protection, determined to follow their example, and accordingly sent an embassy to Cæsar to

to make their submission; and, from the deputies of this people, he gained intelligence that the capital* of the British general lay only at a small distance; Cæsar immediately determines to attack it with all his force, hoping that the reduction of this place would complete his conquest, by putting an end to the war. Cassivellaunus had fortified this city, as it was called, (which in effect was no more than a fortress in the middle of a wood) with a ditch and a rampart, which, added to the natural strength of the situation, made it appear very formidable, as Cæsar himself confesses; however, he ordered it to be briskly stormed at two different places, and the Britons not being able to stand the fury of this double assault, fled through the avenues on the opposite side of the wood, leaving behind them a great quantity of corn and cattle, Cassivellaunus having made this a general magazine of provisions, and a retreat for his subjects, with their herds and flocks. The number of Britons killed and taken prisoners on this occasion was very considerable. The defeat did not prevent the brave Cassivellaunus from attempting to carry into execution, a scheme he had long meditated for the service of his unhappy country, and which, had it succeeded, must have greatly distressed, if not totally ruined the invaders. Cæsar had left his navy entrenched within his camp on the Kentish shore, and was now with the main body of his army upwards of eighty miles distant from it. Cassivellaunus judged this a most favourable opportunity of seizing and destroying their navy, and thereby of cutting off all hopes of retreat, the securing of which he knew the Romans had always strictly attended to; to accomplish this he sends his orders as commander in chief of the confederacy, which was not yet dissolved, though it had suffered greatly by defection, to Cingetorix, Cornelius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, four Kentish princes, to collect their forces together privately, but with all expedition, and suddenly to storm the enemy's entrenchments: these orders were executed without delay; but, unfortunately, not with that success that he expected: for Cæsar had provided against such an attempt, and the fortifications were of sufficient strength to insure the safety of his fleet; relying on this, the Romans, instead of contenting themselves with defending their entrenchments from within, sallied out of the camp, repulsed the Britons with great slaughter, and took their commander in chief (prince Cingetorix) prisoner.

The unfortunate Cassivellaunus, quite dispirited by this new misfortune, by the almost total defection of his countrymen, who now went over to Cæsar in bodies, by the desolation of his own territories, and by the ill success of his arms, determined to provide for his own safety by making his peace with Cæsar, which he easily obtained through the mediation of Comius, to which Cæsar's desire of returning to Gaul at this season of the year, must have greatly contributed; and, in fact, it was as much his interest to grant peace to the British general as for him to sue for it; for, besides the approach of winter, the Gauls were ripe for a revolt, which laid him under a necessity of returning to the continent; and he was too great a politician to leave all his allies in Britain in the power of Cassivellaunus, and to retire with the reproach of an unfinished conquest, when he had it in his power to complete it in his own idea, on such advantageous terms by an honourable peace†. The conditions of the treaty which Cæsar entered into with Cassivellaunus, and the Britons in general, were, that they should pay an annual tribute to the Roman state, and deliver a certain number of hostages as a security for the performance of these conditions; to this was joined a private clause that respected Cassivellaunus only, who engaged that Mandubratius should remain unmolested in the possession of his dominions. A general pacification having thus taken place, Cæsar made all possible haste to his naval camp, and as soon as his fleet was ready, he put his army on board, with his hostages, stowing them in the best manner he could; for he had scarce ships enough to transport them; and set sail about the middle of September (having been on this island near four months), and arrived safe on the coasts of Gaul, after a very quick passage.

This second expedition of Cæsar's was not less inglorious than the first; for though he had ventured further up into the country, and had subdued and formed alliances with many of its states, yet he did not keep possession of one foot of ground, nor reap any solid advantage for his country; nay, so uncertain was he of his superiority over the Britons, that he durst not trust himself to winter on the island, nor even venture to leave a part of his army in garrison to keep them in subjection to the Roman arms; but retired more like a defeated general than a conqueror: and all the effect of this enterprize seems to have been the debauching several of the states of Britain from the common cause of liberty, and, at the expence of much slaughter and devastation, to have reduced the whole island to a temporary submission, entered into for their present safety, and which he took no measures to secure the continuance of a moment longer than he remained amongst them: the only merit, therefore, he could justly claim, was the having carried the Roman arms beyond the boundaries of the ocean, which was never before attempted.

On his return to Rome, he offered a corslet of British pearls at the shrine of Venus Genetrix, from whom he was said to be descended; and, that he might fix a lasting and public remembrance of his expeditions against Britain on the minds of the Romans, he employed his prisoners in adjusting the tapestry scenes of the theatre, on which the victories he gained over the Britons were painted: others of a more robust constitution were

* This capital is supposed to have been situated where St. Albans now stands, which is about twenty miles from the place where Cæsar forded the Thames; but it admits of some doubt, from Cæsar's complaining that his men were greatly fatigued and harrassed by long and painful marches; and that the Britons had driven off the cattle from whole countries through which he passed; which expressions can hardly be adapted to the small extent of twenty miles.

† I have adopted the opinions of the best historians in this account of the motives that induced Cæsar to treat with Cassivellaunus, in opposition to the partiality of Smollett, who mentions this event as a mark of great condescension in Cæsar; while some authors, and even his countryman Guthrie, insinuates, that Comius, instead of acting as a mediator for Cassivellaunus, "was secretly employed by Cæsar to bring about this treaty, in order to save appearances."

The Roman authors, as well as our own, are wholly silent on the subject of the payment of the tribute agreed to be sent to Rome by the Britons: it is, however, highly probable, that it was punctually paid during Cæsar's time; but after the death of that invader of the natural rights of mankind (who fell a victim to the same spirit of lawless ambition that led him to the British isles, and instigated him to aspire to a supremacy over that commonwealth he was born to obey), the Roman state was so shaken with factions and civil wars, that the affairs of Britain were wholly neglected, and the tribute neither demanded nor paid for twenty years; nay in all the difficult partitions of the dominions of Rome, from the death of Julius Cæsar to the accession of Augustus to the Imperial dignity, no mention is made of Britain; but, after he was firmly settled, he undertook to compel the Britons to stand to their treaty with Julius Cæsar: and for this purpose, he advanced twice as far as Gaul, in his way to Britain; but was diverted from his design the first time by a revolt in Pannonia, and the second by an embassy from Britain to sue for peace, which he granted without hesitation. The Roman historians say, that Augustus was desirous rather of strengthening the Roman empire by friendly alliances, than of extending it by conquest; and therefore he granted peace to the Britons through a principle of policy: yet he put them in continual alarm, threatening them with invasion whenever they neglected to pay the tribute; but was always appeased by the presents that were sent him from their governors. Thus the Britons maintained a friendly correspondence with the Romans during the reign of Augustus, and of his successor Tiberius; paying only a light duty on the merchandize they carried to Gaul, and in other respects preserving their independency.

As to the state of affairs in Britain after the departure of Julius Cæsar, we have little or no account on record; all that we can collect is, that Mandubratius, conscious of having rendered himself odious in the eyes of his countrymen by deserting his country, soon followed the fortune of Cæsar, and that Cassivellaunus severely chastised the Trinobantes for joining with the invaders of their country. He died about seven years after Cæsar quitted the island, and was succeeded in his paternal dominions by his nephew Tinuantius; for there was now no general confederacy under one chief. Tinuantius was succeeded by Cunobelin his son, who followed his father's steps in courting the protection and favour of Rome. At this period the Britons, by having frequent intercourse with the Romans, insensibly grew enamoured of the Roman arts, and began to cultivate them. For this purpose, several of the British princes resolved to reside at Rome, and others sent their sons there for education.

Cunobelin was the most powerful prince of Britain: he was properly prince of the Cassivellauni; but these had extended their conquests so far since Julius Cæsar's time, that they had subjected to their obedience the Trinovantes, the Dobuni, and several other leading provinces; so that he was in effect, though not nominally, the first king of Britain: and, amongst other strong proofs of his regal authority, we find that he coined money to pay the duties imposed by the Romans on the British merchandize exported to the Roman territories†; and, by his prudent and peaceable administration‡, the British isles enjoyed a series of uninterrupted tranquility till the reign of Caligula, who succeeded Augustus in the Roman empire, including a period of ninety years from the time of Julius Cæsar's second expedition.

Caligula was a vain, inconstant, and cruel tyrant: it was therefore no wonder that he readily seized the first favourable pretext for breaking with the Britons, which was the restoration of Adminius the son of Cunobelin, who, being banished from Britain for exciting an unnatural rebellion against his father, fled to Rome for protection, and completed his crimes by persuading the emperor to undertake the conquest of his country, encouraging him, at the same time, with the flattering prospect, that the very appearance of the Roman emperor would be sufficient to reduce the Britons. A conquest so important, and to be accomplished on such easy terms, suited the disposition of the vain-glorious and cowardly Caligula, who assembles an army of two hundred thousand men, and advances in person to the coast of Belgic Gaul, with a design to invade Britain||; but being informed, as he was embarking his men, that the Britons were drawn up in order of battle, ready to receive him on the opposite shore, he declined an enterprize which seemed to threaten more danger than he had apprehended. However, that he might give some colour to his intended ridiculous triumph on this occasion, he ventured out to sea in his galley, accompanied by some of his officers; and, after slightly surveying the British coast, returned with all the pomp and parade of a conqueror; and haranguing his soldiers as if he was preparing them for some important enterprize, he sounds a charge as if an enemy was in sight; and, upon a private signal given to his principal officers, the astonished troops are set to gathering of shells on the sea-shore, which he sent to Rome as the trophies of his victory, and wrote to the senate to decree him a triumph; but, abandoned as the Roman senate was at this time, it appears that they murmured against the insolence of this demand, and complied with it rather from a principle of fear, than from any belief of his having merited such a decree. As a further monument of this foolish expedition, he erected a tower on the Belgic coast, almost opposite to Norfolk, which he called Turris Ardens, in allusion to its design of being a

The friendly intercourse that the Britons had so long maintained with the Romans, was now found to be productive of the most fatal consequences; for their fondness for the Roman arts, and their importation of its luxuries, had so debauched and enervated them, that their natural love of liberty and independence was greatly degenerated, and aversion to the Romans considerably abated; so that great numbers of Roman merchants, and several officers who collected the customs in Britain, resided there, and not only became well acquainted with the situation, strength, military force, and customs of the natives, but, considering it as a country that must one day be reduced to a Roman province, found means to foment divisions and animosities among the chiefs; thereby dissolving that union which the Romans well knew was the only bond of security to any state in time of danger. Thus the Britons caressed the enemies of liberty to their own ruin; and while they were cultivating the fine arts and polite manners, they insensibly sunk into indolence and supineness, which paved the way for subjection; and they lost the liberty they had so long enjoyed, before they were sensible of their danger, or of the degeneracy of their manners.

Claudius, the successor of Caligula, was naturally of a timid, wary disposition, and, according to the testimony of the best Roman historians, gave himself up entirely to the management of his favourites, who, either desirous to raise the reputation of their master, or, which is most probable, to share the profits of such an important conquest, persuaded him to undertake the reduction of Britain; and, as he affected the character of acting with justice and moderation, they took care to furnish him with proper pretexts for commencing hostilities against Britain. The first was in the character of Beric, a British prince, who represented himself to the emperor as having been unjustly exiled, and in revenge offered Claudius his interest in Britain to facilitate his conquest of it; assuring him that his party was very formidable there†. While Claudius was debating this subject with his favourites, the British princes send an embassy to demand the British fugitive Beric and his adherents, and to complain of the favourable reception and entertainment given to these rebels. This embassy the minions of his court persuade him to treat with contempt, and to put them in mind of their antient subjection to Rome, by demanding the long-neglected payment of the tribute, the refusal of which would prove a second public and popular pretext for invading them. The British princes highly resented the cool reception of their ambassadors, and rejected the demand with disdain; prohibiting, at the same time, all further intercourse with the Romans. Shortly after this, Claudius gives the command of his army in Gaul to Aulus Plautius, a citizen of distinguished valour, who had been trained to arms from his youth, and had acquired as much reputation in the senate as in the field, and orders him to transport a considerable force to Britain; enjoining him, if he found a probability of such success as would merit triumphal honours, to give him early information, that he might come and reap the fruits of victory in person.

Plautius, in obedience to these instructions, drew down a large body of troops to the sea-shore; but when his embarkation began, the soldiers mutinied, openly declaring that they would not go to war beyond the limits of the world. The emperor, hearing of this mutiny, sent Narcissus, a freed slave, and one of his creatures, to endeavour to appease them, and to persuade them to obey his orders: but this courtier was universally despised; and the soldiers, knowing him to have been a slave, were fired with indignation when they saw him ascend the rostrum, which was sacred to their brave generals, who had shared in common with them the dangers and fatigues of war. In vain he attempted to harangue them; for his voice was lost in the general cry of "To Saturnalia," alluding to the public festival so called, in which the slaves are allowed to assume the habits and the characters of their masters. This incident would probably have put an end to the expedition, if a spirit of generosity had not determined the soldiers to make a voluntary submission to their general, in order to mortify the court sycophant. Their accustomed valour and discipline once restored, Plautius eagerly embraced the happy change, and, without giving them time for further reflection, hastened their departure; and dividing his forces into three bodies, embarked them from three different ports, that if one should fail, this might not prevent the success of the others. The embarkation put to sea with a contrary wind, which drove them back; but the wind veering about to the south-east, and a phenomenon, supposed to be the Aurora Borealis, appearing in the sky, they regarded it as a happy omen; and under this persuasion set sail again with reanimated ardour, and landed in Britain without opposition‡. The natives, on the news of a mutiny which they apprehended still subsisted in the Roman army, had disbanded the troops they had drawn down to the sea-coasts for its defence||; and, on receiving advice of their landing, either pursuing their former false policy of fighting in particular places, or determined by this means to weary out the enemy by painful marches, instead of joining in one general body, and advancing to oppose the Romans, retired to the inland parts of the country, and divided their forces into several distinct parties: but the two most considerable corps were under the command

* The remains of this building may be seen at low-water near Boulogne; but are by no means so perfect as Carte, and Smollett from him, has asserted, who both copy the errors of French writers on this subject.

† Historians are greatly divided in opinion concerning this Beric—Rapin imagines him to have been the identical Adminius that formerly fled to Caligula,—and Smollett, on his own authority alone, positively asserts, that he was a chieftain among the Dobuni of Dorsetshire; but the most probable opinion is, that he was a creature of Adminius, employed by him, as he durst not return to Britain, to raise an insurrection in his favour on the death of his father Cunobelin, who was succeeded by Caractacus and Togodumnus, the younger brothers of Adminius; and that, being defeated, he was banished by these princes: and certain it is, that Adminius at that time resided at Rome. From the Description of a Greek Medal in Camden.

of Caractacus, and Togodumnus his brother, the sons and successors of Cunobelin. To this division of their strength they owed their ruin: for Plautius, after defeating several little parties on his march, advanced as far as Oxfordshire, where he attacked Caractacus, whom he defeated and put to flight; not long after he met with the same success against Togodumnus. The two brothers being thus routed, the whole country submitted; and Claudius, leaving a strong garrison to secure its subjection, marched on to the banks of the Isis, on the opposite side of which a large body of the Britons, headed by Caractacus and Togodumnus, were carelessly encamped, imagining themselves out of all danger from the depth of the river, which they well knew was not fordable even by cavalry. But, unfortunately for them, Plautius had in his army a considerable corps of Germans, who had been trained up in the art of swimming across rivers in their armour; these took to the river, which so astonished the Britons, that they quitted their station, and retired in great confusion*. The passage thus opened, a body of the Roman infantry, animated by the example of the Germans, soon followed them, under the command of Flavius Vespasian, afterwards emperor of Rome, and his brother Sabinus. These renowned generals went in search of the enemy, who had retreated to the neighbouring woods; and coming up with them, a slight skirmish ensued, in which the Britons were worsted; but night approaching, the Romans did not think proper to improve this advantage: the next morning the Britons were so far from being discouraged, that they attacked the Romans, and charged them with such impetuosity, that they broke through their ranks, thereby rendering their boasted discipline useless; and would have obtained a complete victory, if C. Sidius Geta, a general officer, who was supposed to be taken prisoner, had not disengaged himself from the enemy with his whole corps. This experienced officer, observing that the Britons, thinking themselves secure of victory, acted without caution, wheeled about with his troops, and attacked them in the rear, while they were pursuing the advantage they had just gained. This unexpected blow obliged them to face about, and gave the main body of the Romans, which had been engaged, time to recover; and by this means the unhappy Britons soon found themselves charged in front and rear; and after an obstinate resistance, they were obliged to take to flight. This action must have been very desperate; for Vespasian himself was surrounded, and had certainly lost his life, if his son had not bravely rescued him at the hazard of his own safety; and the Roman senate were so sensible that the fate of the day was decided in their favour by the gallant behaviour of Geta, that they decreed him a triumph, though he was not an officer of that rank to which they ordinarily confined that honour.

The British generals, after this overthrow, retired along the banks of the Thames, following the course of the river towards the sea; and being well acquainted with the fordable places, passed over it with ease, while the Romans, who pursued them, advanced very slowly, being greatly embarrassed by the fens and marshes that lay in their way, and made their march, encumbered as they were with heavy armour, very tedious and painful. At length the Germans discovered a ford, and the rest of the army either made or found a bridge at some little distance, over which they passed and surrounded the British forces, which were once more vanquished, and Togodumnus, one of their commanders in chief, slain on the spot.

The Roman general, though he had gained so many signal victories, yet had sustained considerable losses, whereby his army was diminished; and the death of Togodumnus, who was beloved by the people, had raised such a spirit of resentment in the Britons, that he dreaded the impending storm, and prudently concluded, that this was the proper time to send for a reinforcement to Rome, and to intreat the emperor to come and partake of the dangers and glory of the enterprize. In the mean time he was greatly distressed for provisions, and must inevitably have perished, if it had not been for the former treachery of the people of Oxfordshire, who, by their infamous submission, had permitted a Roman garrison amongst them, and thereby made that county a secure retreat, and a magazine of provisions for the enemy.

The emperor had prepared a prodigious armament against Britain, and waited only till his general should send him word that the reduction of the island was worthy of the Imperial arms; he therefore set out with all expedition for Ostium, where he took shipping for Marseilles, and from thence he came by land to Boulogne, and embarked his army for Britain, where he arrived safe in the month of August, 44, and landed at Sandwich, then called Portus Rupinus. As soon as his soldiers were ready, he marched to join his army under the command of Plautius, which was encamped on the south-side of the Thames: the junction of the two armies formed a more considerable force than any the Britons had yet seen, so that they prudently declined coming to an engagement. Claudius, taking upon him the command of the whole army, marched up to them, and leaving them no opportunity of retreat, forced them to a general action, in which they were totally defeated: he then made himself master of the city of Camelodunum, now Malden in Essex: from thence he marched into Middlesex, and by this time the fame of his valour and of his great moderation, joined to the dread of so powerful an army, brought in vast numbers of Britons to his camp, with tenders of submission; these were followed by whole provinces; so that here we may justly fix the date of the Roman conquest. The emperor's clemency to the vanquished, whom he left in quiet possession of their effects, was, by this unhappy, but grateful, people extolled to the skies; and they went so far as to erect temples to his honour, in which they adored him as a deity; while he, highly satisfied with his expedition, returned to Rome, leaving the command to Plautius. There he was saluted with the joyful acclamations of a people ever fond of conquest, but who now were quite intoxicated with glory, esteeming it the highest acquisition to have reduced a warlike people beyond the limits of the ocean, to their obedience. In the first transports of their joy they honoured him with the surname of Britannicus, and decreed him a most magnificent triumph*. Plautius, in his capacity of Cæsar's governor of Britain, received the homage of the states of Britain that continually came over to him, and sent out Flavius Vespasian on sundry expeditions, in which he acquired great honour; he fought thirty battles with different parties of the unsubdued Britons, took the Isle of Wight, discovered and conquered the islands of Orkneys, and thus laid the foundation of his future great fortune. Soon after this, Plautius was honourably recalled to Rome, and received at his entrance by the emperor in person, who, to do him signal honour, rode on his left side to and from the Capitol.

* Some historians assert, that the Britons waited the attack of the enemy, and did not retire till they had sustained considerable loss: but this is highly improbable; for if they had not fled, astonished at the sight of the Germans swimming across the river completely armed, we should have had some account of their annoying them with their javelins in their passage.

Plautius was succeeded in the government of Britain by P. Ostorius Scapula†, who, on his arrival, found the affairs of the Romans in great confusion; the unsubdued Britons, under Caractacus, having taken the advantage of the interval betwixt the departure of Plautius and the appointment of a new governor, to make continual incursions into the counties that were in alliance with the Romans, and to harass the separate corps of the Roman army, which was no longer formidable to them than while united under one general. Ostorius landed in Britain towards the end of October; his coming so late in the year gave the Britons room to hope that, like his predecessors, dreading the horrors of a winter campaign, he would remain inactive for the remainder of that year. This encouraged them to continue the hostilities they had so long carried on with some success, and not without a faint prospect of recovering their liberty: the Roman general, however, either apprized of their secure reliance on his remaining quiet during the winter, or determined at once to strike a terror into the British forces by a sudden approach, marches with a large body of the Romans, in search of the enemy; and, having defeated the first party that stood their ground, he pursued the advantage without remission, and meeting with them in small divisions, easily defeated them; and, effectually to prevent any future revolt, he immediately disarmed all the Britons that were in subjection or in alliance with the Romans, and then built a line of forts along the banks of the Avon and the Severn. About the same time, having required the Iceni (a very powerful people inhabiting the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk and Cambridge) to deliver up their arms, they highly resented this attempt to reduce them to the condition of slaves, after they had so long proved themselves faithful allies, and determined to oppose it with all their force. With this view they appointed a general rendezvous in Cambridgeshire, and formed a camp in a very advantageous position, which they fenced with a rampart of earth and trees, and left but one avenue or narrow pass to enter at, which they paved with sharp flints, in order to preclude the approach of the Roman cavalry; but these precautions did not in the least abate the ardour of the Roman general, who attacked the camp with great intrepidity, and finding the cavalry were of no use, ordered them to dismount and support the infantry that began the assault. The Britons made a noble defence; but after an obstinate engagement, attended with great loss on both sides, their rude intrenchment was forced, and the Romans took possession of their camp sword in hand. After this victory, Ostorius advanced against the Cangi, the inhabitants of Shropshire, who had taken the field; but these people, following the example of their ancestors, would not give him an opportunity of coming to a general engagement; but concealing themselves in the woods and other ambushes in detached parties, harassed the Romans on their march by continual surprizes, often cutting off their advanced guards, and then retreating to their hiding places. By this method they drew the Roman general as far as the coasts opposite Ireland, when he was recalled on a sudden to suppress a more dangerous insurrection of the Brigantes, the inhabitants of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland. After an obstinate engagement, which was begun by the Brigantes, who sallied out upon the Romans from Hatfield forest, they were totally defeated near the place where the town of Ostorfield now stands‡. The commanders and such others as had been most active in this rebellion, as it was termed by the Romans, were put to death. Ostorius had no sooner put an end to these disturbances in this part of the country, than he was alarmed with a more formidable commotion in Herefordshire and South Wales. The inhabitants of these provinces, known by the appellation of the Silures, had drawn together a considerable force, the command of which they bestowed on the renowned Caractacus, who was the only British general of his time that had acquired any reputation against the Romans. It does not appear that these people had ever been subject to the Roman power, and probably their distance from the seat of war had hitherto prevented them from engaging in it; but now they thought themselves in imminent danger from the extent of the Roman conquests, the increase of their power and influence in the island, and the general plan they had laid down of reducing the whole island to a Roman province. They therefore united in the common league for their mutual defence; and the army they set on foot was so powerful, that Ostorius found himself under a necessity of making use of his legionary troops, consisting of Roman veterans, in his expedition against these people. Before he set out, in order to guard against the consequences of a defeat, he regulated his affairs in such a manner as might, at all events, secure the Roman conquests, and prevent insurrections in his absence. For this purpose he makes Cogidunus, king of the Dobuni, a citizen of Rome, receives his homage in the name of the senate, and confirms him in the possession of the counties of Gloucester and Oxford;

* Eutropius and Orosius tell us, that all this time the Orkney islands in Scotland were subjected to the Roman empire by Claudius; but it is most probable that this conquest was made by Vespasian, his general, and only added to Claudius his other titles in the inscription on his medals; for his stay on the island was too short, being in all but fifteen days; and the Orkneys, or Orcades, were too barren and insignificant to merit the emperor's notice.

Oxford; adding likewise some of the Belgic colonies to his dominions. By this stroke of policy a powerful and valiant prince was secured in the Roman interest, which he never swerved from, all their conquests on the side of the Severne were guarded by him, as the creature of Rome, against the incursions of the Silures, and all attempts to shake off the Roman yoke in these parts rendered impracticable by the vigilance of their new ally. At the same time, to secure his conquests in the East, Ostorius establishes a strong colony at Malden in Essex; and the county of Middlesex being in perfect subjection to the Roman state, all the tract of land lying between the Thames and the sea was reduced to one province, distinguished by the name of *Britannia Prima.

The Roman general, having made these prudent dispositions, advanced against the Silures, who depended greatly on the valour and experience of their general, and the number and strength of their forces. Caractacus, like Cassibelan, had been raised to the dignity of commander in chief of a powerful confederacy by his personal merit alone, and had like him peculiarly distinguished himself by supporting a series of adverse fortune with heroic fortitude. Under such a general, it was no wonder that the Britons prepared to encounter the Romans with uncommon ardour and intrepidity, and once more indulged the pleasing hope of rescuing their country from the tyranny and oppression of the ambitious Romans.

Caractacus, like an experienced general, transfers the seat of war to the country of the Ordovices†, probably because the county of Shropshire afforded him a more advantageous post than any other; for here he pitched his camp on the top of a very high mountain, near where the river Colun, or Clun, falls into the Teme, and divides Herefordshire from Shropshire. This mountain was very difficult of access, and, to add to the natural strength of the post, Caractacus fortified it with ramparts of stones and sharp-edged flints. In this position, with a deep river in front, he determined to wait the approach of the Romans, having thrown every difficulty in their way that military knowledge could suggest. When the Romans were in sight, in order to animate his men to do their duty, he harangues them in the true spirit of liberty; and tells them, that the hour is fast approaching that must restore them to freedom and independence, or reduce them to abject slavery: he exhorts them to reflect on the glorious examples of their renowned ancestors, who drove the ambitious Cæsar from Britain, and delivered their country from Roman violence and oppression: he gives the leaders of each clan or division a strict charge to ride up and down the field of battle, and exhort the troops to exert their utmost valour in this important struggle to save their country; and, lastly, he orders sacrifices to the gods, imploring success on his arms. The British forces declared their approbation of their general's conduct, and their resolution of dying in the defence of their liberty, by loud acclamations of joy; which astonished the Roman general, who was determined, however, to surmount all difficulties, and, by one decisive blow, at once to put an end to the war and the freedom of Britain. With this view he gives the signal for the attack, and his troops soon passed the river, and gained the foot of the hill on which the Britons were encamped, who received them with such intrepidity and fury, that great numbers of the Romans were slain by their javelins in attempting to force the ramparts. At length, however, they had recourse to the tortoise, by means of which they mounted on the ramparts, and soon overthrew them, as they were composed only of stones badly cemented with clay. This being effected, the Roman legions poured in upon the Britons, and both armies came to a close engagement. The battle was fought with great obstinacy on each side, and remained doubtful for some time. At length the Romans gained the advantage, the legionary troops making a most dreadful slaughter with their swords, which decided the fate of the day in their favour; and, to add to the misfortunes of the Britons, the wife and daughter of their brave general were taken prisoners, and his brothers were obliged to surrender at discretion. As for the unhappy Caractacus, he fled for protection to Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantes. This princess had always been well affected to the Romans, and besides bore a secret hatred to Caractacus for having taken the part of Venutius, her husband, in the civil dissensions which had arisen between them, and which had caused frequent disturbances in their dominions.

The bad policy of Caractacus in flying to her, seems to have been the effect of instant despair, which leaves no room for deliberate reflection. The event proved the imprudence of this step; for this base woman loaded him with chains, and in this indignant situation sent him to the Roman general. Thus this great man, who for nine years had supported the dying remains of that noble confederacy, which was entered into under Cassibelan, for the defence of the common cause of liberty, and who on every occasion had given the most signal proofs of his wisdom and personal bravery, at last fell a victim to the resentment of a cruel woman, and left to posterity a striking example of the debility of human prudence under circumstances of complicated distress.

The military reputation of this illustrious captive had long since been well known and admired at Rome; and no sooner did the welcome news arrive of his defeat and captivity, than the whole city expressed an eager impatience to see the man who had alone supported the weight of the Roman arms for so many years. The emperor, to gratify the curiosity of the people, as well as to enhance the merits of his exploits in Britain, consented to a measure unworthy the dignity of a Roman emperor, ordering the unhappy Caractacus and his whole family to be sent to Rome in chains, there to be exposed a public spectacle to the populace: but this scene, which was intended only to gratify the pride and ambition of Rome, proved in the end as glorious to the British general as his former conduct in the field.

On the day appointed for the exhibition of the noble captives, all Rome attended as at the celebration of the public games. To grace the solemnity the Prætorian guards were drawn out under arms, and the emperor was seated on a magnificent throne, and the famous Agrippina, his empress, on another, adorned with all manner of military trophies*. The procession was opened by a long train of the vassals and dependants of the British prince, after which the spoils and trophies taken from the Britons during the reign of the emperor were pompously displayed; then followed the family of Caractacus; and, lastly, the general himself, who, with a steady countenance and noble deportment, defied the malice of his fortune; and boldly approaching the emperor's throne, addressed him in these ever-memorable words, which Tacitus, their own historian, has preserved on record.

"Had my moderation been adequate to my birth and fortune, Rome might have beheld in me this day not a captive, but a powerful ally; nor wouldst thou, O Cæsar! have disdained to rank in the number of thy friends a prince of royal descent, the commander of many nations—but my present condition reflects dishonour on me, while it adds to thy glory. I once was master of men and arms, of horses and chariots of war, of riches and power; can you wonder then that I sought to preserve them, and unwillingly parted with them? Though the Romans would be universal masters, does it follow that men must submit to lose their possessions tamely? Had I poorly surrendered myself at the beginning of the war, neither my misfortune nor thy glory would have been rendered so conspicuous as they are this day.—Put me to death, and both will soon be buried in oblivion; but grant me my life, restore me my family, and this action will stand on record an eternal monument of thy clemency."

It is no wonder that Claudius, who had already distinguished himself by many acts of moderation, should be affected by the manly address of Caractacus: he immediately set him and his whole family at liberty. A senate was then held, in which the conquest of the Britons under Caractacus was extolled to the skies, and this victory compared with the brightest periods of the Roman glory.

The honour of a triumph was decreed to Ostorius, whose reputation from this very period began to decline; for the Britons, fired with indignation and resentment at the unhappy fate of their beloved hero, and having dearly bought a knowledge of the Roman discipline, began to make war with better judgment and more success than formerly; while the Romans, flushed with continual success, grew careless and indolent. The Britons, observing this, fell upon the legionary cohorts that had been left to complete the forts that were erecting in the country of the Silures; and, if the neighbouring garrisons had not sent out some detachments to their relief, they must have been cut to pieces. In this skirmish the Romans lost the commander of the cohorts, eight captains, and a great number of private men. Soon after this the Britons attacked the Roman foragers, and defeated them; after which they ventured to make head against Ostorius himself, and maintained the battle a whole day against his renowned veterans; and, when night approached, they retired with very little loss.

History is silent with respect to the commander of the Britons in these encounters; all we know with any certainty is, that it was the Silures who continued obstinate in the defence of their liberty, and gained the first advantage over Ostorius during the captivity of Caractacus; and that, by distributing the spoils of war among their neighbours, they drew them in to join them against the Romans. Their opposition had so good an effect, that Ostorius died, as it is supposed, with grief, on seeing himself unable to terminate the war with honour, and to stop the progress of their arms. Aulus Didius was immediately sent over to supply his place†, who, to his great surprize, found matters in a worse situation than he had expected; Manlius Valens, a tribune, who had taken the command upon him after the death of Ostorius, having been defeated by the Silures; who, encouraged by this success, were making inroads into the Roman province distinguished by the name of Britannia Prima, and extending their arms with such success, that the new general thought himself obliged to remonstrate against the conduct of Manlius, in order to enhance the merit of his checking the ardour, and for a time putting a stop to the victories of the Silures.

Nearly at this time the emperor Claudius died, and was succeeded by Nero, a prince who was not in the least ambitious of military glory, and who probably would have declined all further attempts against Britain from the moment of his accession, but that the respect he bore the memory of Claudius obliged him to keep up the appearance for a time of treading in his steps, especially as he was so well beloved by the people.

While this change happened at Rome, the face of affairs began to wear a still more pleasing aspect in Britain; for Venutius, the husband of Cartimandua, was now come to an open rupture with her, the breach between them being probably greatly widened by her treachery to Caractacus his friend, whose office he now took upon him; and the Britons once more found themselves under the command of a general who was little inferior in military reputation to Caractacus himself. Cartimandua had hitherto prevailed with him to remain in alliance with the Romans; but their continual partiality to her in all their domestic quarrels, at last determined him to quit this shameful alliance, and leave his wife, with whom he was so justly disgusted, to pursue her fortune with the Romans. The enraged queen, relying on the services she had done them, and imagining herself secure in their protection, soon proceeded to give fresh proofs of her infamous disposition: her husband's brother and kinsmen were put to death at her instigation, which so exasperated the neighbouring states, that they entered into an alliance with Venutius; and she found herself attacked at once by a powerful army, partly composed of her own subjects; and, to render herself still more odious to her subjects, she now admitted to her throne and bed a menial servant of her husband, whom she had long indulged a secret passion for, and had lately advanced to the rank of general of her army. This last step completed her ruin; she found herself universally abandoned by her subjects, and obliged wholly to depend on the assistance of the Romans, who fought an obstinate battle in her defence, and with great difficulty prevented her falling into the hands of her husband. Several slight engagements happened after this upon her account; but all that her allies could do was to guard her person; for as for her dominions, Venutius got possession of them with very little trouble, being invited to them by her own subjects.

* It is most probable that this was done with a view of making the Roman ladies appear as warlike, in the eyes of Caractacus and his family, as the British heroines, who often led armies to the field, and sustained all the dangers and fatigues of war.

During these transactions, Didius, the Roman general, died of extreme old age, which had prevented his taking the field in person for some time before his death. He was succeeded in his command by Veranius, who was an officer of great reputation, and a man who meditated very important projects against the Britons, which, from his great success in other enterprizes, there was great reason to imagine he would have put in execution; but his ambitious views were all frustrated by his death, which happened before he had performed any memorable exploit on the island: so that his vain-glorious boast in his will, that, if he had lived two years longer, he would have reduced Britain to a Roman province, reflected little honour on his memory. Suetonius Paulinus was nominated to succeed him as governor of Britain*. The people of Rome entertained the most flattering hopes of this general's success, who had already distinguished himself in a very singular manner, being the first Roman that had passed Mount Atlas, and carried an army to the banks of the Niger, being superior in the art of war to most men of his age, and having no equal but Corbulo, whose late conquests in Armorica served as a spur to Suetonius, who was determined to eclipse his reputation by performing more meritorious exploits in Britain. The first two years of his government he spent in reducing the Ordovices and the Silures, and in fortifying his frontiers; and his army lying in North-Wales, the country of the Ordovices, he determined to subdue the Isle of Anglesey, which was the chief seat of the British Druids, and a common asylum for the enemies of Rome, by which it was become very populous: this island is separated from the main-land by a very narrow channel which flows from the sea. He transported his infantry over this stream on a sort of wicker-boats, great plenty of which he found in the country†; while his cavalry partly forded it, and in some places were obliged to swim over it. On his landing he found the rude islanders, who were most devoted to the superstitions of their religion, drawn upon the shore in order of battle, their women running up and down in a distracted manner, with their hair dishevelled, and lighted torches in their hands, and with them the Druids, pouring out the most bitter imprecations, and with uplifted hands imploring the vengeance of heaven on their adversaries. This uncommon spectacle struck a panic into the Roman troops, who at first stood motionless and transfixed with horror, while the enemy sent a shower of darts amongst them, which did great execution. At length, recovering from their confusion by the remonstrances of their leaders, who represented to them the shame of being appalled by women and priests, they furiously charged the natives sword in hand; and, after a short resistance, became masters of the island. Suetonius, probably in detestation of their horrid sacrifices, which were universally known, threw the Druids into the very fires they had prepared for the prisoners they expected to take in battle; and, sensible that the Roman affairs could not prosper while this diabolical superstition remained, he pulled up and demolished the sacred groves, overturned their altars, and at once destroyed every mark of Druidism on the island. He then appointed a strong garrison, and ordered them to erect forts for the defence of this conquest, while he returns on a sudden with his army to settle an affair of the last importance, which threatened inevitable destruction to, and a total extinction of, the Roman power in Britain.

The avaritious and cruel disposition of Nero, and of his confident Seneca, had given rise to several innovations in the government of Britain, which the inhabitants were strangers to under the administration of Claudius, whose moderation had won the hearts of the Britons. Cruel and oppressive taxes were imposed, and the emperor's officers committed so many violences and extortions in collecting them, that the whole kingdom groaned under the weight of these grievances, from which event those provinces that had formed the earliest alliances with the Romans, were not excepted. Upon the least failure of payment they proceeded to military execution; and the natives were turned out of their habitations on the most frivolous pretences, to make room for the legionary troops. Usurers were permitted to lend them money on the most disadvantageous terms to pay their taxes with, and were authorized to seize their goods and cattle, if they were not punctually repaid. These acts of tyranny raised a general spirit of resentment, and made the whole nation ripe for a revolt; when an incident happened that at once kindled into a flame the long-concealed sparks of vengeance.

Prasutagus, king of the Iceni, to secure the protection and favour of Nero to his family, on his death-bed bequeaths his immense treasures to the emperor and his two daughters as joint-heirs. This piece of domestic policy had a contrary effect from that he intended, and proved fatal to his whole family; for no sooner was Prasutagus interred, than Catus Decianus, Nero's procurator-general, under pretence of taking possession of his master's legacy, seized upon all his effects in general in Nero's name, and suffered his dominions to fall a prey to the avarice and licentiousness of the Roman centurions. Boadicea, his widow, being a woman of great spirit and personal bravery, warmly remonstrated against these proceedings, and loudly complained of the injustice done to herself and her daughters: her complaints, instead of procuring redress, exasperated the procurator to such a degree, that he ordered her a punishment far more infamous in those days than death itself; he caused her to be publicly scourged, while the chastity of her two daughters was violated by the common soldiers. This tyrannous act of uncommon brutality and indignity to the wife and daughters of a great king, gave the alarm to the whole island; and that bond of union which had been so long cancelled, is once more revived. All private animosities being laid aside, the allies as well as the professed enemies of the Romans, in a word, the whole body of the people, combining to espouse the cause of this injured queen and her daughters, they soon raised a most formidable army*, which was headed by the brave Boadicea herself, who, animated with an ardent desire of revenge, exhorts the Iceni, her subjects, to take the advantage of the Roman general's absence, and to free themselves from slavery by putting their oppressors to the sword. Having intelligence that the brave Venutius was ready to join in the revolt, and that the Trinobantes were in arms, Boadicea thought it high time to break into action; and accordingly falls upon the Roman colony at Camelodunum, which was more carefully embellished than fortified: the garrison was surprised and put to the sword, after which a general massacre ensued, and continued for some days throughout the Roman province, when the most unheard-of cruelties were committed, and the most uncommon punishments invented to satiate the vengeance of an incensed people. Having totally destroyed this colony, and put the whole ninth legion of the Roman infantry to the sword, and finding that the general was at too great a distance to send any immediate succour to the distressed people, they continued their ravages, spreading universal devastation over the whole country, and practising every species of cruelty in every town that was subject to the Roman power; and having, in the course of this expedition, sacrificed about twenty thousand of the enemy, they at length suspended their resentment, and, after destroying Verulam, a very famous Roman municipium, they retired with immense booty to their different habitations.

But though this formidable army was thus in a manner disbanded, yet the confederacy was kept alive, and such early intelligence given to the several powers of every motion of the Roman army, that we shall find it was ready to take the field again at very short notice; for information being sent to Suetonius of the depredations already committed by the Britons, he laid aside his military operations in the Isle of Anglesey, the chief residence of the Druids, and with all expedition marched to London, rightly conjecturing that this furious commencement of hostilities was only the prelude to a general insurrection. On the first news of his approach, the confederate army of Britons was speedily assembled, and took the field under the conduct of the undaunted Boadicea, making forced marches towards London, with an intent to block up Suetonius in that city, or to attack him before he could receive any reinforcement from the small body of troops he had brought with him from the north. But the Roman general, finding the city of London was not tenable, had retired soon after his arrival to the Surry side, where his little army was soon increased to the number of ten thousand, through the fidelity of the Belgic colonies to the Roman government: they likewise furnished him with provisions and all other military accommodations. The Britons, finding London abandoned, pillaged, and destroyed, and attributing the retirement of Suetonius to a false cause, construed it a precipitate flight; and Boadicea, flushed with her past success, having put to the sword one part of the Roman army commanded by Petilius Cerealis, and impressed such a dread of the valour of her troops on the mind of Poenius Posthumus, the commander of the second legion, that he durst not stir out of his camp, though Suetonius had sent him express orders to join the main body in Surry, was so elated with the hopes of victory, and confided so entirely on the superiority, as well as the bravery, of her troops, that she resolved to attack the Romans without loss of time. The Roman general, on the other hand, aware of the enterprising spirit of Boadicea, and sensible that an insatiable thirst of vengeance in the breast of an incensed woman, at the head of such a formidable army, would carry her beyond the bounds of discretion, and urge her to acts of imprudent impetuosity, posted his men in such a situation as might best enable them to sustain the fury of the first onset with unbroken ranks: and, for this purpose, he chose a spot of ground accessible only by a narrow lane, having a large wood in his rear; thus prudently securing a retreat, in case he should be overpowered by numbers, and freeing himself from all apprehensions of ambuscades, the Britons being obliged to draw up in an open plain, and to attack the van of the Roman army, in front, at the entrance of the defile. To this conduct of the Roman general the victory which followed may chiefly be ascribed; for the Britons, on the contrary, were so confident of gaining the day, that, neglecting to provide for a retreat, which indeed they seem to have thought unnecessary, they blocked up the rear of their army with a number of carriages brought thither to carry off the booty after the engagement, and, till then, to contain their wives and families, whom they had induced to become spectators of the horrid vengeance they meditated.

Before the engagement began, Boadicea drove through the ranks of her army in an open chariot, accompanied by her two daughters; and, addressing herself to the heads of every tribe, harangued them with the most powerful female elocution, representing the insults she and her daughters had sustained in the most moving and pathetic terms; at the same time assuring them, that the desire of revenging her own injuries was the least motive that induced her to attack the Romans, but that the universal slavery that was preparing for her brave subjects, who were threatened with a total deprivation of their liberty, and with being subjected to all manner of insults and oppressions, had called her to the field, where she was determined nobly to fall in the defence of the liberty of her country, if she failed of obtaining the victory.

Suetonius, who was an experienced general, did not fail on his part to harangue his troops on this important occasion; and, in the most powerful terms, to animate his men to set at nought the superior numbers of an undisciplined force, headed by a weak, ambitious, tyrannical woman, he represented to them the glory they would acquire, being so few in number, by quelling such a dangerous and general insurrection, supported by so powerful an army: he recalled to their memory frequent instances wherein the good discipline and personal bravery of an handful of Romans, had proved successful against great superiority of numbers; and by such arguments as these, which never failed to stimulate the veterans, he raised such a spirit of emulation in his little army, that he soon found them eager for the attack, and therefore gave the signal for engaging.

particularly the Trinobantes, Brigantes, and the Caledonians, was augmented to two hundred and thirty thousand.

The Britons made the first discharge with their darts, the fury of which the Romans sustained with great intrepidity, and without breaking their ranks; but as soon as the first onset was over, the fourteenth legion sallied from the defile, and being followed by the auxiliaries, engaged the Britons in the open plain, and soon penetrated their ranks, which threw them into great confusion; and, though they maintained a long and obstinate engagement, all hopes of victory were totally lost the moment their ranks were broke; for the preserving them entire was the only part of military discipline they had perfectly copied from the Romans. To add to this disaster, a fatal dispute arose between Boadicea and Venutius, general of the Trinobantes, who were the best Troops in the British army*, concerning the order of battle; Venutius positively refusing to pursue those measures the queen judged most expedient, and which appear to have been dictated by rage and disappointment, whereas those proposed by Venutius were consistent with the experience and coolness of a great general. The dispute at length grew so warm, that Venutius, finding his orders were disobeyed, owing to their being countermanded by the queen, suddenly drew off the Trinobantes, and, making a safe and quiet retreat, left the unfortunate Boadicea to support the heat of the day, who, thus deserted, soon yielded the victory to the Roman general. Her army being put to flight, suffered great slaughter in the pursuit, the carriages in the rear impeding the retreat; so that there fell on this fatal day no less than eighty thousand men; and when those who had escaped the pursuit were preparing, with undaunted courage, to hazard a second engagement, they had the mortification to find that all was irretrievably lost; for the unhappy queen, dreading the insults of the Romans to herself and daughters, if they should be taken prisoners, and well knowing that she could expect no mercy, put an end to her wretched life by poison; and, much about the same time, Pœnius Posthumus, touched with remorse at his cowardly behaviour in refusing to join Suetonius, and sensibly mortified at losing all pretensions to sharing the glory of the day, fell on his sword.

The unexpected death of Boadicea, joined to the prudent conduct of the Roman general, soon caused a total dispersion of the British forces; for seeing themselves exposed to the fury of Suetonius, who by this time had assembled all his legions, in order to give a speedy and total overthrow to their insurrections, for being without a leader, each tribe thought only of its own safety, or how to avoid the pursuits of the enemy's detached parties, who desolated the country, and put all to the sword without distinction; thus repaying the outrageous cruelty of a furious woman, who, in the pursuit of a just reparation for the greatest insults, when her revenge was indulged, knew not how to set bounds to her fury, but was guilty of greater acts of inhumanity, cruelty, and oppression, than those for which she sought redress; and at last fell a sacrifice to her own vain-glorious and presumptuous confidence.

The Britons were now reduced to the utmost distress; for the Romans carried off all their cattle; and being almost totally ignorant of the art of agriculture, and having, from the ill-grounded confidence of Boadicea, entirely neglected it during the war, imagining that the possession of the Roman magazines would amply supply all their wants, they now became exposed to a severe famine, which contributed more than the arms of the Romans to extinguish all hopes of assembling a new army: but even in this distressed situation they refused to lay down their arms, wandering up and down the country in small parties, and refusing to sue for peace. This obstinacy being partly owing to their apprehensions of suffering the most cruel treatment from Suetonius, who, since the insurrection, had exercised great cruelties towards them; the procurator Julius Classicianus, who had been sent over on the desertion of Catus, whose oppressive measures first gave rise to the insurrection, wrote to Rome for a new governor, as the only method to put an end to the war. Upon this, the emperor immediately sent over Polyclethus, to enquire into the state of affairs; and on his arrival he found that a dispute between Suetonius and the procurator had occasioned the application to Rome for a new governor, and that there was little or no just complaint against the legate. But as he had rendered himself particularly odious to the Britons, by the destruction of the Druids, he thought it most adviseable to have him recalled; and, therefore, though he represented matters to the emperor on his return in the most favourable light for Suetonius, yet it was determined to remove him, and Petronius Turpilianus, whose consulship was to expire with the year, was sent to Britain, where he arrived in the beginning of the year 62; and, by the mildness of his administration, and his personal affability, soon affected what the legions of Suetonius could not accomplish, though they were kept constantly in the field; for, instead of harrassing them by military executions, and reviving their resentment by fresh injuries, he suffered them to enjoy unmolested repose, till at length their rage abated; and those provinces, which had been subject to the Roman government before the grand insurrection, returned quietly to their former state of slavery, giving up all hopes of recovering their liberty.

* This Venutius, who is scarcely mentioned by our modern historians, was a very able commander, and, being a man of great influence, had contributed more to the augmentation of the confederacy than any other general, having brought over several of the tribes, besides the Trinobantes, of which he was chief; and it is most probable that he was little inferior to, if he did not even share the command of the whole army with, Boadicea.

The amiable conduct of Turpilianus met with universal applause at Rome, to which place he returned in 65, leaving Britain in a tranquil state, having settled all disputes with the Icenæ, and other revolted provinces, and renewed a friendly league with those that remained unsubjected to the Roman power. On his arrival at Rome, triumphal honours were decreed him; and it was found by experience, that moderation and lenity had a better effect on the Britons than persecution and tyranny. Tribellius Maximus, a man nearly equal in temper and disposition to Turpilianus, was appointed to succeed him, and the same happy consequences were derived from his prudent administration; but unhappily he was too strongly inclined to avarice and indolence, which engaged him in a fatal dispute with Roscius Cælius, who, with several other Roman officers, loudly complained of the conduct of the prætor; accusing him of suffering the army to remain in a state of total inactivity, while he attended only to the properest means of amassing riches; and declaring, that the glory of the Roman name was sunk into the greatest contempt in Britain, from the indolence of the troops, and their not attempting any new conquests on the island. The discontent at length became general, the whole army revolted, and offered the command to Cælius; upon which defection Tribellius, thinking his life in danger, fled to Vitellius, who was at the head of the Roman army in Germany.

This event happened in the year 67, and the following year Nero, who was become the scourge of mankind, and had been guilty of the most impious and cruel murders in his own family and in the state, fell a sacrifice to the just vengeance of offended Heaven, putting an end to his detested life with his own hands: he was succeeded in the empire by Galba, during whose short reign, and that of his successor Otho, nothing passed in Britain worthy of record. Vitellius, having ascended the imperial throne after Otho, sent Vectius Bolanus to Britain to take command of the army, which had been under the conduct of Tribunes only, amongst whom Cælius was acknowledged chief from the time that Tribellius absconded. The new governor, being unskilled in the art of war, suffered the Britons to enjoy further repose: he applied himself to cultivating a good understanding with his army, whose affections he entirely gained, and enjoyed the felicity of a quiet administration, till Vespasian, on the demise of Vitellius, succeeded to the empire, who immediately recalled him, and sent over Petilius Cerealis, who being an active man, and fond of military glory, extended the Roman conquests by subduing the Brigantes, inhabiting the province of Yorkshire. Julius Frontinus succeeded him; and, having the same warlike disposition, he attacked and defeated the Silures, who inhabited the counties of Hereford and Monmouth.

About the year 78, and towards the close of Vespasian's reign, the famous Julius Agricola was appointed to the government of Britain in the room of Frontinus; and all our historians stand indebted for an account of his remarkable administration to that excellent writer Tacitus, whose life of Agricola is justly esteemed a work of great veracity and elegance: from him, therefore, we shall select the amplest accounts of the British wars during this period.

Agricola was no stranger among the Britains; he had served against them under Suetonius and Cerealis with great reputation, which he now determined to augment; and therefore took the field, soon after his arrival, on the following occasion: The Ordovices, who dwelt in the mountainous part of Denbighshire and Flintshire, just before he landed had surprised and cut to pieces a body of the Roman horse stationed on their frontiers. This sudden commencement of hostilities had greatly alarmed the Romans, and made them expect the arrival of a new governor with the utmost impatience. Affairs being in this situation, Agricola, though the summer was far advanced and the cohorts lay dispersed in different parts of the country, not imagining they should be called on duty so late in the year, bravely resolved to meet the danger; and assembling the legions and the auxiliaries with all possible speed, he marched against the Ordovices, pursued them to their strong holds, and finding they would not venture to descend into the plain and come to a fair engagement, he, to encourage his army, led the van, and was the first that ascended the mountains; and, by this bold and hazardous enterprize, he so surprised the enemy, who imagined these hills were inaccessible, that they made but a faint resistance. Agricola, having put great numbers to the sword, laid waste their country, and advanced to the Isle of Anglesey, to complete the conquest which Paulinus had partly finished when he was called off by the general insurrection of the Britons; and, finding himself at a loss for ships, his policy found out an immediate and successful remedy; for, having in his army some cohorts of auxiliaries who were used to swimming over large rivers completely armed, he commanded them to lead the way; and they pointing out the shoal water, the rest of the army, finding the passage was fordable, readily followed. The inhabitants, seeing themselves so suddenly invaded, took to flight, soon after sued for peace, and surrendered the whole island, in the month of October, A. D. 79*.

Thus Agricola, at the end of summer, and at a season when it is customary to close the campaign, put an end to the revolt of the Ordovices, and subdued Anglesey, the principal retreat of all the British malecontents; and, returning full of glory from this famous expedition, to add to his reputation, he applied himself to the milder arts of peace; and, during the winter, he made himself master of the tempers and dispositions of the people he was to govern. He began his civil administration by acts of clemency, justice, and impartiality; and was particularly careful to reform the discipline of his army, and to restrain the licentiousness of his troops, that no fresh cause of dispute might arise from their insolence and oppression, as had been the case under his predecessors. Neither did he advance base-born men to places of trust or confidence, or

* The place where they passed the channel which divides Anglesey from Carnarvonshire, is imagined to be from Llanvair Point in that county, to the south-west of Llanidan church in Anglesey, where the water at lowest ebb is not more than two fathoms in the deepest part; and when the sands lodge on the edges of the rocks, which frequently happens, it is fordable without much difficulty.

give ear to partial recommendations; but resolutely, without shewing any favour or affection, elected the most worthy to the great offices of state. He narrowly examined into the infant state of the police, and particularly gained the affections of the Britons, by causing the supplies of corn to be levied with equality, and by taking away the exactions and exorbitant fees of the collectors of the tribute, whose demands were often heavier than the tribute itself. The redressing these grievances in his first year, gave the people a high opinion of their new governor, and contributed much more than the force of arms to make the Britons in love with peace, which in former times they had found to be as oppressive as war.

Having thus, by the most prudent precautions, paved the way to further success, in the beginning of the spring he made frequent incursions into those provinces that still remained unsubdued, and by harassing and alarming them at intervals, and then inviting them to submit by every possible allurements, he, by degrees, engaged several capital cities to receive Roman garrisons, and to send him hostages; and in this manner, partly by persuasion, and partly by the fame of his military achievements, he subdued the whole island at the end of this summer's campaign. Winter setting in, he once more applied himself to domestic regulations, and took every necessary step to secure the obedience of his subjects, and to familiarize them to the Roman manners and customs. To this end he first erected temples, courts of judicature, and other public buildings; then encouraged the building of private houses, raising a general emulation to this laudable undertaking by rewarding the active and diligent, and by discountenancing and punishing the slothful and indolent. He also caused them to educate the sons of their chiefs in the liberal arts, and took care to prefer the rising genius of the Britons to the established abilities of the Romans, which made them impatient to acquire elocution and politeness; and thus, in a short time, the Roman language, and then the Roman habit, became in fashion with the Britons. In the third year of Agricola's administration, they began to cherish all the Roman voluptuousness, frequenting their baths and banquets: and thus they buried, in the grave of luxury, all remembrance of their former liberty and independency, as well as of their native simplicity and integrity.

This year, A. D. 81. the emperor Vespasian died, and Titus succeeding, confirmed Agricola in his government of Britain, who, being thus secured in his office under a new master, once more turned his thoughts to military operations, and opened the campaign by a new expedition to the north, wastring all before him till he came to the frith of the river Tay, in Scotland, which has Fife to the south, and Angus to the north. The terror of his name struck such an universal panic, that though his army was quite harassed out by forced marches and tempestuous weather, they durst not attack him, but permitted him to build fortresses and castles for the security of his conquests; and so great was the skill of his engineers, or so unpractised in the military art were his opponents, that it is said no fort or castle erected by him was either forced, surrendered, or quitted as untenable. By occasional sallies from these forts, his garrisons, which were well supplied, and often reinforced, kept the enemy in continual alarms, and rendered their condition truly deplorable.

The fourth year of his government he spent in reviewing his conquests, and providing for their security against any sudden assault from the enemy; having, for this purpose, a chain of forts which fixed the boundaries of his new acquisitions between the Tweed and the two friths of Glota and Bodotria, now called the friths of Dunbritton and Edinburgh: but the insatiable thirst of glory, which ever animated the breasts of the Roman heroes, was not to be confined within any limits, nor would suffer one spot of ground, if possible, to remain unconquered. It is no wonder, therefore, that his fifth campaign, A. D. 83, and the first of the reign of Domitian, should be opened by further inroads into Scotland, where he subdued some small tribes of so little note, that their very name and situation was unknown to the Romans till they had subdued them; yet these have been dignified with the title of nations by some modern historians. Having left suitable garrisons in this country, situated opposite the coasts of Ireland, he meditated an attempt on that island, by the advice of a banished prince, to whom he had given protection, and who furnished him in return with all necessary intelligence concerning the state of the country: but this design was not carried into execution; for, in his sixth campaign, fearing a general insurrection of the Caledonians, now called the Scotch, or North-Britons*, who assembled on the shore of the frith of Bodotria, opposite the Roman forts, he sent out a fleet of galleys to coast along the shore, and to make discoveries of the creeks and friths in those parts; and at the same time that the appearance of this fleet filled the enemy with terror, it served to animate his own troops, who were pleased with the frequent communications they had with their fleet in a country they had but little knowledge of. The Scotch, imagining that all would be lost by the discovery of their seas, if they should once be worsted by the Romans, attacked their forts in despair; and some of Agricola's officers, having received exaggerated accounts of the enemy's number, through fear advised the general to retreat to England, and be content with his conquests on this side the friths; but, rejecting their advice, he only divided his army into three bodies, that he might not be surrounded by the superior number of the Scotch, and then lay in his camp to receive them. The Scotch, having intelligence of this disposition of the Roman army, fell suddenly upon the advanced guard of the ninth legion, and having put them to the sword, broke into the camp, and fought with great bravery within the trenches. When Agricola received intelligence of this action, he marched up to them with his own division, which consisted of the flower of the army, and commanded them to fall on the rear; while the assailed Romans, re-animated by this timely reinforcement, instead of giving way, as they had done before the arrival of their general, sallied out on the enemy's front. Thus the fortune of the day was totally changed, and victory, which for many hours had favoured the Scotch, now declared for the Romans; and if the Scotch had not found a secure retreat in the neighbouring woods and bogs, it is more than probable they would have been totally subdued.

This defeat, however great it was, served only to rouse the spirit of liberty, and to determine the whole Scotch nation to enter into a general association against the invaders of their country, and to bind themselves by the most solemn adjurations, attended with religious ceremonies, to support each other to the last extremity in defence of the common cause; and, having once entered into this confederacy, they sent their wives and children to remote towns, and, without loss of time, assembled a more powerful army than the first. Agricola, not thinking it prudent to hazard a second general engagement, affairs remained in this situation till the next campaign, A. D. 85.

In the mean time a cohort of German auxiliaries deserted from the Roman camp, having first slain a Roman officer and some soldiers that were appointed to discipline them; and seizing on three small galleys, they killed one of the pilots, and compelled the others to steer for Germany; but having forgot, in the hurry of their elopement, to supply themselves with provisions, they were soon reduced to great distress, and were obliged to kill some of their comrades for support. In this terrible situation it is thought they lost their pilots; for the survivors, being totally ignorant of navigation, after sailing round Britain, were at length driven ashore on the coasts of Friesland, where they were bought and sold again, till at last, in the course of traffick, they fell into the hands of their old masters, being brought to the Roman camp, where they confirmed an opinion, not yet well established, that Britain was an island, and in consideration of their adventures were pardoned.

As soon as the spring opened, Agricola renewed his military operations by sending his fleet before him, with orders to land sometimes in different places occasionally, and so to spread an alarm along the coasts of Scotland, and to distract and terrify them by the uncertainty of knowing where the principal attack was intended; while he himself, with the choicest of his troops, advanced by hasty marches to the Grampian mountains, where the Scotch army was assembled, consisting of thirty thousand effective men, besides a great number of hearty old men, who had joined them as volunteers. This formidable body was headed by Galgacus, a person of the first rank, and no less distinguished for his personal bravery, military experience, and pathetic eloquence. On seeing the Romans advance, he, according to the custom of the times, harangued his troops, and chiefly represented to them, that the issue of the ensuing battle would be the recovery of their freedom, or perpetual slavery; for, that being on the skirts of the island, there was no security in retreat, if vanquished, and consequently no hope remaining, but that of obtaining a complete victory.

Agricola, on the other hand, seeing his men eager for action, only reminds them, in order to encrease their ardour, that, in case of a defeat, the Roman power would be so shaken in Britain, they would be under a necessity of soliciting relief from those who had been subject to their victorious arms for near half a century. His next caution was to draw up his army in such a manner, that the auxiliaries should sustain the first onset, thereby to prevent, as much as possible, the effusion of Roman blood: the legions he placed in the rear, to support the auxiliaries, in case they were overpowered, or to complete the victory, if they gained the advantage. Galgacus very artfully extended his line of battle along the sides of the mountains, that his whole army being exposed to view, might terrify the Romans by the superiority of its numbers. The battle that ensued was fierce and obstinate, and for some time greatly in favour of Galgacus; which being perceived by Agricola, he quitted his horse and fought on foot at the head of the legions, who, with two cohorts of Batavians, and the same number of Tungrians, closed in upon the enemy, and engaged them sword in hand; by which means their javelins, with which they were very expert, became useless, and as their swords were unwieldy and totally unfit for close fighting, they soon gave ground. The Romans, without giving the enemy time to rally, having once broke through their foremost battalions, intrepidly ascended the hills; and the Scotch cavalry retreating at the same time, they endeavoured to terrify the Romans by driving their chariots furiously into their ranks: but this had little effect on account of the unevenness of the ground; while Agricola, finding that a body of infantry, who were posted at the top of the hill as a corps de reserve, and had not yet engaged, were forming a design to surround him, detached four squadrons of horse, who not only prevented this attempt, but entirely routed them; and then, falling upon those that remained in the plain, a terrible slaughter ensued, and compleated the victory; for Galgacus, finding it impossible to rally his scattered forces, made the best retreat he could by favour of the night. The Scotch lost ten thousand men in this fatal engagement; the Romans only three hundred and forty, and but one officer of note. The scene of desolation which ensued is most movingly set forth, even by Roman authors; the poor dispersed islanders, in the bitterness of despair, setting fire to their huts, and massacring their wives and children, that they might not be carried into captivity, which they dreaded more than death. So strong was the innate love of liberty in the breasts of a people, whose manners were uncivilized, and who, in other respects, were little better than savages.

This victory proved no less fatal to Agricola, than to the unhappy Scotch; for Domitian, grown jealous of the great reputation he had acquired, recalled him on pretence of promoting him to the government of Syria, but in reality to cut him off, which he soon after effected by poison, though, the better to conceal his horrid villainy, he solicited and obtained a decree of the senate to erect his statue crowned with laurel. Thus died this renowned and accomplished general, this adored governor of Britain, who has been so highly extolled by all writers, from Tacitus to the present time, while the names of Petronius Turpilianus, and of Tribellius Maximus, are held in contempt, and branded with cowardice; because they suffered a people, already most cruelly and unjustly oppressed, to live in peaceful subjection to their ambitious masters, masters ; while the other, for spreading desolation and slaughter throughout an extensive country, for the honour of imperial Rome, is dignified with the title of Hero, and has statues erected to his memory : but let those who live in these days of real liberty and equal humanity, who read history for instruction, mark the event, and shun the common opinion of mankind with respect to such characters—the famous victor and oppressor expires under similar agonies to those he has inflicted on others, and falls a sacrifice to that ambition which led him on to conquest ; while the others, according to the course of nature, end their days in peace.

Lucullus succeeded Agricola in the government of Britain, A. D. 86, and was put to death on the island, by order of the same emperor, for giving the name of Lucullians to a new-invented spear that had been introduced into the army ; and from this time, to the arrival of the emperor Adrian in Britain, A. D. 121, including a period of thirty years, a profound silence is observed by the Roman historians concerning the affairs of this country, probably because no memorable battles, no new incursions, no extension of the Roman conquests, happened during this æra, and the unhappy Britons enjoyed a few years lenity and tranquillity.

Adrian's visit to Britain proceeded from intelligence he had received, that the North-Britons were in arms, who, on his arrival, quitted the Roman territories they had invaded on the south side of the friths, and retreated to their own country. The emperor, notwithstanding, determines to pursue them, and advances as far as York, where he was received by some old officers, who had served under Agricola, and who gave him such a dreadful account of Scotland, setting forth all the horrors of marching and fighting in the midst of bogs and mountains, that he immediately quitted all further thoughts of this expedition, and prudently resolved to enlarge the Scotch boundaries, and to endeavour to pacify them by tokens of his favour, rather than by force of arms. For this purpose he erected a wall, or rampart of earth, extending from the mouth of the Tyne to Solway Frith, including the space of eighty miles from east to west. Having covered it with turf, and placed a proper guard along the whole line, he judged this a sufficient protection and security to his people against the sudden incursions of the Scotch. Soon after he returned to Rome, and was flattered by his courtiers with the title of Restorer of Britain ; which was added on his coin to his other titles.

Some acts of cruelty committed by the inhabitants of the North in their last incursion, had given birth to an implacable enmity betwixt them and the South Britons ; and finding, after Adrian's departure, that his rampart was not sufficient to restrain their fury, but that they frequently renewed their hostile irruptions, the South Britons submitted to learn the Roman discipline under Priscus Lucinius, the proprætor, and conformed to the laws and usages of the Romans, as well civil as military.

The emperor Adrian died on the 10th of July, A. D. 138, and was succeeded by Antoninus Pius, who, like his predecessor, was more solicitous to preserve than to enlarge his dominions ; and finding that the North Britons had began their usual inroads, by breaking down the rampart in several places, he ordered Lollius Urbicus to go over and put a stop to their proceedings, and also to quell the insurrection of the Brigantes, who had formed the design of shaking off the Roman yoke. Having reduced these to their former obedience, he marched to the North, and there erected another wall stronger than the former, being of stone instead of earth, covered with turf, and extending from the frith of Forth to the frith of Clyde ; so that the consequence of these new irruptions was, that the Scotch were now confined within narrower limits than those assigned them by Adrian. Some faint remains of this wall are still to be seen *. The tranquil state of Britain being once more established, Antoninus had the title of Britannicus conferred on him for the wise regulations of his general, though he had never seen the island himself.

From this time, A. D. 140, to the death of Marcus Aurelius, who succeeded Antoninus Pius, and died himself in March 180, the island was free from any material commotions, and nothing memorable was transacted during this period ; but when the cruel Commodus succeeded his virtuous father Aurelius, new insurrections and tumults took place ; for the inhabitants of the North finding, by common report, that the emperor was not only given up to every kind of voluptuousness, but was likewise of a cowardly, indolent temper, thought this a proper opportunity for some bold enterprize ; and accordingly they made a breach in Antoninus's wall near one of the principal forts. Having entered it, they cut the Roman garrison in pieces, though commanded by an experienced general ; and, by this means forcing a passage for their whole army, the contiguous stations were abandoned by the Romans ; and the North Britons, marching directly southward, made such dreadful havock, that Britain, in all probability, would have been lost to Rome in a short time, if the emperor had not sent over Ulpius Marcellus, a general of great reputation, with all expedition. This active commander soon put an end to the war by his great military skill ; and, having severely chastised the revolted, he revived the discipline of the Roman army, which being sunk into a state of licentiousness and indolence, joined to the bad character of the emperor, had laid the foundation of the bold attempt of the people of the North : but the prudent conduct of this general soon restored it to its antient strictness, and these good services had well nigh cost Marcellus his life ; for the emperor, envying his success, not only deprived him of his government, but was on the point of putting him to death.

After the departure of Marcellus, the army

* It has been called by some writers Severus's Wall, but with no propriety ; for Severus was recalled almost as soon as he had set foot on the island, in the first year of Adrian, who immediately came over in person. Most of our historians are crowded with large notes, and ample quotations, concerning the disposition, thickness, appurtenances, &c. of this wall ; but, for such particulars as these, we refer the lovers of antiquity to Horsley's Brit. Rom. which work so frequently interrupts the narrations of our best writers of the English history.

mutinied, because Perennis, a favourite of the emperor, discarded the veteran officers, and gave their command to his own creatures; and they carried their resentment so far, that, having selected fifteen hundred of the legionary troops to present their complaints to the emperor, they sent them to Rome. Being met by the emperor without the city, they told him they were come to inform him of the dangerous design of Perennis, who was conspiring to dethrone him, and to make his own son emperor. This accusation Commodus was disposed to believe, and therefore instantly gave up Perennis to the soldiers, who put him to death on the spot. At the same time, it being judged expedient to send a person of some authority to Britain, to suppress the mutinous disposition of the army, Pertinax, who afterwards succeeded to the empire, was appointed to this office: he determining to act with rigour, and punish severely the ringleaders of the mutiny, tho' the ninth legion obstinately refused to submit. In the skirmish which ensued on this occasion, Pertinax was dangerously wounded, and escaped only by being left on the spot among the dead: yet, notwithstanding this bold sedition, he persisted till he had gained his point; and then, desiring to be recalled, Clodius Albinus was ordered to relieve him; who, incurring the displeasure of Commodus, was soon removed, and the government given to Julius Severus. Pertinax ascending the throne after the death of Commodus, who was strangled by Narcissus, A. D. 193, Albinus is once more made governor of Britain, in which post he was continued by Julian, the successor of Pertinax; and he so thoroughly won the affections of his army, that on Julian's death they proclaimed him emperor. Septimius Severus in Pannonia, and Pescennius Niger in Syria, having the same honour conferred on them by their respective armies, Severus, who lay nearest to Rome, hastened thither to receive the confirmation of his dignity from the senate, whose decree in his favour he readily obtained; notwithstanding which the other two persisted in their claims, and prepared to defend them to the last extremity. Severus made use of great policy on this occasion; for his rivals being at the two extremities of the empire, he imagined, that while he marched against one, the other would make a considerable progress, and gain great advantage. He therefore sent an embassy to Albinus in Britain, offering to share with him the imperial dignity. His offer being accepted, he collected his whole force, and marched against Pescennius Niger, whom he vanquished and slew; after which he immediately formed designs on the life of Albinus. His first attempt was to assassinate him by villains, whom he sent to Britain on that base errand; but failing in this, he came to an open rupture, and, without any just pretence, declared Albinus an enemy to the state, and marched against him with a formidable army, which had been greatly increased by the troops of Niger, who came over to him on the death of their general. Albinus, being at this time in Gaul, determined to wait for him, and decide their dispute by an engagement, in which he was defeated, and slain on the spot. This battle is said to have been fought near Lyons in France, A. D. 196.

The victorious emperor, soon after this event, divided Britain into two governments, the Northern and the Southern; the latter was given to Heraclitus, and the former to Virius Lupus, who, finding himself continually harassed by the incursions of the Caledonians, at last bribed them into peaceable behaviour by a large sum of money. Thus all commotions subsided till the fifteenth year of Severus, when the Scotch, observing that the Roman army was grown effeminate through long inactivity and repeated debaucheries, broke the treaty they had made with Lupus; who, finding there was no end of bribing a people, who on the first opportunity took up their arms again, wrote to the emperor to inform him that it was absolutely necessary he should come over in person, or send such a formidable reinforcement to the northern provinces as might be sufficient to put an end to the repeated insurrections of these people, by the entire conquest of their country. Severus received this news with pleasure, being fond of military glory. Aged as he was, and afflicted with the gout, he immediately set off, travelling in a litter, bringing with him his two sons, Caracalla and Geta. The Scotch, on the first news of his arrival, send ambassadors to sue for peace, and to execute their former delinquency: but Severus, being determined to prosecute the war, detained the ambassadors on various pretences till he had made the necessary preparations for his expedition, and then dismissed them with an equivocal answer. Leaving his youngest son at London, he marches northwards, accompanied by Caracalla his eldest son. His first care on his arrival was to lay platforms of wood over the bogs and morasses, that his soldiers might have sure footing. In this hard duty they were greatly interrupted by the enemy, having frequent skirmishes with them; but, proving always victorious, he at last marched his army beyond the rivers, ramparts, and forts, which formed the boundaries of the Roman territories, and then passing the friths, he penetrated into Scotland, and forced these hardy people to submit to his mercy. Finding, however, that it would be impossible to keep them in continual subjection, without a considerable standing army, which could hardly find subsistence on such a barren spot amidst hills and uncultivated bogs and morasses, having in this expedition lost fifty thousand men, he determined to abandon the country, and content himself with forming a stronger barrier between them and his own people, than any that had been erected by his predecessors. Accordingly he built a new wall of stone, twelve feet high, and eight feet in thickness, as most authors agree; tho' some have confounded this wall with the rampart built by Lollius Urbicus. The most perfect and indubitable monument of antiquity is exhibited in the remains of this wall, which is now distinguished by the name of the Picts wall, because it separated them from the English. Having thus secured his frontiers, he retired to York, and left the command of his army to Caracalla; assuming, at the same time, the title of Britannicus Maximus. The emperor had no sooner quitted the army than Caracalla, whose disposition was naturally cruel, suffered the soldiers to make excursions beyond the wall, and to commit all sorts of outrages on the distressed Scots. This enraged them afresh, and obliged them to take up arms in their own defence. Severus being informed of this revolt, but not not of the true cause of it, was so provoked, that he rashly issued an order to fall upon them, and put all to the sword without distinction of age or sex: but he lived not to see his cruel orders executed; for he died soon after at York, and bequeathed his empire to his two sons. Caracalla, the eldest, was ambitious of reigning alone, and to that end used every artifice to engage the army to acknowledge him sole emperor; but finding them too strongly attached to his brother Geta, he dissembled for the present; and having, in concurrence with his brother, made peace with the North Britons, they received hostages, and returned together to Rome, taking with them the ashes of their father. At Rome, Caracalla found means to have his brother privately assassinated; and thus became sole possessor of the empire, A. D. 211. From which time, to the reign of Dioclesian, we have little or no account of the state of Britain; all that can be ascertained with any certainty is, that some of the thirty tyrants, who usurped the Roman empire during this period, had possession also of this island, the coins of several of them being found here in great abundance. Dioclesian, being saluted emperor by the eastern army, A. D. 284, gave the command of the Roman fleet, which was stationed at Boulogne in France, to Carausius, with orders to scour the coasts of France and Britain, and clear them of the piratical Franks and Saxons who continually infested them. Carausius, being a man of base extraction, but of an enterprising genius, soon cleared the coasts of these pirates, but retained the plunder he had taken from some, and the bribes he had received from others, to permit them to escape. Having by this means amassed great riches, he forgot his deputation, and refused to give any account of this treasure to the emperor's officers; upon which Maximilianus Herculus, who was at that time in France, and had lately been called to share the empire with Dioclesian, ordered that he should be seized and put to death; of which having received timely notice, instead of submitting to the authority of Maximilianus, he bribed the Roman army, got himself proclaimed emperor, landed on the coast of Britain, and took possession of it. Maximilianus immediately endeavoured to subdue him by force of arms, but without effect; for his party was too strong, and he was powerfully supported by the North-Britons; and therefore he was obliged to make peace with him, and permit him to enjoy the island in repose. In the year 291, the emperors Dioclesian and Maximilianus elected two assistants in the administration, by the name of Cæsars, which title was afterwards annexed to that of emperor: and Maximilianus, being determined to avenge himself on Carausius, sends Constantius, one of the new-made Cæsars, to Britain, giving him an army which he thought sufficient to reduce Carausius; but while he is making himself master of Boulogne, that he might have possession of a port from which he could easily transport himself to Britain, he receives intelligence that Carausius is slain by his bosom friend and companion Alectus, whom he had entrusted with the management of his affairs of state during his short reign, which lasted only seven years. The motive to this base assassination soon appeared to be no other than ambition; for he immediately assumed the purple, and prepared to prosecute the war against Constantius, who thereupon raises the siege of Boulogne, and lands in Britain, intending to expel the usurper before he has time to fortify himself, that his soldiers might have no hopes of retreat. He burnt his ships as soon as he had made good his landing, and coming up with the army of Alectus, he began the attack, and soon obtained a complete victory. Alectus being slain in the heat of the action by Asclepiodotus, the prætorian præfect, or captain of the emperor's guards*, the mercenary Franks, who composed the greatest part of Alectus's army, fled to London, which they plundered, and then put to sea, but were intercepted by a part of the Roman fleet, which had been separated from the rest by a fog, and who eased them of their booty, and put the greatest part of them to the sword. While these events happened in Britain, the two emperors, Dioclesian and Maximilianus resigned the empire on the same day, in favour of Galerius and Constantius: the government of Britain fell to the share of the latter, who was at this time on the island, and had shewed such clemency to the Britons, that they stiled him their deliverer. Under his government commerce was extended, the free exercise of the christian religion was permitted, the coasts were secured from the attempts of pirates; and therefore it is no wonder that he died universally regretted. A short time before his death, which happened at York, A. D. 307, his son Constantine arrived from Rome, and was received with great joy by his father and the whole army. Violent controversies have been maintained by different writers, concerning this Constantine, who afterwards became so famous in the world, some asserting that he was the legitimate, and others that he was only the natural, son of Constantius by Helena; but leaving this matter undecided, as it is to this day, let it suffice, that Constantius, in his life-time, named him his successor; and he was afterwards acknowledged emperor by the army and by the Britons, and was the inheritor of all his father's virtues.

Constantine the Great, for by this title he was distinguished on account of his great humanity, love of justice, exemplary piety and moderation, began his reign by a new kind of government, dividing the whole empire into four præfectures, or military governments, subject to four præfects of the prætorian band, or captains of his life-guard; each præfecture had fourteen provinces or counties, and they were called the præfectures of Italy, Gaul, now France, Illyria, and the East. Britain was subject to the præfect of France, who governed it by a vicarius, or deputy, whose name was Pacatianus. Constantine also divided Britain into three parts, naming all the country south of the Thames, Britannia prima; the country west of the Severn to the Irish sea, he called Britannia secunda; and all the rest eastward of the Severn, and lying north of the Thames was distinguished by the appellation of Maxima Cæsariensis, probably because some of the emperors had resided at York. These three divisions contained twenty eight capital cities, which afterwards became so many bishops sees; and the whole island at this time was subject to the military government of the præfect of France, whose deputies or officers of various denominations, such as receivers general of the emperor's tribute, a register, procurator, &c. were guilty of repeated extortions, and sought these employments only with a view of enriching themselves at the expence of the country, which was likewise drained of men to carry on the emperor's war against Magnentius, who seized on the greatest part of the empire; so that tho' the Britons were not at war with the Romans during the reign of Constantine, yet they were far from enjoying that repose which they had reason to expect from the great character of this emperor. He died A. D. 315, and left the empire by will to his three sons, assigning France, Spain, and Britain, to his eldest son Constantine; but he was taken off by his brother Constans, after a short reign of three years, who afterwards usurped these dominions; but was soon dispossessed of them by Magnentius, who caused him to be assassinated at Helena, near the Pyrænean mountains. Constantius, the third son, who reigned in the east, hearing of the untimely fate of his brothers, which gave him sole possession of the empire, directed his march to encounter Magnentius; and at length gave him such a total overthrow, that, in despair, he put an end to his life, A. D. 340.

After the death of Magnentius, Britain submitted to Constantius, who sent Martinus into the island as vicar of the præfect. He being greatly disturbed at the cruelty of Paulus Catena, whom the emperor had sent over in the time of Manentius, to observe what officers and soldiers revolted to him, and to prevent a general defection, openly took the people's part, and strongly persuaded Paulus to behave with great lenity, threatening him, in case of a refusal, to quit the island, and carry his complaints to Rome; who, fearing the consequence of this menace, artfully accused the vicar of a conspiracy against the emperor, which enraged him to such a degree, that he attempted to kill Paulus; and finding he had missed his aim, plunged his sword into his own breast, and expired. Soon after this event, Julian, known by the appellation of the apostate, from his falling off from the Christian faith, was declared Cæsar, by Constantius; and the government of France and Britain being allotted to him, he sent over Lupicinus to repel the insolence of the Picts and Scots, who were now grown quite outrageous, making continual incursions into the northern counties of England, and carrying off great spoils. Lupicinus embarked a considerable army at Boulogne, and landed after a favourable passage on the Kentish shore; from whence he marched to London, but was recalled before he reached the north, the Picts and Scots having sent deputies to Julian, at Paris, to appease his anger, and procure their pardon. Constantius dying of a fever in October, 362, bequeathed the empire to Julian; and from this period to the reign of Valentinian the First, we find nothing recorded concerning the affairs of Britain. In his reign the island was in a lamentable condition; for the Franks and Saxons invaded the sea-coasts opposite France, while the Picts and Scots ravaged the inland counties; the detachment Valentinian had sent to succour the inhabitants of the sea-coasts having been defeated, and their generals slain: so that the emperor found it necessary to send over Theodosius, a man of the first repute, with a formidable army of choice men, selected from the legions and cohorts, to put a stop to the devastations of the invaders: to these were added some Batavians, Hollanders, and other mercenary forces. Theodosius landed near Sandwich in Kent, and marched immediately to London, where he divided his army into several large bodies, and sent them out different ways, to intercept the enemies who were returning to their ships laden with spoils. The success was answerable to the design; the invaders were surprized in different parties, without being able to collect their forces, and totally routed, leaving behind them their plunder and their prisoners, the better to facilitate their escape. Theodosius generously restored the recovered effects to the distressed owners, reserving only a small portion to content his harassed troops; and, having ended his expedition in this part of the island, he made a triumphal entry into London, A. D. 366. publishing a general amnesty in favour of such as had deserted the Roman service, which brought over great numbers in the north; but still the commotions were so considerable on the frontiers of Scotland, that he judged it proper to have powerful assistants; and therefore sent for Civilis and Dulcitius, who were both men of great abilities and of experienced valour; the first he made vicar, the second duke of Britain, and guardian of the sea-coasts. By this arrangement the northern opponents were soon reduced to obedience; and, to prevent their incursions for the future, they were once more confined within straighter limits, the Roman territories being enlarged and secured by strong fortresses, well garrisoned*. Having thus restored tranquility to Britain, Theodosius applied himself to the internal policy of the state, reforming sundry abuses, repairing and embellishing the cities that had suffered pillage, or were in a ruinous condition; and, when he had settled every thing in such a manner as to give entire satisfaction to the inhabitants, he returned to Rome, leaving behind him the joyful shouts and acclamations of applause of the Britons, to receive the same tokens of approbation from the emperor, and the people of Rome, who received him with open arms. Valentinian, in token of his esteem, made him master of his horse.

Gratian, the eldest son of Valentinian, succeeded to the empire; and, finding the state of affairs greatly perplexed, he chose the son of the brave Theodosius to be his associate; which so exasperated Maximus, at that time governor of Britain, that, thinking himself superseded by this choice, he excited the soldiers to a revolt, and had the art of engaging them to proclaim him emperor, and to accompany him across the seas, to take possession of the empire. In this expedition he likewise engaged so considerable a body of the natives of Britain, that by this means the island was left in a defenceless state, and open to the inroads of the Picts and Scots, who never failed to take advantage of such favourable events; and accordingly, at this time, entered and laid waste all the Roman territories in the north; while Maximus, having defeated Gratian, prepares to encounter Theodosius, his colleague, who in turn defeats Maximus and puts him to death. In this miserable contest, for the empire, the flower of the British youth fell in battle, and the remainder retreated to Bretagne in France. Theodosius, when this dangerous rebellion was suppressed, made Chrysanthus vicar in the British isles, which post he filled with great reputation, and totally subdued the northern enemies. Theodosius dying in 393, his two sons shared the empire; and the western department fell to Honorius, which was governed by Stilico, during his minority. The first concern of the regent was to send a man of an enterprising spirit into Britain, to be attentive to the behaviour of the Picts. Victorius, a man of an arbitrary tyrannic disposition, was elected vicar on this occasion, who carried his authority so far, by interposing in the election of a king to succeed Hengist, that the Picts plainly perceived he had a design upon their liberty. Encouraged by the example of the Celts and other nations, who were daily falling off from their obedience to the empire, which was now in its decline, they joined with the Scots; and, considering that the Roman territories in Britain were left defenceless, the legions having been recalled to act on the continent, they determined first to invade their possessions in Britain, and then totally to expel them from the island. In this design, however, the inhabitants of the south by no means concurred; for they chose rather to continue in subjection to the Romans, and even to implore their aid against the Picts, than to join with them in the noblest of all military exploits, the recovery of native liberty. So that the Picts then considered them as enemies, and treated them as such, laying waste their flourishing provinces, and reducing them to such a lamentable condition, that two legions were successively sent to their relief, first by Honorius, A. D. 420, and again by the præfect of Gaul, A. D. 421, which was the last assistance the Romans afforded them; for when this legion quitted the island, after having chased the united forces of the Picts and Scots, beyond the friths of Forth and Clyde, and assisted the Britons in building a new wall, Gallio, the commander, recommended them to the protection of the gods, earnestly besought them to stand up like men, in defence of their country, of their families, and fortunes; but to expect no further assistance from the troops of the empire, whose service was required in defence of the empire itself, which was now over-run by the northern powers of Europe. Thus ended the Roman power, and with it the military government of Rome in Britain, A. D. 447.

A concise Chronological and Historical Account of the Religion, Laws, Arts, Manners, and Customs, which prevailed in BRITAIN, during the Usurpation of the ROMANS.

THE Romans were in possession of that part of Britain which we at this day call England, for the space of four hundred and ninety years; and during that period the Christian religion made a considerable progress in the island, which was wholly pagan when invaded by the Romans. We have already given an account of the principal tenets held by the Druids, which are partly Egyptian, and partly Jewish or deistical; probably proceeding from their commercial intercourse with these people, whose religious ceremonies might by degrees be interwoven with their own, through policy or caprice. Much learning has been bestowed, and a great deal of time lost, in ascertaining the first planting of Christianity in Britain, and the exact period of this important event remains still undetermined; the best accounts being grounded on fabulous traditions, and supported by monkish legends: it is sufficient for us to know, that the glad tidings of the gospel were early made known to our unhappy ancestors, while groaning beneath the yoke of foreign tyranny, and, at the most suitable period, for administering its celestial comforts to a people who had been inhumanly deprived of temporal felicity, through the unbounded ambition of a rapacious empire. From a passage in Clemens Romanus, in which mention is made that St. Paul preached the gospel as far as the boundaries of the western empire, it has been maintained, that the apostle personally visited this island: but this opinion merits not the least credit; for the Romans ever considered Britain as a colony, which, it is true, fell under the government of the western division when the empire was divided; tho', being an island separated from the continent, was never considered as part of the empire itself; and therefore was subject to the præfect of France, which kingdom was the utmost boundary of the western empire.

Rejecting, therefore, the honour of St. Paul's ministry, with the fable of Joseph of Arimathea, which has employed the pens of divines as well as historians, we shall next examine the history of the conversion of Pomponia Græcina, a British lady of distinction, and wife of Plautius, who was sent to Britain, in the character of legate, by the emperor Claudius, A. D. 48. The words of Tacitus are, That this lady was accused by the Britons of embracing a foreign superstition; from which authority Dr. Smollett, and others, have honoured this lady with the title of the first British convert to Christianity; not considering, that, at this æra, a defection from the druidical maxims, in a lady of Pomponia's quality, in favour of the pagan rites of Rome, was sufficient to establish the charge of her embracing a foreign superstition: besides, Christianity, at this early period, was taught as it is written in the gospel, totally free of all that superstition which has since been introduced to serve the purposes of bad men; and therefore it is highly probable, that she was converted by her husband, not to Christianity, but to the idolatry of antient Rome, which might be justly stiled a foreign superstition. Some time after this event, we find Boadicea, A. D. 61, addressing herself to Andarte, the British goddess of war, before she engages the Romans; and letting loose a hare, as an omen of victory; which plainly shews, that very few, if any of her confederate forces, were Christians; for, if they had, such a proceeding would have been highly impolitic: in short, it is impossible to fix the date of Christianity in this island with any certainty, till the general persecution under Dioclesian and Maximinus, about the year 303, in which the Christians in Britain are said to have been included by all the writers of that time; for, upon this occasion, the British church is mentioned, and the names of several persons who suffered martyrdom for the Christian faith, the chief of whom was St. Alban. A few years after, A. D. 314, the council of Arles in France was held, at which council, it is certain, three British bishops assisted; as also at the council of Nice, in 325; at the council of Sardis, convened on account of Athanasius; and, lastly, at the council of Ariminum, A. D. 359, when the three British bishops were maintained, during their residence at Ariminum, at the emperor's expence, on account of their extreme poverty; so nearly allied were the good prelates of those days to their Blessed Master. The decrees of these councils have afforded ample matter for ecclesiastical controversy, which has been carried on, as usual, with great partiality, prejudice, and animosity. The grand dispute is the origin of the pretended superiority of the Roman church; a matter of no moment to the present generation. The only information, worth transmitting to posterity, is the undoubted independency of the British church on the see of Rome at its first establishment, though, through the weakness and superstition of our monarchs in after-times, this dependency was avowed and confirmed, to the dishonour of Britain, for many ages: all we know further of the state of the church, to the time that the Romans quitted the island, is, that the heresy of Pelagius was brought into Britain, and for some time greatly disturbed the established church; till at length a disputation was held at Verulam, now St. Alban's, wherein the errors of Pelagius were fully refuted to the satisfaction of the people, who then quietly returned to the discipline of the mother church; and at this period the Christian religion universally prevailed in the British isles.

As to the laws by which our ancestors were governed, we have only to observe, that after the destruction of the Druids, the military government of the Romans, by degrees, was established in South Britain, and the whole administration entirely conducted by military officers of different ranks. A long detail of the several appointments, in the different divisions of the kingdom, has been given in all our modern histories, extracted from the Notitia of Pancirollus. It will be sufficient for our purpose to observe, that the whole establishment was a system of slavery, calculated to hold a conquered people in perpetual subjection; every office in the government being filled by the army, from the vicar of Britain, to the keepers of the prisons; and that they were all the creatures of the emperors, from the duke of Britain, down to the very register of his court; all of them holding their commissions under the emperor, or his vicegerents in Britain.

The arts which tend to the comfort and embellishment of life, were little known in these early times; agriculture, the most necessary of all, was totally neglected, through the turbulent state of affairs in Britain, the country being alternately over-run by the Romans, the Saxons and Franks, the Picts and the Scots; and one of the greatest extortions by which the Roman officers amassed vast fortunes, was in the sale of corn from the magazines in time of war. Architecture and the military arts owed their establishments in Britain at this early period, to the selfish views of the Romans, not to their generosity or politeness, as some have imagined; for Agricola did not persuade them to erect public buildings, till he had made them in love with the luxuries of Rome; and then being assured of the degeneracy of their manners, he encourages them to pull down their huts and cabins, made of clay and fods, and to erect temples, market-places, and private houses, of stone; but, above all, fortifications, that they might be able to defend themselves in their abject state, from the just resentment of their brave cotemporaries, the inhabitants of the north, who obstinately defended their liberty to the last moment, and preferred the miseries of war with freedom, to the voluptuous pleasures of a dishonourable peace, purchased by a slavish subjection to the Romans. In the reign of Carausius, A. D. 292, the polite arts were greatly encouraged, particularly architecture and sculpture, the city of London being greatly embellished at this period; and further improvements were made in these arts under the peaceable government of Constantine, who came to the empire in the year 308. Besides these, the art of war was so strenuously cultivated among the Britons, that in the time of Maximus and Constantine, they perfectly understood the Roman discipline, and were so thoroughly exercised in it, that they were reckoned little inferior to the legionary troops; and when they were thus perfect in the military art, their masters took care to transport them to the continent, to fight the wars of their emperors; for, about the year 388, we find no less than twelve considerable corps of British troops intermixed with the Roman forces in different parts of the empire; and this was the principal cause of the defenceless state of the island at the time the Romans quitted it; their policy, joined to the exigencies of the empire, having engaged them to drain it of all the regular troops. Had they remained at home, they might have proved too strong for the Romans; but, being taken abroad, the Picts and Scots were too powerful for the remainder of their countrymen. Thus Britain was lost to the Romans, by the effect of a political measure, which, in the beginning, was designed to secure them in quiet possession of it.

We are next to give some account of the manners and customs of the Britons, during this period; and here we must present to our readers a melancholy picture of the dreadful effects of adopting foreign manners, and of eagerly embracing the effeminate vices and follies of any nation; by this fatal error our ancestors in a moment lost their love of liberty, their sincerity, generosity, and noble simplicity, and, in a word, all sense of public and private virtue. Agricola artfully stole upon them first the Roman language, then the habit, then the gorgeous buildings, the elegant entertainment, the the costly perfumes, and, lastly, the effeminate voluptuous use of warm baths; so that, in effect, they spoke as Romans, they lived under Roman roofs, they fed upon Roman delicacies, they refreshed their wearied limbs, after wanton debaucheries in Roman baths, and they slept in the arms of indolence on Roman beds; and every spark of patriotism being thus extinguished in their breasts, the force of arms was no longer necessary; for they were conquered without bloodshed. If the same causes in all ages produce the same effects, must not every lover of his country tremble for the fate of posterity, when he beholds the near resemblance which the present state of the manners of this land bears to that of his degenerate ancestors?—We are not Romans at this day, but we are more than half French. The Romans could not prevail against the uncorrupted Picts and Scots by the force of arms; but they conquered the South Britons by the artful allurements we have just exhibited. France has been still more unsuccessful against Great Britain, in open war, than the Romans against the Picts and Scots; she has often attempted the conquest of this country by force of arms, but in vain; how far she may prevail by our fondness for her manners, time alone can discover; but the prospect darkens every hour. The foundation of the depravity of our manners was laid in the reign of Lewis the Fourteenth; the French language was artfully introduced into every court in Europe, but prevailed no where so much as in England, where seminaries upon seminaries are still encouraged for its cultivation; in the next place, though the outsidings of our edifices are not French, because our metropolis is too well inhabited to admit of waste ground for erecting inclosed hotels, yet the ornaments, and even the necessary furniture within, are French; our manufactures, though brought to the highest degree of perfection, are discouraged, and obliged to give place to the contraband commodities of France in the decoration of our persons; as to diet, it is well known that none but French entertainments have subsisted for some time in the houses of persons of quality; and as to the perfumes, and other effeminate delicacies of France, they are so common that the repetition is needless; and, to close the scene of our folly, after having terminated a glorious and successful, but expensive war, great part of the remainder of our specie is daily remitted to the capital of France, to drain this land, and furnish them with the grand engine of perfidy and war.

It may perhaps be censured as premature and unprecedented, to draw a parallel between two such distant periods; but as we profess to write an history on the plan of lord Bolingbroke, whose letters on the study of history will ever be admired, though he was a bad statesman, and a worse theologist, we must aim at instructing the present generation and even posterity; and we are authorised to draw this picture from the records of the earliest histories, wherein the fall of empires and republics, which were once in a most flourishing condition, by the gradual introduction and final prevalency of foreign luxury, is amply and incontestably related. Thus fell Carthage, Rome, and some modern states; and may Britain, seeing the rock, prudently avoid it, and in time shake off France, which is the real mill-stone about her neck; that she may perpetuate her glorious plan of liberty, and continue it under the sanction of the best of princes, and his lineal descendants, till the final dissolution of all sublunary states.

The INVITATION of the SAXONS, to the DISSOLUTION of the HEPTARCHY.

P A R T II.

THE final retreat of the Romans, at a period when they had reduced Britain to a most defenceless state, completely closed the scene of usurpation they had so long carried on with impunity, by an act of cruelty, totally consistent with their behaviour. In the first act of this tragedy, they found the Britons a free independent people, at war with no foreign power, subject to no invasion of their property, having never given the least umbrage to any of their neighbours: they invaded them, reduced them to slavery, debauched the simplicity of their manners, disciplined and carried off most of the inhabitants capable of bearing arms, and then abandoned them, leaving one part of the island a prey to the invasions of the German pirates, and the rest to the incursions of the Picts and Scots, who were justly enraged against them for deserting the common cause of liberty, and tamely submitting to the Roman yoke*. The earliest æra of the British history is not more obscured by fable and tradition, than the period we are now arrived at. Few authors are to be met with from whom any certain account can be collected concerning the Saxons, for a considerable time after they were invited to Britain. The first author who mentions the Saxons as inhabiting a part of Germany, is Ptolomæus, who is cited by Cluverius in his antiquities of Germany, wrote in the reign of Adrian,

A. D. 120, and afterwards in the reign of Diocletian. They became universally known by their piratical attempts on the British and French coasts, Carausius being commissioned by that emperor, as we have already related, to protect the coasts from these robbers. At this time they were joined by the Franks, another set of German pirates, and these together soon after made up a considerable body; to them were afterwards added the Jutes and Angles. This miscellaneous mixture of different people, known only to the Britons by their frequent invasions of the sea-coasts, where they plundered and laid waste the country, living upon the spoils procured by their lawless rapine, were the hopeful auxiliaries called into the assistance of the inhabitants of Britain, to defend them against the cruel depredations of the Picts and Scots, and who, in return, made themselves masters of the country.

From the year 447 to 450, being three years after the departure of the Romans, Britain was in a state of anarchy; and it is totally impossible to say they had any form of government, a famine and pestilence having spread a general desolation, and carried off the greatest part of the inhabitants; the remainder retreating to forests, woods and mountains, and submitting only to the petty tyrants who ruled over the particular counties in which they resided; tho', about this period, the

* Smollett, the favourite historian of the present age, compares Britain at this period to a family deprived of their parent and protector; but what parent or protector would have thus basely deserted his children? Not even those that inhabit the wilds of Africa. But it was consistent in usurpers and tyrants; and such were the Romans over the Britons.

Picts and Scots having united with the design of subduing Britain, and having proceeded so far as to break down the wall which fixed their boundaries beyond the friths; Vortigern, the prince of Devonshire and Cornwall, found means to call a general assembly of the nobles and chief inhabitants of these counties, by whom he was elected governor of Britain, but subject to render an account of his conduct to the inferior princes and magistrates. After this election, Vortigern contrived to procure a general consent to send special messengers to invite the Saxons in Germany to their aid, who readily accepted an invitation to a country from which they had often carried off considerable booty; and about fifteen hundred of their best troops being assembled with all expedition, they embarked under the conduct of two brothers, Hengist and Horsa, and soon after arrived at the Isle of Thanet, which was assigned them for their present residence, where they were joyfully received by the deluded people, and greatly caressed by Vortigern, who entered into a treaty with them, by which they stipulated to defend Britain, he engaging to reward them liberally for their services. Soon after, Vortigern finding that the news of their arrival made no impression on the Picts and Scots, who had now extended their incursions as far as Lincolnshire, determined to come to action; and therefore, accompanied by his new allies, took the field to stop their progress: he no sooner engaged the enemy, than they took to flight; but whether it was owing to the superior discipline of these Saxon warriors, or to the terror the Islanders were under in engaging with foreigners, whose manner of fighting they were unacquainted with, cannot be determined; however, all historians agree, they were never able to make head against the Saxons, by whom they were continually defeated; till at length, wearied out with repeated disappointments, they thought proper to abandon their conquests, and make a precipitate retreat to their antient boundaries, about the year 452.

Hengist and his victorious Saxons, having thus restored tranquility to Britain, began to take such measures as were best calculated to encrease their influence in the island, and secure and extend their possessions in it. With this view, observing the universal indolence of the inhabitants, who suffered the land to lie fallow, having no inclination for, and very little skill in agriculture, he persuades Vortigern to consent to a more general invitation of his countrymen, under a pretence that they would cultivate so fertile a country with great diligence, and thereby put it in a more flourishing condition, for the general advantage of the Britons. Having gained this important point, he sends home orders to embark as many families as sixteen ships would contain, and with them to bring over his daughter, a young lady of extraordinary beauty, whose personal charms greatly assisted the Saxons in their political designs; for being introduced to Vortigern soon after her arrival, at an entertainment given by her father for that purpose, he instantly became enamoured of the royal maid, and demanded her in marriage. Hengist, on this occasion, made use of all that low dissimulation which political craft alone can instil into the mind of man: he seemed to be abashed at the proposal, and modestly to decline the acceptance of such an honour: pleading the great inequality of this union, and pretending to receive a great obligation, he reluctantly consents; and then, as a further obligation, strange inconsistency! but confirmed by all historians, he receives the county of Kent as a reward for giving his daughter to Hengist.

If we might be allowed here to give place to private conjecture concerning this event, we should depart from the common opinion, and draw this inference from the general bad character of Vortigern: That this grand scene of his marriage with Rowena, was no more than the discovery of the plot of the political farce that had been carrying on in secret between him and Hengist; and we should brand him, from the first correspondence he held with the Saxons, as an infamous traitor, and not honour him, as most have done, with the sacred title of British King.

The Saxons having thus strengthened their interest by an alliance with the British commander in chief, and having received a very considerable reinforcement from Germany, consisting of a mixture of Angles, Saxons, and Jutes, they no longer concealed their ambitious designs, but came to an open rupture with the Britons, having first entered into a private treaty of peace with the Scots. The first pretext for a quarrel was, that Hengist's troops were not paid according to agreement, nor in proportion to their services; and finding that remonstrances on this head had no effect, Hengist founds the justice of taking up arms on this argument: That he had a right to pay himself. He accordingly proceeded to military execution, laying waste the counties bordering on Kent. These proceedings alarming the unhappy Britons, they suddenly, but too late, take a resolution to defend themselves against their false friends; and assembling all their forces, they hold a council of war, in which the conduct of Vortigern is loudly complained of; and, his cowardice and treachery being strongly suspected, they insisted on associating with him in the command his son Vortimer, a prince of great probity, and who was equally remarkable for his wisdom and valour. This measure once taken, all power devolved to the new commander, the army being grown weary of their old general, and strongly prejudiced in favour of his son; so that Vortigern was himself deprived at once of power, reputation, and credit, deserted alike by his own troops and by the Saxons. Various are the relations of the skirmishes and battles said to have been fought in different places, and at different times, by Vortimer and Hengist; and the accounts of the events of these battles differ as much, and are as little to be depended on, as other traditions of these times; no two authors, antient or modern, agreeing in the history of this war, which ended in subjecting that part of England which they afterwards divided into seven kingdoms. This division, and the form of government then introduced, has been stiled, in all the histories of this country, the Saxon Heptarchy.

The Britons withstood the efforts of the Saxons to found these seven kingdoms, from the year 454, to 596, when the heptarchy was totally established. During the intervening epocha of one hundred and forty years, the different kingdoms composing this famous heptarchy were founded at different periods by force of arms, the Saxons continually sending for fresh reinforcements, which coming over under leaders of great repute, they at first only assisted their brethren, but afterwards settled separately in those parts of the island they had conquered, and assumed a sovereign independent power. We have already observed how fabulous and uncertain this part of the British history appears, which is equally barren of entertainment as of historical truth and instructive information; even the military exploits of Arthur, the famous British prince, said to have been the last defender of the British cause against the Saxons, is so intermixed with romance, and the miraculous superstitions of the times, that little more can be relied on than that such a prince really signalized himself first under Ambrosius Aurelius, who came to the assistance of the Britons against the Saxons, at the head of ten thousand Armoricans; and that, after the death of Ambrosius, who was slain in battle about the year 480, he succeeded to the command, and headed the Britons against several Saxon parties, whom he encountered with various success, till at length he was mortally wounded in an engagement with his own nephew, who had usurped his authority; and being in league with the Saxons, and supplied with reinforcements from the Picts and Scots, had encountered his uncle more than once, but was constantly defeated; and in this last engagement, which put an end to both their lives, the uncle and nephew were so enraged, that they challenged each other to single combat, and Mordred was slain on the spot, but not till he had given a mortal wound to his uncle Arthur, of which he soon after expired at Glastonbury, about the year 542, at the age of ninety; seventy-six years of which he had been in arms in the steady defence of his country.

The kingdom of Kent, which became the chief under the heptarchy, was founded A. D. 457, by Hengist, who was succeeded by Esk; Esk was succeeded by Otta, and Otta by Immeric; and then the crown descended to Ethelbert, the first Christian king of Kent, and the principal monarch under the heptarchy, which was firmly established in his reign, A. D. 596.

The second kingdom, which was that of the South Saxons, was founded about the year 491, and included the greatest part of the counties of Suffex and Surry; but as it was subject or tributary to the kings of Kent, we find but two monarchs on record before the heptarchy, Ella and Cissa.

The third kingdom was that of the West Saxons, founded about the year 519: it contained Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Berkshire; and was governed by the following monarchs before the heptarchy: Cerdic, Kenric, Ceaulin, Celric, and Ceolwulf.

The kingdom of the East Saxons was next founded, A. D. 527: it comprised Essex, Middlesex, and part of Hertfordshire: Erkenwin and Sledda were the only monarchs before the heptarchy.

The fifth kingdom, founded A. D. 547, was called the kingdom of Northumberland, including Lancashire, Yorkshire, the bishopric of Durham, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Northumberland, and part of Scotland as far as the frith of Edinburgh. Ida, Alla, Ederic, and Edelfrid, reigned over it before the heptarchy.

The kingdom of the East Angles, which contained Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely, made the sixth monarchy: it was founded in 575, and the kings before the heptarchy were Uffa, Tityst, Redwald, Eorpwald, Sigebert, Eglic, and Annas.

The seventh, and last kingdom, was that of the Mercians, founded in 582: it included Gloucestershire, Herefordshire, Worcestershire, Warwickshire, Leicestershire, Rutlandshire, Northamptonshire, Lincolnshire, Huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Nottinghamshire, Cheshire, and part of Hertfordshire, and was subject to the following kings: Crida, Wibba, Cheorl, and Penda.

Having thus ascertained the several dates of the foundations of these seven kingdoms, and brought down the regal succession in each to the time of Ethelbert the First, king of Kent, under the heptarchy, we shall proceed to give a concise account of the occurrences worthy our attention, that passed in each kingdom, till the dissolution of the heptarchy, beginning with the kingdom of Kent.

The HISTORY of the Kingdom of KENT.

MOST historians agree, that, about the time Ethelbert began his reign, the whole of South Britain, though divided into seven kingdoms, was denominated England, and all the inhabitants were known by the general name of English, though they consisted of antient Britons or Welch, Saxons, Jutes, and Angles; and Ethelbert, being the most powerful monarch, was on many occasions reputed king of England; but the best authorities not allowing any real king of England till the heptarchy was at an end, we shall only consider him as king of Kent; tho', at the same time, it may be necessary to premise, that from the period we are now arrived at, the history of this island will be confined to that part of Great Britain which is still called England, and that on all occasions the appellations of English and England will be made use of to the time of the union with Scotland, in the reign of Queen Anne.

Hengist was the founder of the kingdom of Kent, which he rendered the most formidable of the seven; but under his immediate successors it fell into decay, and made little or no figure, till Ethelbert not only restored it to its former reputation, but encreased its dominion. At his accession, finding that Ceaulin, king of the West Saxons, had assumed the honour of first or principal monarch, on the decline of the kingdom of Kent, which had enjoyed the superiority in the days of Hengist, he resolved to dispute this dignity by force of arms; and persuading the rest of the kings that Ceaulin aimed at universal monarchy, and had given a proof of it by seizing Suffex, which appertained to the government of the South Saxons, they chose him general, and supplied him with forces to march against Ceaulin as a common enemy. By means of this confederacy Ceaulin was defeated, and died soon after. From this time

Ethelbert

Ethelbert laid aside the mask, and discovered that his own views were more ambitious than those of Ceaulin, whose fall he had effected under the specious pretext of preserving the independency of the other kings. In a short time he found means to get possession of the kingdoms south of the river Humber, the Northumbrians excepted, and rendered himself so formidable, that they submitted to the yoke of arbitrary power, rather than contend with a general of his great reputation; and who besides was in alliance with France, having married Bertha, the daughter of the king of Paris. The most remarkable event in his reign is his conversion to Christianity, which laid the foundation of the conversion of the rest of the Saxon monarchs; but of this we shall treat at large in its proper place, as also of the laws, manners, and customs, which prevailed under the Saxon government. Ethelbert died in 616, after a prosperous reign of fifty-two years: he left his kingdom to his son Eadbald, a most abandoned and profligate wretch in the beginning of his reign, but a sincere penitent, and a good prince, at the close of it; contributing greatly, by his exemplary piety, to the conversion of Edwin king of the Mercians to Christianity; for which reason the crimes he stands charged with by other historians, as the charge is not fully authenticated, shall find no place here. This prince died in 640, and was succeeded by Ercombert, who found means to ascend the throne by the exclusion of his elder brother; but he did not long enjoy it, reigning only four years. He was succeeded by his eldest son Egbert, who fearing the sons of his father's brother, who had been illegally set aside, would lay claim to his crown, he caused them to be put to death; and then, agreeable to the religious notions of those dark ages of superstition and ignorance, in order to expiate his guilt, he gave their sister some lands in the Isle of Thanet, directing her to build a monastery thereon; after which he reigned peaceably for nine years, when he died, and was succeeded by his brother Lothair, to the prejudice of his own children, whom he had left under the guardianship of this usurper.

Lothair assumed the sovereignty in 673, and for ten years enjoyed it in perfect tranquility, when thinking to secure the succession in his own family, he associated his son Richard in the government; which proceeding so highly incensed his nephew Edric, that he fled to Edelwalch, king of the South Saxons, and implored his aid against the usurpers, who furnished him with an army, at the head of which he entered Kent; and, having vanquished Lothair, who died of the wounds he received in the engagement, he was restored to his right without opposition; for Richard fled to Germany. The victorious monarch, however, reigned but two years, and then dying without children, left his kingdom to his brother Withred, who met with great opposition in ascending the throne; for many of the nobles refused to acknowledge, and even attempted to become independent of the sovereign authority; for which purposes they fortified themselves in their castle. Withred, observing that the kingdom was already in a weak condition, and liable to fall a prey to his ambitious neighbour Ceadwalch, the king of the West Saxons, with great policy suppressed this rebellion, without the effusion of blood, by inviting their general, in whom they had placed the greatest confidence, to share the throne with him. Swabert accordingly ascended the throne with Withred, and enjoyed this dignity four years; after which Withred governed the kingdom alone, twelve years, and acquired universal applause for his great lenity, and his impartial administration of justice. Withred died, A. D. 725, and was succeeded by his eldest son Edbert, who enjoyed his kingdom in great tranquility twenty-three years; and then the crown, by his death, without issue, devolved to his brother Ethelbert, the second son of Withred, who permitted his son Ardulph to partake of the regal dignity; and he dying in the life-time of his father, the succession returned to Aldric, the youngest son of Withred, and the last lineal descendant of Hengist, the founder of the kingdom. Aldric's reign was continually disturbed by the restless ambition of his neighbours, each of whom were willing to add this reduced kingdom to their own dominions; but the most formidable candidate was a prince at a more remote distance, Offa, the king of the Mercians, to whom this kingdom became tributary after the death of Aldric, which happened, according to Malmesbury, A. D. 794.

The royal family being now extinct, the throne was seized by the most powerful man in the state, who prefixed the regal name of Edbert to his own private surname, which was Prin; his usurpation lasted but two years, when Cenulph, king of Mercia, who had already over-run all Kent, took him prisoner, and carried him captive to Mercia, having first, according to some authors, cut off his hands, and put out his eyes. Cenulph then set on the throne one of his creatures, who reigned eight years, as the vassal of the Mercian king; and, after his death, Cenulph accepted the homage of Baldred his son, and suffered him to ascend the throne on the same conditions, A. D. 805. In his reign the dissolution of the heptarchy began with the conquest of his dominions, by Egbert, king of the West Saxons, and afterwards of all England*.

The History of the Kingdom of the SOUTH SAXONS.

THIS petty state, which comprized only the counties of Suffex and part of Surry, makes the least figure of any under the Saxon heptarchy. It was but poorly inhabited, and consequently in but a weak condition; the whole extent of it did not exceed fifty miles, and a very considerable part consisted of uncultivated woods and forests. The only city of any note was Chichester, built by Cissa.

Ella, who came over with a considerable reinforcement to strengthen the interest of Hengist, in England, about the year 476, founded this kingdom in 491; he was bravely opposed for some time by Arthur, the British prince: but, having at length surmounted all difficulties, he enjoyed the sovereign power twenty three years, and left the crown to his only son Cissa, of whom we have nothing remarkable to relate, except his great age: he could not be less than one hundred and sixteen when he died; for he reigned seventy six years. Matthew of Westminster positively asserts, that he came to England with his father, in 476.

Cissa dying without issue, Ceaulin, king of the West Saxons, seized the kingdom, which laid the foundation of the confederacy against him, already mentioned in the history of Kent. After this event this little state was subject to several revolutions unworthy our regard, and was at length totally subdued and united to the kingdom of the West Saxons, A. D. 754.

The Kingdom of the WEST SAXONS.

IT must be observed, that in the first division of England, according to the plan of the heptarchy, three of the kingdoms were considered as superior to all the rest; two of these were chiefly inhabited by the Angles, from whom the name of English is derived, and one by Saxons. The two English governments were Northumberland and Mercia; and in them were included the kingdoms of the East Saxons, or Essex, and of the East Angles, containing Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely. The kingdom of Wessex, or of the West Saxons, was the third superior kingdom; it was situated south of the Thames, and extended from the borders of Sussex to the river Tamar, by which it was separated from Cornwall.

The founder of the kingdom of Wessex was Cerdic, from whom Guthrie pretends the illustrious house of Hanover is lineally descended; but, as we think this reflects no honour on that august house, we shall not enquire from what authority this pedigree is derived, especially as it is only noticed by him and Tindal, the continuator of Rapin.

Cerdic undoubtedly was a great general; but, like the rest of his brethren, he was an invader; who, by the lawless power of arms, took possession of the estates and effects of the Britons, who had given him no offence; and, therefore, his name ought to be branded in history by every virtuous historian on whom the love of liberty has any effect.

This hero arrived in England, A. D. 495, with a considerable army, "to seek his fortune, having no longer any employment in Germany," says Tindal. It is remarkable that these two historians, just mentioned, seem to have taken a pleasure in expatiating at large on the military exploits of Cerdic, in England, while he is making head against Ambrosius Aurelius, and Arthur, who were strenuously defending the falling liberty of their country, and who met with an opposition fatal to themselves and to their country, from the victorious arms of this pretended ancestor of our present most truly religious and virtuous sovereign, the defender and most clement guardian of the liberties of his subjects, who is not allied by blood, and much less by sentiment, to a Saxon invader. Cerdic enjoyed the sovereignty of Wessex in great tranquility after the death of Arthur, and lived to the year 534, when he was succeeded by Cynric his son, who reigned only four years; and then left the crown to Ceaulin his eldest son, who exerted himself in maintaining and extending the original superiority of Wessex, by reducing the power of the neighbouring princes; and at length by seizing the petty kingdom of the South Saxons, which rash measure proved fatal to his affairs: for the rest of the kings of the heptarchy, being apprehensive that he aimed at universal monarchy, they united their forces against him, as we have already observed in the history of Kent; and being totally defeated, he fled to some unknown retreat, and was never after heard of. Ceolric, his nephew, was set upon the throne by the victorious Ethelbert, king of Kent; and, as he was entirely devoted to his benefactor, his reign proved peaceable, but not remarkable for any great event; he died A. D. 598, and was succeeded by Ceolwulf his cousin. The reign of this prince was greatly disturbed by the revolt of the South Saxons; but having at length defeated them, though they were powerfully assisted by the Picts and Scots, he held them in strict subjection; and his warlike disposition rendering him ever active and vigilant, he supported the grandeur of his kingdom with greater dignity, and acquired more esteem and respect than his predecessors; he died in 611, and was succeeded by Cinegils his nephew, who, in the beginning of his reign, gave half of his kingdom to his brother Quincelm; and they reigned together in the greatest harmony, jointly obtaining a signal victory over the Britons, A. D. 614. Quincelm died in 635, and Cinegils in 643, when Cenwal his son succeeded to the crown, but not to the virtues of his father, being an unstable, pusillanimous, voluptuous prince, who gave himself up to riot and debauchery, and the most flagrant acts of injustice and impiety. Having embraced Christianity he married the sister of Penda, king of Mercia, and soon after renounced his religion, and repudiated his wife, equally without cause, owing entirely to the vicious instability of his temper. Penda, highly resenting the insult offered to his sister, entered his dominions with a powerful army; and, finding his subjects generally disaffected to their sovereign, he soon obliged him to retire to Annas, king of the East Angles, where he remained three years, while Penda kept possession of his abdicated throne; but at last, being once more converted to Christianity, and reclaimed from his vicious courses, he was restored to his dominions by the assistance of Annas. Some years after he was engaged in a war with Wulfer, the successor of Penda. The issue of this war is uncertain, owing to the different relations of the ancient historians. Malmesbury asserts that Cenwal defeated Wulfer, while Henry of Huntingdon maintains that Wulfer had the advantage, which is most probable, because he certainly made himself master of Sussex and the Isle of Wight, which he could not have effected, if he had not been the victor. He died in 672, and left his kingdom to his queen, who reigned but one year. Historians give her a great character, but are uncertain whether she died or was expelled by her subjects, who disdained to submit to the government of a woman. The kingdom kingdom now suffered a revolution for ten years, being dismembered and governed by three monarchs at a time, who assumed the sovereignty by no other claim than that of being the first nobles of the court. Cenfus indeed pretended to be a descendant of Cerdic. However this be, it is certain that at this time Cenfus, Efcwin, and Centwin, equally shared the supreme power, and were attacked the following year by Wulfer, who gained the advantage, but with great loss on both sides. Cenfus and Efcwin both died in a short time after the loss of this battle, and Centwin then reigned alone. A. D. 682, he defeated the ancient Britons inhabiting Wales, and, having plundered the country, drove the inhabitants to the sea-shore. Towards the end of his reign his subjects grew disloyal, and encouraged Ceadwalla, a prince of the royal blood, to lay claim to his crown; but he had not the mortification to see their designs take effect; for Ceadwalla was for some time opposed in his progress by Adelwalch, king of Suffex; and in the interim death put an end to the commotions which disturbed the tranquility of his days. He died in 686; and Ceadwalla, at the head of a victorious army, having defeated Adelwalch, seized on the vacant throne. Ceadwalla was a prince of an enterprising genius; and, being fond of acquiring military fame, and equally desirous of enlarging his dominions, he was continually at war, first with the South Saxons, against whom he proved victorious. He then entered the kingdom of Kent; but not being able to reduce it, he carried off a considerable booty. After this, he attacked the Isle of Wight, which had belonged to the South Saxons from the time that it was granted by Wulfer to Adelwalch. Alwald, brother to Authun, the reigning monarch of Suffex, made a vigorous defence; but was at length forced to yield to superiority of numbers, and abandon the place, leaving it to the mercy of the conqueror, who cruelly resolved to put the inhabitants to the sword, because they had not embraced Christianity. He was dissuaded from this horrid act by Wilfred, an English bishop, who represented to him that his zeal for the Christian religion would be better shewn by endeavouring to convert them; and, the king relenting, they were all baptized soon after, readily embracing any religion that would release them from impending death; but, however they might afterwards be convinced of the truth of Christianity, it is certain no merit can be ascribed to this forced conversion.

A. D. 688, Ceadwalla made a journey to Rome, in order to receive the honour of a public baptism by the hands of the pontiff. In this journey he met with the most respectful treatment from all the princes through whose dominions he travelled, and on his arrival at Rome was christened by pope Sergius II. by the name of Peter: however, he did not live to enjoy the fruits he might expect from this extraordinary step, which, in a prince of his character, may fairly be attributed to other motives than those which he set forth to view: he died a few days after his baptism, and was buried in St. Peter's church, with a pompous inscription, setting forth his great zeal and devotion, and from which we learn that he was not full thirty years old at the time of his decease*.

To him succeeded his kinsman Ina, who possessed all those virtues in reality of which his predecessor had only worn the appearances, and seems to have acquired the crown rather by his personal worth than upon the strength of royal descent†; Ceadwalla having left two sons, minors indeed, by his wife Cenditha. In less than twelve months after he began his reign over the West Saxons, he was unanimously chosen by the East Angles for their king; an additional proof of the esteem his amiable character had acquired him. He was no sooner raised to the supreme authority, than he turned his thoughts towards the better government of the people committed to his care. With this view, he compiled a body of laws, most of which have come entire to our hands, and are at once curious, instructive, and beneficial, and served as the ground-work of those which were afterwards published by the great Alfred.

The first military exploit of his reign was marching into Kent, in the year 693, against the king of that country, in order to complete the revenge which he thought due to the manes of his kinsman Mollo; but Withred, the sovereign of the East Saxons, averted the impending storm by a timely submission and a large sum of money, with which he engaged Ina to return back to his own dominions.

We again find him engaged in a second expedition in the year 710, or, according to some authors, 715, against Goruntus, a prince of the Cornish Britons, part of whose country he subdued. What advantages he made of this conquest history does not inform us. He next took the field against Ceoldred king of Mercia, who had by some means incurred his displeasure. Here also he proved victorious, though not without sustaining a strong resistance, which for a long time made the issue of his arms doubtful. In the thirty-sixth year of his reign, the South Saxons having rebelled against him, and set up a king of their own, he entered their country, of which he made an entire conquest.

But now, in the height of his glory and reputation, renowned at home and dreaded abroad, Ina fell into that disorder which is so incident to old age, and is moreover the peculiar malady of times of darkness and ignorance: he was seized with imaginary or real qualms of conscience, which made him resolve to abdicate the throne for a religious retirement. He was not a little encouraged in this disposition by the suggestions of his queen Ethelburga, who was likewise infected with the same disease, and in whom, on account of her sex, it was doubtless more excusable than in a wise and victorious prince, such as Ina: in a word, he resigned the sovereign authority, went to Rome, assumed the habit of a monk, and ended, in contempt and

* We are told by Dr. Powel and Mr. Vaughan, in their learned notes upon Candoc's Welsh Chronicle, that this Ceadwalla's true name was Edwall, or Ethwall; which seems to agree with what Guiderius relates of one Ethwall prince of Wales, who about this time went to Rome, and there died. This supposition seems to carry with it the greater semblance of truth, as it is a very easy matter for a capital C to creep in; since it was commonly used in old hands as a signature at the beginning of a paragraph, and might by an ignorant copier be printed to the name itself, and thus of Edwal make Cedwal, Cadwal, or Ceadwal, from whence Cadwallader.

† Ina was the grandson of Ceowald, who descended in a right line from Cerdic.

obscurity, a life, the former part of which had fully entitled him to the admiration and esteem of all his cotemporaries. His wife Ethelburga soon after followed his example, and retired into the monastery of Berking. This event happened A. D. 727.

Previous to this step, so unworthy a great prince, he established the famous tax of St. Peter's Pence throughout his dominions, which, though at first intended only for the maintenance of English students at Rome, was afterwards claimed by the papal see as a regal revenue; it ever being the crafty practice of the church of Rome to improve charitable donations into indefeasible rights.

There are many other particulars relating to this prince, which we find darkly hinted at throughout history, but which our ignorance of those times prevents us from attaining a perfect knowledge of; and the plan we have laid down to ourselves in this work will not suffer us to impose idle conjectures or vague assertions on our readers for matters of fact.

Ethelhard ascended that throne which his kinsman Ina had quitted in his favour, and to which he was called by a general assembly: nevertheless, he found his authority contested by Oswald, a young prince of the blood-royal, who found means to raise a considerable party in the nation; but Ethelhard, marching against him, gave him a total overthrow in a pitched battle, and afterwards reigned unmolested during the sixteen years that he lived after his accession.

At his death, which happened in the year 743, his relation Cuthred assumed the reins of government. In the course of a reign of fourteen years, he obtained a complete victory over the Mercians by the fidelity and prowess of his general Ethelul, and united a part of Cornwall to his own kingdom; and, dying in the year 754, left his crown to his nephew Sigebert, whom history represents to us as a prince of a boundless ambition, destitute of every virtue, and aiming at a lawless sway; which so exasperated a people accustomed to enjoy the sweets of liberty, that putting one Kenewulf, a prince of the blood, at their head, they removed from the throne a monarch who appeared so unworthy to rule over them; allowing him, however, the revenues of all Hampshire for his subsistence. Here he might have peaceably enjoyed the happiness of a private life; but that restless thirst of power, which had occasioned his first disgrace, still remained with him in his exiled state: he began to form parties and raise commotions in the kingdom, till at length he was pursued by Kenewulf, who had succeeded him on the throne of the West Saxons, and obliged to save himself by flight in the forest of Andereda, or Andred, where he was slain by a swineherd; and thus terminated an ambitious and cruel life by the most ignominious end.

In those days little regard was paid to lineal descent, which we find frequently set aside for the interest of the state, or to answer the views of a prevailing party. This was the case in the succession now before us; for Cunehard, the brother of the deposed king, was still living, and consequently had an undoubted right to the throne before Kenewulf. This latter, conscious of a superior claim, and willing to divert the minds of his subjects, if left in repose, from animadverting thereto, fought to stifle all disagreeable enquiries in the blaze of military successes, and accordingly led them against the Britons, over whom he gained several signal victories. Nevertheless, he could not so far overcome his fears, but that he ardently wished for the moment which might deliver him from a person who might one day prove a dangerous competitor. Cunehard, who kept a strict eye over all his actions, soon found what he had to dread from his supplanter on the throne, and thought himself justly warranted to prevent the dangers he foresaw. Accordingly he formed a powerful party, and knowing that Kenewulf was accustomed to make private visits to a lady at Merten in Surrey, on which occasions he went attended by a very small retinue, he resolved to pitch upon one of those meetings to fall upon the king, and by his death recover a crown which he unjustly withheld from him. The plot succeeded to his wish; Kenewulf, unprepared for the attack, fell a victim to superior numbers, but not till he had defended himself with a courage which made him worthy of a better fate. Cunehard, however, did not long enjoy the fruits of this bloody enterprise; the murdered king was beloved by the generality of his subjects, who, forgetting what they owed to the lineal descendant of their prince, listened only to their affection for the person they had chosen to rule over them, and who had freed them from the rod of tyranny. The people headed by two noblemen, friends and relations of Kenewulf, advanced the next day against the murderer; and deaf to all his arguments, and even the most lavish offers of honours and rewards, attacked him with their whole force. Cunehard, who, on the first notice of the storm which threatened him, had taken shelter in a town, was compelled to yield; and, after an obstinate resistance, he and all his accomplices were put to the sword.

The death of Kenewulf thus revenged, the people placed his son Brithric on the throne. This prince, who was of the blood of Cerdic (to which due regard had been always paid in the midst of all the changes made in the succession) began his reign in the same year, 754, in which his two predecessors were killed. He was by nature of a pacific disposition, and placed his glory rather in cherishing the arts of peace than in acquiring military fame, though, at the same time, without enervating the minds of his people. Yet beneath this meekness and moderation he concealed those sentiments of jealousy which seemed constitutionally rooted in the breasts of the Westsaxon princes against their kinsmen, on account of the unstable state of the succession, and which he could not forbear shewing against Egbert, a prince of the blood-royal, whose name began now to acquire that credit which afterwards raised him to the supreme rule. Egbert, aware of the danger which threatened him, took refuge at the court of Offa, king of the Mercians; but, not liking the reception he met with there, he retired into France, where Charlemagne received him with open arms, and conferred on him every mark of the highest esteem. At this court he remained twelve years; and here he first conceived that famous project which he afterwards carried into execution, and by which he united the different kingdoms of the heptarchy under one head.

About this time the Danes began to render themselves as formidable by their piracies as the Saxons

Saxons had done before. In the year 787, they made a descent, for the first time, at Portland, with three ships, but were soon routed by the inhabitants of this country, with great slaughter, and obliged to retire with the utmost precipitation to their wooden fortresses, covered with disgrace, and disappointed of their booty. This was the first prelude to the many fatal descents they afterwards made upon this island.

And now Brithric, eased of his fears by the voluntary exile of the young Egbert, seemed desirous of wiping off all aspersions on his character, on account of his maltreatment of that deserving nobleman, by every act of a just and virtuous administration, in which he so far succeeded as to become the darling of his subjects; but his glory and his life met with a fatal end, through the treachery of his wife Edburga, who poisoned him in the year 799, and in the sixteenth year of his reign. After which execrable deed she fled over to France, where she died through want, after having lived some time in universal contempt.

The Kingdom of the EAST SAXONS.

THIS kingdom was founded by Ercenwin, the descendant of Woden, who began his reign about the year 527. We find nothing recorded in history concerning this prince worthy the notice of our readers, notwithstanding he swayed the sceptre upwards of sixty years. He was succeeded by his son Sledda, A. D. 587, who, after a short but peaceable reign, left the throne to his son Sibert, or Sigebert, in the year 596. This prince embraced the Christian religion at the instance of his uncle Ethelbert, king of Kent, assisted by the preaching of Melitus. Walsingham tells us that this Ethelbert built the church of St. Paul, in London, where an old temple of Diana formerly stood, and that Melitus was its first bishop. Sibert himself, after his conversion to Christianity, built another church on the spot where a temple dedicated to Apollo had once stood, and which is now St. Peter's, at Westminster; and signalized himself by many other acts of piety. He died after a reign of about seventeen years.

Upon his decease the kingdom devolved to his three sons, Saxred, Siward, and Sigebert, who reigned jointly, and who, immediately upon their accession, renounced the Christian religion, which their father had embraced, and became its most inveterate foes; insomuch, that the good bishop Melitus, who had been in high favour during the preceding reign, was obliged to seek his safety by flight. The three brothers having entered into a quarrel with Cenegils and Quincelm, joint kings of Wesssex, were by them defeated and slain in the year 623.

After them followed Sigebert, surnamed The Little, concerning whom history is altogether silent, save that he was succeeded on the throne by Sigebert the Good, his cousin-german, notwithstanding he left a son and a brother, both living, at his decease. This Sigebert was the son of Sigebald, brother of Slebert the son of Sledda, by his queen Ricula. With him the Christian religion was again restored throughout the kingdom of the East Saxons, chiefly by the labours of Cedda, by birth a Northumbrian, and afterwards made bishop of the East Saxons, on whose account Sigebert was murdered by two of his noblemen, whom he had offended by taking part with the prelate, who had excommunicated them for being guilty of several profligate and irreligious practices: but Bede seems to insinuate, that Cedda himself procured the death of his sovereign and benefactor, in revenge for his having shewn a partiality for those noblemen on whom he had passed ecclesiastical censure*. This catastrophe happened in the year 622. The crown then came to his brother Swithelm, at whose death it was enjoyed jointly by Seba and Sigher, the one son to Siward, and the other to Sigebert the Little. An epidemic distemper which broke out among his people, and was attended with a great mortality, made the latter throw off Christianity, in spite of the remonstrances of his colleague, who continued unalterable in the faith he embraced, and who, proving the longest liver, reigned eleven years alone, and in the decline of his days turned monk, after having abdicated the throne, after a reign of thirty years, in favour of his sons Sigert and Se-frid, whose reigns furnish us with nothing material.

Offa, the son of Sigert, was the next king of the East Saxons. This prince was remarkable for his great beauty. Like his grandfather, he ended his days in a convent. His successor was Seolrid, who mounted the throne in the year 709. This Seolrid was son of Sibert, or Sigebert the Good: he reigned thirty-eight years, and died without issue A. D. 747. William of Malmesbury hints that he was murdered; but by whom, or on what account, does not appear.

After him came his son Swithred, who was the last king of the East Saxons. In his time the famous Egbert perfected his plan of absolute dominion over the seven Saxon kingdoms, in the manner as shall be related in its proper place.

And here we must close the history of the kingdom of the East Saxons, concerning which all the accounts we can gather are at best but very lame and imperfect.

The Kingdom of NORTHUMBRLAND.

THIS kingdom, the fifth of the heptarchy, was founded in the year 547, by Ida, after whose death it was divided into two provinces, called Deira and Bernicia; the first including the southern parts, and the other beginning at Severus's wall, and running a considerable way into Scotland, in the low countries of which we find many traces of the Saxon customs and manners. On the death of king Ida, his son Adda took possession of the province of Bernicia, and his other son Alla of the kingdom of Deira.

Concerning the first five successors of Adda, we know little, except that their names were Clappa, Theodulph, Freothulph, Theodric, and Ederic, and that they reigned, the first seven, the second one, the third and fourth seven each, and the last two years. Ederic, saith W. of Malmesbury, after a life spent in poverty and obscurity, came to the crown in his old age, when, sensible that the weight of government was too heavy for him to sustain alone, he associated with him in the sovereignty his son Ethelfrid, who, upon his death, married Acca, daughter to Alla, by which alliance he got possession of the kingdom of Deira, regardless of the rights of Edwin the son of Alla, then an infant. Ethelfrid, though an usurper, was a man of great valour, and made himself respectable both at home and abroad, in particular to the Scots and Picts, whom he humbled on several occasions; beating the Scottish king Aydan in a pitched battle, and obliging him and his people, who had made frequent incursions upon his territories, to confine themselves within the limits of their own dominions. He likewise chastised the Britons, who had incurred his displeasure by persuading Aydan to enter his kingdom, and assisting him with their arms: he advanced to besiege the city of Chester, where they had shut themselves up, resolved to stand out to the last extremity; but, upon seeing them approach, they bethought themselves of a scheme truly worthy of those times of fanaticism and ignorance. They assembled a multitude of monks, to the number of twelve hundred and fifty, most of them belonging to the monastery of Bangor, who, marching to the place where Ethelfrid's army lay encamped, fell to practising their religious mummeries, in hopes to terrify the victorious monarch with the apprehension that heaven declared against him. But Ethelfrid, who came to inspire terror, and not to be affected by it, ordered them to be all put to the sword; and afterwards, falling upon the dismayed Britons, gave them a total defeat. After this victory, he commanded the monastery of Bangor, whence this praying forlorn-hope had made their folly, to be entirely razed to the ground; and then, putting a garrison into Chester, directed his march for Wales: but here he met with a considerable check from three British generals, who opposed his march, and after an obstinate fight obliged him to retreat into his own country with great loss.

While these things were transacting, Edwin the young son of Alla, whose rights had been infringed by Ethelfrid's taking possession of the throne which belonged to him, had taken refuge at the court of Redwald, king of the East Angles, by whom he had been hospitably received. But Ethelfrid, whose jealousy would not suffer him to rest so long as this young prince was living, sent ambassadors to Redwald with offers of a considerable reward, if he would deliver up Edwin, or otherwise to menace him with a bloody war, in case he persisted to protect him after such requisition; but Redwald, listening rather to the dictates of honour, than those of avarice or fear, refused to comply with the demands of the ambassadors, and prepared for resistance, in case Ethelfrid should be disposed to put his threats in execution. What he had foreseen, and so wisely provided for, came to pass; for immediately, on the return of his ambassadors with Redwald's answer, Ethelfrid declared war against that prince, and immediately took the field. The two armies met near the river Idel, upon the borders of Mercia, when a most bloody battle was fought, in which victory declared on the side of Redwald, and the usurper was slain, and his army totally routed. In this conflict, Ethelfrid gave proofs of the most signal valour, and killed Reiner, one of Redwald's sons, with his own hand. This battle was fought in the year 617.

Redwald now improved his good fortune, by marching immediately into the heart of Northumberland, where the fame of his victory flew before him, and anticipated all opposition. The three sons of the usurper, Aufrid, Oswald, and Oswy, far from making a stand against him, fled precipitately into Scotland; and Edwin, victorious in right of his protector, received the general homage of the Northumbrians. Soon after this expedition, which had covered him with glory, Redwald died, and left the sovereignty of the heptarchy open for Edwin.

Edwin possessed every requisite to make a monarch great, and a people happy. He had the art of concealing the strongest ambition beneath an exterior gentleness, which won him all hearts; and by an openness in matters of indifference, that seemed to discountenance all pretence of suspicion, he disguised his real intentions in affairs of consequence. He employed the first year of his reign in civilizing his people, grown brutal by the continual practice of war and rapine; and enacted such wholesome laws, and caused them to be executed with such punctuality, that he soon restored peace and good order in his kingdom; insomuch, saith Bede, "that a woman, with an infant in her arms, might have walked over the whole kingdom without fear of violence."

The death of Redwald, which happened in 614, gave him an opportunity of displaying, to its full extent, that ambition which was the prevailing passion of his soul. He openly aspired to the supreme power over all the other kings of the heptarchy, none of whom offered to oppose him in his pretensions, but Quincelm, king of the West Saxons, who resolved to assert his independency, though at the hazard of his life and dominions; but fortune not seconding his noble resolution, he was, after some contest, obliged to sue for peace: and Edwin, being now vested with the sovereign command, had thoughts of turning his victorious arms against the Britons; but they, having got notice of his design, averted the impending storm, by consenting to pay a tribute. Soon after Edwin, at the instigation of his queen Ethelburga, and, as some say, of his chief minister Coisy, who was also the high-priest of his idolatrous religion, embraced the Christian religion, together with all his court*: but this change of faith made no change in his disposition. Grown more haughty and insolent, by a continued series of successes, he affected every external mark of absolute authority, which at length awakened the jealousy and resentment of all the other princes of the heptarchy, and in particular of Penda, king of the Mercians, a restless, savage, bold and enterprising man, who, joining with Ceadwalla, or Cadwallen, king of the Britons, who had also been oppressed by Edwin, they brought their united forces into the field, resolved to shake off the yoke of the Northumbrian prince, or perish in the attempt; and advanced as far as Hatfield, in the west-riding of Yorkshire, whither Edwin, on his side, led his army to meet them. After an engagement which was fought with desperate fury on both sides, and which for a considerable time rendered the fate of the day uncertain, the confederate princes gained a complete victory. Edwin was left dead upon the field, after having beheld his son Offrid slain before his eyes with an arrow, and his Northumbrians fled before the allies, who made the most inhuman use of their victory. This fatal event befel Edwin on the 12th of October, A. D. 633; and in the forty-eighth year of his reign, Eadfrid, his second son, was treacherously put to death by the conqueror Penda, and his queen Ethelburga fled with Paulinus bishop of York into Kent, the king of which country gave her the most hospitable reception, assigned certain lands for her subsistence, and made Paulinus bishop of Rochester.

* Edwin was baptised in the year 627, being the eleventh of his reign, at York, by the hands of Paulinus, whom he made bishop of that see.

The people of Northumbria, miserably harrassed by the barbarity and tyranny of their new masters, resolved to make an effort to recover their liberty. Osric, a relation of Edwin, seized the kingdom of Deira, and Anfrid, the son of Ethelfrid, who had taken refuge with his brothers Oswald and Oswy in Scotland, where they had all three been converted to Christianity, got himself elected king of Bernicia; but the reigns of these two princes were of a very short duration; for Osric having besieged Ceadwalla in York, the Briton made a furious sally, and with his own hand made Osric pay the forfeit of his rashness with his life: after which he marched against the new monarch of Bernicia, and, falling upon him unawares, a terrible slaughter of the Bernicians ensued, and Anfrid shared the same unhappy fate with Osric. Our old historians pretend, that this was a judgment which befel these two princes on account of their having apostatized after their accession to the throne.

Ceadwalla now exercised the most unlimited cruelty against the wretched Northumbrians, and behaved in every respect, more like a tyger than a man; but heaven did not permit him long to prosper in his treachery and blood-thirsty disposition. Oswald, the second son of Ethelfrid by Acca, Edwin's sister, who was then an exile in Scotland, bravely undertook to relieve his distressed countrymen from the oppression they groaned under; and gathering together an handful of men, animated with that glorious enthusiasm of liberty which ever produces the greatest effects, he marched against the tyrant, who, secure in the infinite superiority of his troops, looked upon Oswald and his little army as a sacrifice devoted to his pride and ambition, and went to meet them, rather as a prey than an enemy. Both parties met at a place a little to the northward of the wall of Severus, now called Benfield. Ceadwalla advancing at the head of his army, which he termed invincible, in order to force the intrenchments of the enemy, was shot to the heart by an arrow, and instantly fell dead on the field. This unexpected accident struck his men with a panic, of which the Northumbrians taking advantage, rushed forth from their camp, and fell upon them with such fury, that in a short time, a total rout ensued. Oswald, full of wonder and gratitude for a success which was evidently the immediate work of God, erected a cross on the spot, and called the name of the place Heoffenfelt, or Heaven's Field.

This glorious victory, which happened in the year 634, made Oswald absolute master of the kingdoms of Deira and Bernicia, to which he had a double title, as heir to his father Ethelfrid, and his mother Acca, Edwin's sister. No sooner was he peaceably seated on the throne than he sought to make his people forget, by the mildest administration, the heavy oppression they had so long groaned under. He enacted several salutary laws, polished the minds and manners of his subjects, and in every respect shewed himself a prince worthy of reigning over a free and generous people. Among the many virtues which adorned the heart of this monarch, none rendered him more deservedly dear to his people than his extensive charity, of which historians record many rare and noble instances: in a word, the excellency of his character induced the other princes of the heptarchy to raise him with one consent to the supreme command of their confederacy. Unhappily it produced a very different effect on the mind of Penda, the Mercian king, who, jealous of the fame of Oswald, and impatient of a superior, entered his kingdom with a powerful army. Oswald in haste assembled such troops as were at hand, and marched to oppose the invaders. Both armies engaged at a place then called Maserfield, but which, from the fate of that day, was afterwards named Oswestree. The battle went against Oswald, who was slain in the thirty-eighth year of his age, A. D. 642, and in the ninth of his reign, leaving behind him a son, named Ethelwold, who being an infant, the Bernicians chose Oswy, the brother of Oswald, for their king; and the Deirians placed their crown on the head of Oswin, the son of Osric, and cousin to Edwin the Great.

The strictest union subsisted between these two princes so long as the arms of the formidable Penda threatened them with daily invasions; but no sooner was that apprehension removed by Penda's being engaged in other wars, than Oswy, taking advantage of the inactive disposition of his brother Oswin, formed the design of invading his territories. That pacific prince thought to mollify his brother by every possible concession; but finding that method ineffectual, he had recourse to arms. However, when the two armies were on the point of engaging, Oswin, finding that he had not a force sufficient to encounter with his brother, disbanded his troops, and took refuge for his own person in the house of count Hunwald. This nobleman, regardless of the laws of hospitality, basely delivered him up to Oswy, by whose orders he was murdered at a place called Ingethlongum, now Gelling, near Richmond, in the year 651, and was succeeded on the throne of Deira by Edelwald, son of the excellent Oswald, whom the people of that kingdom chose out of resentment to the treachery and baseness of Oswy.

The new king, sensible that he had every thing to dread from the restless temper of Oswy, irritated by disappointment, sought to support himself against his power by leaguings with Penda, whose hatred hatred against the Northumbrians had not subsided, though now on the verge of eighty. The king of the East Angles joined also in this league. Oswy in vain sought to bring over Penda from the confederacy by the means of bribes and submission; the haughty Mercians sacrificed every consideration to his thirst for revenge, and committed such frequent and heavy depredations on the dominions of the king of Bernicia, that this latter was at length obliged to take up arms in his own defence, and bound himself by a solemn vow to found twelve monasteries, and devote his daughter to a monastic life; thus fondly and ingloriously attempting to traffic with heaven for its assistance.

The army of the confederates and that of Oswy met near a place now called Leeds, in Yorkshire. Here Ethelwold acted a part which some historians condemn as treachery, but to which he was determined by motives of policy and self-defence. Fearful that he should become the prey of which ever party had the victory, he resolved to remain inactive, and wait the event. Accordingly, when Penda and the king of the East Angles attacked the Bernicians, instead of joining them on the onset, he wheeled off to some distance with his Northumbrians. The forces of the two former thinking themselves betrayed, gave back in great disorder, and the two chiefs were slain in attempting to rally them. A total rout now ensued, and the stream of the river Air was choked with the dead bodies of those who precipitated themselves therein, to avoid the fury of their pursuers.

This victory, which was gained in the year 655, opened Oswy a way into Mercia, of which he made the entire conquest, obliging the sons of Penda to seek refuge in another kingdom. In consequence of this increase of power, he was chosen chief of the Saxon confederacy, to which no one had succeeded since the death of Oswald; but so rigorous was his administration, and so rapacious were his substitutes in the exercise of their several departments, that the oppressed Mercians had recourse to arms, in order to throw off a yoke that was now grown insupportable. Their efforts were attended with the desired success; the Northumbrians were compelled to abandon the kingdom, and Wulpha, the son of Penda, assumed the crown, A. D. 670.

Oswy, however, soon found himself indemnified for this loss by the acquisition of Deira, to which kingdom he succeeded upon the death of Ethelwold, who left no issue; but the two kingdoms did not long continue united; for in a little time he gave Deira to his natural son Alfred, and ended his days in peace, after a reign of twenty-eight years; during which he had experienced numberless vicissitudes of fortune, owing to a spirit of ambition, which continually prompted him to invade the rights of others, in order to aggrandise his own power. Before he died he endeavoured to establish himself in the good opinion of his subjects, by making an atonement for the death of Oswin, to whose memory he erected a monastery on the spot where he was murdered; thus endeavouring at once to blind mankind, and compound with an offended God for acts of impiety.

After his death, which happened in the year 670, Egfrid mounted the throne of Bernicia; and, partaking of the same ambitious disposition with his predecessor, he found means to engage the subjects of Alfrid to rebel against him, who thereupon quitted the throne, and fled to Ireland for refuge, where he led a life of study and retirement.

Egfrid was a prince of a bold, enterprising, and active genius. Soon after his accession, he found himself obliged to take up arms against Wulpha, king of the Mercians, who had entered his territories in an hostile manner, and whom he quickly compelled to retreat. His reign was distinguished by the remarkable contest he had with Wilfred Bubow of Canterbury, whom he expelled from his see, and who set the first example of appealing to the see of Rome, whose power, however, was so inconsiderable in this island at that time, that both the king and his council set at defiance a decree of the pope in a synod, restoring Wilfred to his see, and even committed that prelate to close confinement for the affront he had put upon the royal jurisdiction and authority. He attempted the conquest of Ireland, in which he failed; and, to make amends for his disappointment, turned his arms against Scotland, notwithstanding a treaty of alliance which he had concluded with Eugenius, king of that country, and penetrated as far as Galloway, marking his progress with fire and sword. In this invasion he was assisted by the Picts; but Eugenius, opposing stratagem to force, secretly prevailed on the Picts to draw off their forces from Egfrid, who being thus deserted, was no longer in a condition to withstand the powerful forces of the Scottish king, by whom he was attacked with such fury, that after seeing most of his army cut to pieces, and being wounded himself, he was glad to retreat with his life to his own kingdom. Raging with disappointment, and meditating the most severe revenge upon the Picts for their treachery, he took the field early in the ensuing year, and entered their country with a powerful army; but, being blinded with his fury, he neglected every necessary precaution, and suffered the enemy to draw him into an ambush, where he lost his army and his life together, in the year 686. The Picts made the best use of their victory, recovered part of their country which they had lost, and threw off the yoke of the Saxons, to whom they never afterwards paid any tribute. The Britons likewise, availing themselves of this favourable conjuncture, seized those portions of dominion which had been wrested from them, and entirely recovered their liberty.

Egfrid dying without issue, the Northumbrians recalled Alfrid from his exile in Ireland, and placed him on their throne. He was not able, however, to recover those places which the enemy had taken, and therefore contented himself with defending those territories which remained to him against their incursions and ravages, by which they kept him in continual alarms during the eight and twenty years that he reigned. He died in the year 705, leaving his son Osred, an infant of eight years old, under the care of a nobleman named Berectfrid, who seems to have discharged with great fidelity and bravery the important trust committed to his charge. Alfrid appears to have been a prince of great learning, genius, and talents, and of a spirit not to be depressed by adversity, nor appalled by danger. Like his predecessor, he rejected the pretended authority of the see of Rome; and, notwithstanding the pope's decree in favour of Wilfred, he would never suffer that haughty prelate to be restored to his bishopric.

Scarcely were the funeral obsequies of the deceased Alfrid ended, when an ambitious nobleman of the name of Eathwulf, taking advantage of the minority of Osred, began to raise dangerous commotions in the state, and at length usurped the throne, while the infant king and his tutor were driven for shelter to the fortrefs of Banbury, in Oxfordshire, where the usurper did not suffer them to remain long before he marched in person, and laid siege to the place; but, through want of policy, he lost the acquisition he had gained by treachery and rebellion. The deposed bishop Wilfred had found means to raise a considerable party in the kingdom, who openly espoused his cause, and used all their endeavours with Eathwulf to have him restored; but this latter positively refused to comply with their request, threatening, moreover, the destruction of the prelate and all his party, unless he instantly quitted the kingdom. By this unseasonable and obstinate severity he brought on his own fall; for the bishop's party joining with those who were in Osred's interest, a powerful conspiracy was formed, by which, in less than two months time, the usurper was driven from the throne, after having been obliged to raise the siege with precipitation: and now Osred, being reinstated in the throne of his ancestors, offered a reward for apprehending Eathwulf, who, being abandoned by all his former friends, was taken and beheaded.

Osred, when come to manhood, gave a loose to the most abandoned debauchery: he stopped at nothing to satisfy his brutal lust and sensuality: in a word, he seemed to use every method to alienate the affections of his subjects, in which he succeeded but too well; for in a short time they rebelled against him, and set up Kenred and Osric, which latter was a descendant of a bastard son of Ida, the founder of the kingdom of Northumberland; and joining them with all their forces, they defeated the king in a pitched battle, which deprived him both of his crown and life, A. D. 716, the nineteenth year of his age, and the eleventh after his first ascending the throne.

After the death of Osry the crown was bestowed on Kenred, who held it but two years. His short reign furnished no particulars worthy record. He dying, the kingdom came to Osric, whose reign likewise affords no remarkable transactions. He died after having sat on the throne eleven years, and left the succession to Ceolwulf, brother to his predecessor Kenred. This prince, who had a strong turn to devotion, after a reign of seven or eight years, assumed the monastic habit, and resigned the crown to his nephew Edgbert, a wise and brave prince, equally skilled in the arts of war and peace, an upright monarch, and a sage legislator. Soon after his accession to the throne his kingdom was invaded by the Picts and Mercians: he had also some dissensions of a domestic nature, which troubled his reign. In the year 740, we find him besieging Kenewulf Bubon, of Lindesfarne, in his own church, and leading him prisoner to Banbury. Edgbert was infected with the same ridiculous enthusiasm with several of his predecessors, whose steps he followed in abdicating his throne, to end his days in a monastery, notwithstanding the most earnest remonstrances of the neighbouring princes, who, from the high opinion they entertained of his abilities for governing, offered to share a part of their territories with him, if he would continue to hold the reins of power. At his abdication, which was in the year 757, he resigned his crown to his son Osulf, who, in less than a year afterwards, was murdered by some of his own family.

The throne was now filled by Mollo Ethelwold, though no way related to the blood-royal; and, if we reflect upon the savage manners of those times, it will not appear improbable that this successor of the unhappy Osulf might have paved his way to the crown by mitigating the murder of his sovereign, after having secured a party in his own favour. Be that as it may, this irregular election proved the source of numberless calamities, and in the end of the subversion of the Northumbrian state. Oswin, a powerful nobleman, excited a dangerous rebellion against Ethelwold, who defeated and killed him in an engagement near Melros; but was soon after slain himself by Alchred, the son of Osred, who took possession of the crown; and after a reign of nine years, being deserted by all his nobles, was obliged to save his life by flight, and Ethelred, the son of Ethelwold, was chosen king in his stead in the year 774; but, after a short reign of five years, was expelled by Ælfold (son of Osulf, and brother to Alchred), who held the reins of government eleven years, when he was deposed and murdered by a powerful army, who had taken up arms in support of Osrid the son of Alchred, whom they seated on the throne in the year 789. This prince, however, by his weakness and inability to govern, rendered himself so contemptible to his people, that in less than two years they compelled him to abdicate a throne he was so unworthy to fill, and to retire to a monastery, where he ended his days in that obscurity for which nature seemed to have designed him. Ethelred was now recalled to fill his place; but no sooner had he reascended the throne than he began to give new proofs of his cruel and vindictive disposition. He murdered duke Eardulf; he put Oelf and Oelfwin, the sons of the late king Ælfwold, to death, and, not content with this, he embued his hands in the blood of the unhappy Osred, who had taken refuge in the Isle of Man, from whence this cruel tyrant decoyed him by the most flattering promises, and, as soon as he had him in his power, most inhumanly caused him to be murdered at Aynburg, in the year 792. With this ill-fated prince the line of Edric became extinct, and the Northumbrians were punished for their perfidy and treasons with all those miseries that are the concomitants of a disputed succession. Ethelred, however, in a short time afterwards, fell a victim to the same bloody treachery which he had exercised towards others, being killed, in the year 796, in a rebellion of his subjects at Cobre, and succeeded by one Osbald, or Oswald, a nobleman, who, being forsaken by his adherents before the expiration of a month, was obliged to betake himself to flight to save his life; and retiring into Scotland, there died in a convent. The sovereign power was now vested in Ærdulph; but his reign proved as tempestuous as those of his predecessors: his subjects frequently rose up in rebellion against him, till at length, after having held the sceptre ten years, he was glad glad to escape out of the kingdom with his life, and take refuge in the court of Charlemagne, or Charles the Great, in the year 806.

The possession of the crown of Northumberland was now become so precarious, that no king could be found to venture on it; so that there ensued an inter-regnum of above thirty years, during which time the kingdom was a prey to continual intestine broils, and the object of contempt to all surrounding nations. At the end of that term, namely, in the year 827, they were totally subdued by Egbert, king of the West Saxons.

And here all good authority fails us in regard to the history of this kingdom: we shall not therefore tire either the reader's patience or our own with endeavouring to reconcile different accounts of uninteresting events, but proceed in the order we have hitherto observed, which leads us to,

The Kingdom of the EAST ANGLES.

THE convenient proximity of this island had induced many adventurers to emigrate from the continent in search of lands and settlements here. Among others, a considerable number of Angles, under warlike leaders, landed about the year 527 on that part of the coast reaching from the mouth of the Humber to the Thames. On their first arrival they met with a stout resistance from the Britons, who endeavoured to oppose their settling on this island; but the Saxon chieftains, more enured to the toils of war than the then race of Britons (who, as I have taken occasion to remark in another place, had been softened and enervated by the introduction of the Roman manners), prevailed over the latter, and secured to themselves the possession of the several countries they had invaded. Of the twelve leaders who brought over the East Angles, Uffa was the survivor, who, in the year 575, took upon him the regal title, and thereby became the founder of the kingdom of the East Angles. He enjoyed his new-acquired sovereignty only three years; and, dying in 578, was succeeded by his son Tityst, of whose reign we have no particulars. He was succeeded in 599 by Redwald, the most illustrious prince of the Saxon race, whose deeds we have already taken notice of in the history of the kingdom of Northumberland; and therefore we shall pass on to his son and successor Erpwald, who was in every respect the contrast to his father's character, and rendered himself odious in the eyes of his subjects by every meanness which could disgrace a prince. During his reign, he was little better than the substitute of Edwin king of Northumberland, to whose counsels and will he submitted himself and kingdom in the most inglorious manner; and Edwin would have found no difficult task to have bereaved him of the shadow of authority he possessed, and even of the name of King, had not the dictates of gratitude prevailed over those of ambition in the mind of that monarch, and put him in mind of what he owed to the memory of Redwald, his former protector and ally. Towards the latter end of his reign, Erpwald turned Christian, by which act he incensed his subjects, who were strongly addicted to Paganism; and this, added to the many other reasons of discontent he had given them, produced a rebellion which cost him his life, being assassinated by one Rubbert, a pagan; during whose short sway of three years, the Christian religion was entirely banished from the kingdom of the East Angles. This usurper being removed from the throne by death, or otherwise, the East Angles filled it with Sigebert, son to Redwald's queen by a former husband. This Sigebert had been banished, during the life time of Redwald, by that monarch, who was jealous of his abilities and popularity. Being now recalled, he mounted the throne in the year 636. His first attention was to restore Christianity among his subjects, in which pious endeavour he met with great success, through the assistance of one Felix, a Burgundian priest, and a Scotch or Irish monk, called Furceus. He followed the work of reformation with unwearied assiduity, and, in order to establish the holy faith in the hearts of the rising generation, he established several schools, where the gospel was publicly taught. Having thus, as he thought, secured his favourite plan on a firm foundation, he himself resigned his throne to his kinsman Egric, and embraced a monastic life, where he remained till the kingdom being attacked by Penda king of the Mercians, Sigebert, yielding to the pressing importunities of his former subjects to command their forces, quitted his retirement, and took the field against the invader; but fortune declaring against the East Angles, he, with his relation and successor, Egric, were defeated, and lost their lives, about the year 652.

Annas, a prince of the blood-royal, was now raised to the throne, whose virtues and abilities seemed to entitle him to a better fate than what he met with. The furious Penda ravaged his territories with fire and sword, out of revenge for his having given asylum to Cenwall, king of the West Saxons, and afterwards re-establishing that prince on his throne; and both sides coming to an engagement, Annas was slain, together with his eldest son, and left his throne and the conduct of the war to his brother Ethelbert.

This prince, who succeeded to the crown in the year 654, and who was naturally weak and pusillanimous, finding himself unable to cope with Penda, basely deserted the cause of his country; and, forgetting all he owed to the ties of blood and honour, made an alliance with the invader of his kingdom, and even joined him in his descent on Northumberland, where they were both killed by Oswy, king of that country, as we have shewn in its place. The throne was filled by his brother Ethelwold, the transactions of whose reign are wholly unknown. He was succeeded by Eardulph, son of Ethelbert, in 664, who, after a reign of nineteen years, left the crown to his brother Ealpwald, at whose death, which happened in the year 692, it passed to Bearn, who reigned till 714, and then left the kingdom to Ethelred, who, in 749, was succeeded by his son Ethelbert, a prince famous for his great learning and unbounded charity; whose generous soul not suffering him to suspect others of baseness or treachery, he was drawn into a snare, which had been laid for his life, by Offa, king of the Mercians, who, upon his death, joined East Anglia to the Mercian dominions

The

The Kingdom of the MERCIANS.

THIS kingdom, the seventh and most considerable of all the heptarchy, was founded, A. D. 582, by Crid, or Crida, who was a descendant from Withelga, the second son of Woden. Crida died A. D. 594, in the second year of his reign.

Upon his death Ethelbert seized upon this monarchy, to which he laid claim, as being the lineal descendant of Hengist, the first Saxon king; but, in a short time afterwards, he restored it again to Webba, the son of Crida, who, after a reign of nineteen years, bequeathed the throne to his son Penda, A. D. 614, whom Ethelbert kept from the succession by setting his cousin Cheorl on the throne, who held it for ten years; after which Penda assumed the reins of government, A. D. 624, and in the fiftieth year of his age. We have already had occasion to give the character of this prince in our account of the other kingdoms of the heptarchy. We shall, therefore, only remark, that he was a most implacable foe to Christianity, and put to death no less than five Christians, and yet, by a strange contradiction, he does not appear to have shewn the least resentment against his son Peada for embracing this religion, and even winked at his introducing a great number of Christian priests into the Mercian dominions, who openly propagated the gospel-faith.

We have already related the manner in which he lost his life in a battle against Oswy, king of the Northumbrians, A. D. 655.

His son Peada succeeded him, but to a part only of his dominions, the conqueror Oswy having over-run the rest of the Mercian kingdom, of which he kept possession till the death of Peada, who was poisoned by his wife, some say his mother, in the year 657, when he seized upon the whole.

He was, however, soon driven from his usurpation by the brave Wulpha, second son of Penda, who was a prince of excellent talents for government, had they not been impaired by a spirit of ambition and jealousy, which prompted him to frequent wars with his neighbours, in which he generally proved unsuccessful. He made the conquest of the Isle of Wight, of which he afterwards made a donation to Ealdwalch, king of the South Saxons. It should seem that he also over-run the kingdom of the East Saxons, as we find him bestowing the bishopric of London, the capital of the East Saxon kings, upon a monk called Wina. After a tempestuous and unsettled reign, he died A. D. 675, being the same year in which he fought a memorable battle with Eswin, king of the West Saxons. He left his crown to his son Kenred, who, being of a mean and dastardly disposition, suffered himself to be set aside by his uncle Ethelred, a prince possessed of great talents for war, but of a more contracted ambition than his father and brother. His first warlike enterprise was against Lothair king of Kent, whose kingdom he over-run, almost without resistance, in the year 676*. The next military achievement was against Egfrid king of Northumberland, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, which was fought in the year 679; but afterwards a peace was made between them, through the mediation of Theodore archbishop of Canterbury, in which it was stipulated that Ethelred should pay a sum of money to the Northumbrian king, in consideration of the death of his brother Eswin, who had been slain in the fight.

And now, by the joint consent of the king and the states of Mercia, that monarchy was divided into the five provinces of Worcester, Litchfield, Leicester, Lindsay or Ceadneester, and Hereford. About this time also, namely, in the year 697, his queen Ostraitha was murdered by the people of the northern part of Mercia; and the little concern Ethelred shewed to revenge her death, has given great reason to believe that it was perpetrated by his order, or at least with his privacy. A. D. 704, we find Ethelred a monk, having two years before resigned his kingdom to his nephew Kenred, from whom he had unjustly taken it, and whose meek disposition had never given him the least trouble in the possession.

Kenred then mounted the throne of the Mercian king, in the year 702, and, after reigning only four years, resigned the reins of government into the hands of his uncle Ceolred, a prince as active and enterprising as his kinsman was slothful and contemplative. The contempt he shewed for the clergy, whose rights he never suffered to stand in competition with his views of interest and glory, soon created him powerful enemies among that numerous body, who found means to take him off by poison, in the year 716, being the tenth of his reign. He maintained a long and desperate war with Ina, king of the West Saxons, in which neither side could boast of any decisive advantage.

He was succeeded by Ethelbald, grandson of Eoppa brother to Penda, whose personal accomplishments and heroic spirit, had rendered him so redoubtable to Ceolred, that this prince had banished him the kingdom during his life time. Ethelbald's first step, after coming to the crown, was to invade Northumberland, in which he acted manifestly against all the ties of honour and justice; but while he was prosecuting this iniquitous step, his own dominions were invaded by the West Saxons, under Ethelhard, whom he quickly obliged to retreat with loss into his own country. During the course of his reign he was engaged in several other wars with the neighbouring states of the heptarchy, but at last was defeated by Cuthred, king of Wessex; and, in 755, lost his life in a rebellion of his subjects, headed by one Beornred, whom the mutineers afterwards chose for their king.

The nobles of the kingdom, incensed at this insolence of the rabble, exerted all their power and influence to make head against them, which they did so effectually, that Beornred had not time to settle himself in his usurped dignity, when he was driven headlong from the throne, and Offa, nephew to the murdered king, was elected sovereign of Mercia. This prince, whose character is very differently drawn by different historians, seems to have sacrificed every other consideration to the thirst of glory, and the desire of aggrandising his name. The first act of his reign was the entering the territories of Ealdric, king of Kent, whom he slew with his own hand, in a battle fought near Otford upon the Darent. He next turned his arms against the Hastings, a people, concerning whom we know little more than the name, and who were supposed to be a remnant of the Britons. These he totally subdued in the year 771, after which he undertook a war against Alcuin, another of the Kentish kings, whom he also conquered and made tributary. He likewise defeated Kenewulph, king of the West Saxons, near Benington, or Benson*, and made himself master of that place. Still following the career of his successes, he marched into Northumberland, victory declaring for him where-ever he came. The rapid success of his arms, and the height of power to which he had now raised himself, could not fail of alarming all the neighbouring Saxon states, who began to tremble for their liberties; and, in order to prevent themselves, if possible, from falling a prey in their turns to the all-conquering monarch of the Mercians, they, in the year 776, applied to Charlemagne to interpose his good offices in their behalf, who exerted himself so effectually on the occasion, that Offa, who had conceived a singular esteem for a prince, whose valour and prowess so nearly resembled his own, consented to make peace with the Saxon princes, to which he was also not a little determined, through the apprehension that they might join with the Britons, who had made some inroads upon his country, in which they had met with little or no resistance from the suddenness of their coming; but Offa, being now at liberty to turn his arms against them, soon drove those invaders out of Mercia, and even wrested from them all that part of their own country between the Severn and the Wye, which he peopled with Saxons: at the same time building that famous wall of partition, which goes by the name of Offa's dyke, and extends about ninety miles from the mouth of the river Dee in Cheshire, to that of the Wye in Herefordshire.

After these exploits he took his son Egfrid to share with him in the government, and married his daughter Ethburga to Brithric, king of the West Saxons; and the Danes having made a descent upon his coasts, he repulsed them with great slaughter: so that now his reputation was raised to a higher pitch than that of any sovereign who had ruled over the Saxon heptarchy. But the murder of Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, whom he had inveigled into his power by the flattering promises of an alliance with his daughter, cast a shade over all his glories, and stamped his memory with perpetual ignominy. Whatever arts he used to cloak this heinous breach of all laws, divine and human, from the eyes of mankind, posterity have but too strong a proof of the reality of the fact, by his taking possession of the territories of the murdered prince immediately upon his death, and uniting them to his own domains. This happened in the year 792.

And now, struck with a pretended remorse for the crime he had committed, or, rather infected with the ridiculous enthusiasm of those times, he undertook a journey to Rome, in order to settle accounts of conscience with the pope Adrian I. and receive in person, a discharge in form of indulgence from that pontiff, who readily struck the bargain with him, on condition he should remit three hundred and sixty-five Mancuses† a year, to Rome, for relief of the poor, and maintaining the lights on St. Peter's altar, which, together with other liberalities to monasteries and churches, he in the most humble manner vowed to perform. But of the sincerity of his contrition, we need no stronger proof than his continuing to retain the kingdom he had so unjustly wrested from its lawful possessor. He also converted the alms originally intended for the support of English students at Rome, into an annual tax, which from its being paid on the feast of St. Peter and Vincula, (which falls on the first day of August) had the name of Peter's pence‡; and, to the eternal infamy of this nation, was levied by the pope's agents, in nature of a tribute, for upwards of seven hundred years, until it was totally abolished, together with the papal supremacy in these realms, by Henry VIII.

Offa, having finished his farce of absolution and reconciliation, left Rome, and returned home, bringing with him a bull, wherein pope Adrian confirmed whatever privileges and donations he should think fit to grant, with the advice of his council and clergy, to a new monastery, which he had made a vow to found on his safe return to his dominions, in honour of St. Alban, whose canonization he had obtained at Rome, at the town of Verulam, where that bishop's body had been found, and which, from the magnificent church and monastery, built by Offa to his memory, took the name of St. Alban's, which it has ever since retained.

He just lived to finish this monument of his pride and hypocrisy, and died, after a reign of thirty-nine years, at Offa, A. D. 796.

Offa was succeeded by Egfrid, his son and co-

† A Mancuse was in value thirty Saxon pence, or about seven shillings and sixpence of our present money.

‡ It consisted of a penny, to be collected yearly, of every family within his dominions, where the lands they were possessed of, not including tenements, amounted to the sum of thirty pence yearly rent. It was collected by the bishops, and by them paid to the pope's agents, who remitted it to Rome. This bounty, so disgraceful and terrible in its consequences, was collected in no less than twenty-three counties, of which I shall here give the names, as they will serve to shew the reader the extent of Offa's dominions.

In the counties of Worcester and Gloucester, belonging to the see of Worcester.

In Warwickshire, Cheshire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, and Derbyshire, then belonging to the bishopric of Litchfield.

In Leicester, being under the jurisdiction called Legrecastria.

In Lincolnshire, where the episcopal see was at Lindsey.

In the counties of Northampton, Oxford, Buckingham, Bedford, Huntingdon, Cambridge, and half Hertfordshire, all within the diocese of Dorchester in Oxfordshire.

In the counties of Essex, Middlesex, and half Hertfordshire, belonging to the see of London.

partner in rule; but this prince did not enjoy the dignity of sole monarch of the Mercians longer than four months, when he was succeeded by Kenulph, a prince of the Mercian blood-royal, and inheritor of all the virtues and all the ambition of their family: he made his people happy in peace by a mild and just administration, and redoubtable in war by his consummate knowledge in the military arts. The first act of his reign was to lead a powerful army into Kent, having taking offence at the proceedings of Egbert, surnamed Pren, whom historians represent to us as having usurped the throne of that country. On this occasion, he exhibited a conduct very little consistent with the character we have above given him from William of Malmesbury; for having vanquished Egbert in a pitched battle, and made himself master of his person, he most inhumanly ordered the eyes of his royal captive to be put out, loaded him with chains, and in that condition carried him with him in triumph into Mercia; and, to complete the scene of cruelty and tyranny, annexed his kingdom to his own, having first placed another on the throne with the specious title of King, but who was in fact, only viceroy, or substitute under the conqueror. The above-cited author, who seems particularly to favour this king of the Mercians, is at great pains to extol his clemency and goodness in afterwards setting Egbert at liberty, whom he represents to us as the first aggressor, having, from the humble state of a private monk, raised himself by underhand machinations and cabals to the throne of Kent, by taking advantage of the distractions of that kingdom on the extinction of the royal line in the person of Ethelbert, son of Withred A. D. 794; and that, immediately on his assuming the sovereign power, he had made inroads upon the Mercian dominions, by which rash and inconsiderate act he had called down the vengeance of Kenulph upon his head. Be that as it may, the distance of those times will not permit us to enquire minutely into the truth of historical assertions on either side; and we have nothing to direct our judgment but the comparing of facts with characters, and weighing them in the scale of morality and justice. Kenulf, after a reign of twenty-four years, was slain in an insurrection of the East Angles, A. D. 819, leaving his son Kenelm, an infant of seven years of age, to succeed him under the tuition of his sister Quendrida, who, suffering her ambition to get the better of what she owed to the ties of blood and duty, procured the murder of her younger brother: but it is certain that this unnatural sister did not long enjoy the fruits of her wicked ambition, being deposed by Ceolwulf, brother to Kenulf, and uncle to the late king, whose reign, however, was but of a year's duration, being driven from the throne by a powerful nobleman, named Beornulph, who reigned two years, and in 823 was defeated and slain in a great battle by Egbert king of the East Angles, whose dominions he had invaded. Ludican succeeded him on the throne, but proved also unfortunate, and underwent the same fate in the same space of time; after which Wiglaft mounted the throne, but was defeated two years afterwards by Egbert.

And here we shall close the history of the heptarchy, which, like a stupendous building unartfully raised, grew too heavy for itself. The different parts of which it consisted, for want of a proper cement, had separated from each other, so as to form dangerous chasms, or had insensibly mouldered into ruin. The edifice had given strong tokens of its approaching dissolution long before it fell; but even after that fall, there remained some valuable materials, which only wanted the hand of a skilful architect to be again erected into a new structure more noble and durable than the former. This desirable end was brought about by Egbert king of the West Saxons, who, after having vanquished the successor of Ludican, subdued the whole kingdom of Mercia, and six years afterwards, namely, in 829, united it, together with the other kingdoms of the heptarchy under his dominion, by the general name of ENGLAND.

Of the Customs, Government, Manners, and Religion of the SAXONS, from their first entering BRITAIN, to the Dissolution of the HEPTARCHY.

PREVIOUS to our entering upon the history of the conversion of the Saxons to Christianity, it will be necessary to give the reader some account of their civil polity, religion, and customs, before they received the inestimable blessing of the gospel, through the labours of St. Augustin and his brethren in the mission. The prevailing form of government among our Saxon ancestors, partook more of an aristocratical than a monarchical form. The most successful and renowned in war were with them considered as the first in rank, and such who were most eminent in council held the highest degree of authority. Though the body of the people were consulted upon some affairs, yet the nobility had still the cognizance, en dernier ressort, of those matters that came before the commons. They had stated places and times for holding their public meetings, to which they usually came armed, where silence was commanded by a priest, who seems to have had great authority on those occasions, insomuch that it was looked upon as a capital crime to interrupt that attention he required. Every one being assembled, some distinguished person arose and opened the cause of their meeting, when those present signified their approbation by striking their javelins against each other, or their dislike by a loud and tumultuous noise. The business of these assemblies was to chuse chieftains to preside over their several divisions, shires, villages, &c. each of which chief was assisted in his office by an accessor or fidesman, and hence, as Brady in his history of England justly observes, came our hundred courts, in which the hundredarius sat as judge, assisted by

by the principal men of the county as his assessors or jurors*. The leader or petty sovereign of these portions of territory was held in high respect by his inferiors. He had the distribution of all honours and rewards, and his favour was industriously sought after by all the officers of his jurisdiction.

We have already observed, that they generally held their public consultations in armour; but, nevertheless, no one was entitled to the privilege of wearing armour, and consequently of holding a seat in those assemblies, but such as had been approved by a council, and formally invested with these ensigns of distinction by one of the principal men, or the person next in kindred to him. In this ceremony we easily discover the origin of knighthood.

The husband, among the Saxons, saith Tacitus, settled a dowry upon the wife, and not the wife upon the husband; and when the wife proved false to the marriage-bed, he was at liberty to cut off her hair, strip her naked, turn her out of doors in the face of all her relations, and then have her whipped through the town: but this severe custom was in course of time considerably mitigated.

The children succeeded to the inheritance of their fathers without will; but, after their settlement in Britain, they altered their constitution, and bocland, or free tenure, grantable by deed, was deemed alienable by will; but in lands held by feofage, all the sons inherited alike.

The next institution I shall take notice of, was of a nature equally fatal and impolitic, but what was common to all nations of the Celtic or Scythian original; namely, that of encouraging paternal and family feuds as well as friendships; and the crime of murder was punished by a fine of cattle, to be distributed among the relations of the deceased.

The last institution regards the right which the lord of the glebe had to prescribe to his tenant the quantity and number of corn, cattle, or cloaths, which he was to pay as rent, in which we have the original of taking rents in kind, a custom which still prevails in Scotland.

The Saxons were divided into three classes, the nobles, the freemen, and the slaves, with a prohibition from contracting alliances out of their respective class. This custom continued in England so late as the passing the Magna Charta and charter of Merton, and so jealous was the legislature of any infringement of this ordinance, that the lord was to lose the benefit of his wardship, who married his ward to his disparagement, on complaint being made by any of the kindred.

With respect to religion they seem to have given into the same superstitions with other nations. They practised divinations, by lots, in a peculiar manner†, in which the priest had the direction in public matters, and the master of the family in those of a private nature. They likewise drew presages from the singing and flight of birds. Another method of divination in use amongst them, and that on which they laid the greatest stress, was by obliging the captive of a nation with which they were at war to fight after the manner of his own country, against a champion of theirs, and from the event of the combat they prognosticated the fate of the war. They also drew presages from the neighing of horses, which they considered as particular favourites of the gods, especially those of a white colour; these were fed in woods and groves, at the public expence. In this superstition they seem to have resembled the antient Persians and Romans.

Their idols, of which they had a great number, and variety, all bore a strong affinity to those of other heathen nations. Their Woden was the same with Mercury; to him they offered human sacrifices, and dedicated the fourth day of the week, or our Wednesday. Venus they adored under the name of Freja; and Tuysco, whom they believed to be the founder of their nation, gave his name to the third day of the week, called by us Tuesday. They had a goddess whom they called Eoster, and who presided over the month of April, and from whom the festival of Easter, which generally falls in that month, had probably its name. But the peculiar patroness of our Anglo-Saxon ancestors, was the goddess Hertha, or Herthus, as Tacitus calls her, by whom they meant Mother Earth, who was believed by them to interfere in all human affairs. Her residence was in a vehicle, covered with a sacred vestment, and placed in a consecrated grove in a certain island on the ocean. This moving temple was carried or drawn by cows, and attended by a priest, who alone was allowed to touch the sacred vestment. Whenever this goddess made her visitation, joy and gladness filled every place through which she passed. War ceased, animosities were forgotten, the captive was set at liberty, and a general tranquillity took possession of all minds. When she retired from the converse of mortals to her temple, or grove, the vehicle and vestment were purified in a sacred lake.

For those who are desirous of a more full account of these matters, we refer them to Verstegan and Adam Bremensis, especially the former, who gives a minute detail of every circumstance relating thereto.

The Saxons, by their original constitution, had no kings, in the modern acceptation of the word; for all supreme authority among them ended with the cause that gave it birth. After their settlement here, reasons of a political nature, and which have appeared in the foregoing account of the heptarchy, induced them to invest their chieftains with the regal authority and title; but the rights arising by conquest were equal, consequently the liberty of the people could suffer no alteration in its nature from the encreasing dignity of its chief or head.

I shall now proceed to give a short account of the laws, manners, and customs of the Saxons.

* There are yet in some parts of Germany, courts criminal which are called Zent-gerecht, or hundred-right, or court; and those who sit as president in them, Zent-groffer, or Zent-graven, i. e. judge of the hundred.

† This was done by slips of wood, cut from some fruitless tree, and distinguished by marks or notches; these they shook promiscuously together in a white cloth; then the priest, or father of the family, implored the assistance of the gods in a short extempore prayer; after which, raising his eyes up to heaven, he took up a slip three times successively, and declared the omen to be good or evil according to the mark that chanced to cast up.

They held it no disgrace for a man to spend both day and night in drinking. This practice naturally begot frequent quarrels, which were seldom ended without bloodshed, and often death. In the midst of their carousings, they would treat of the most important affairs both of peace and war, from a belief that the heart was on those occasions more free and open, and better fitted for dealing plainly, and acting fervently and nobly. Malt-liquor was their natural and favourite drink, as it still is with the commonalty of their posterity the English: their food was plain and simple, and they were famous for their wanton feats of arms and dexterity, which we see still preserved in the custom of boxing, so peculiar to this nation. Their excessive eagerness for games of chance passed almost into a proverb; and to such excess did they run in this particular, that the loser patiently submitted to become the slave of his more fortunate antagonist; and the slaves thus gained by gaming were generally exchanged in traffic, like any other part of the goods or property of the owner. But the most striking affinity between the present English and their Saxon ancestors, seems to be in those sudden fits of passion to which they are subject, and the gentleness and humanity with which they treat their inferiors when those sallies are over. In their funerals they were remarkably modest: they had no pompous rites, no gaudy monuments; the fame of the good or evil, great or ignoble deeds of the deceased being the only inscriptions they were acquainted with. They were probably ignorant of arts and sciences, and in general knew no more of husbandry than what was barely sufficient to raise corn. Their capital punishments were hanging or drowning, which answers to the pit and gallows so often mentioned in our old laws and charters. Lesser offences were acquittable by fines to be paid in horses or cattle, part of which belonged to the public, or some great man; a custom of which there are evident traces to be found in the English laws.

As to their famous ghemots, those assemblies from which our parliaments took their rise, and the several rights and dignities which composed them, the knowledge we have of them at this period is too faint to be relied on; and besides, they will enter with more propriety into the view we shall take of the Anglo-Saxon government in Britain in its full maturity, as we have hitherto done in its infancy.

I shall here close the account of our Saxon ancestors before their conversion to Christianity, and now proceed to shew the manner in which the faith was first introduced among them in the reign of Ethelbert king of Kent.

State of Religion among the SAXONS, from the Year 597, to the Reign of EGBERT, the First of the ENGLISH Kings.

ST. Gregory, having succeeded Pelagius in the papal chair, ordered a monk, called Augustin, and others of his brotherhood, to undertake a voyage to Britain, A. D. 596, to convert the Saxons to the Christian faith. The good fathers readily obeyed; but the many difficulties they had to encounter in their journey, and the apprehensions they conceived from the known ferocity of the people among whom they were going as missionaries, so damped the ardour of their zeal, that they dispatched Augustin back to beseech the pope that he would excuse them from the business he had sent them upon, and to which they had too hastily given their consent. But Gregory, who was not a man to be so easily diverted from his purpose, sent back Augustin with a letter of exhortation and encouragement, which as it carries with it all the marks of being genuine, and serves to shew the character of that pontiff, and how much he had at heart this work of conversion, we shall give it our readers as it is to be found in the venerable Bede, lib. i. cap. 23.

“Inasmuch as it is better not to enter upon a good work than afterwards to recede from it, therefore, my most dearly beloved sons, it behoveth you to exert yourselves with the utmost zeal in fulfilling the righteous undertaking in which, through the divine assistance, you are now engaged. Be ye therefore neither discouraged by the difficulty of the work, nor the speeches of wicked men; but, by the help of God, go thro’ with all fervour and zeal, that work which you have entered upon; knowing the greater your difficulties are in this undertaking, the greater will be your degree of glory hereafter. In all things humbly obey your director Augustin, whom we now send back to you with this our apostolical greeting, and whom we have constituted your abbot, well knowing that whatsoever ye shall execute through his advice, will in all things turn out to the profit of your souls.

“May the Almighty God have you in his fatherly protection, and grant that in his eternal kingdom I may behold the effects of your labours, albeit I may not accompany you in them. May God keep you in all safety, my dearly beloved sons. Given this 21st day of July, in the fourth year of our most pious lord and emperor Martius Tiberius, and in the thirteenth year after the consulate of our said Lord, &c.”

Together with this letter Gregory furnished them with strong recommendations to Æthereus bishop of Arles, requesting him to furnish them with all such helps as they might stand in need of in the course of their journey.

Augustin and his fellow-labourers, upon their first landing in England, sent a person as an interpreter to the Kentish king Ethelbert, declaring themselves come from Rome with offers of eternal salvation. Bertha, the consort of Ethelbert, who had been a convert of the pious prelate Luidhard, had inspired her husband with so venerable an idea of the Christian religion, that he immediately ordered dered the missionaries to be furnished with all necessities, and went in person to visit them in the Isle of Thanet, and soon after openly espoused the Christian faith; and Augustin, who had received episcopal ordination from the primate of Arles, erected Christ-church into a cathedral, opened a seminary for learning, and founded the abbey of St. Augustin.

But no sooner had this monk converted king Ethelbert, and acquired an influence with that monarch, than he began to take upon him the pompous character of Apostle of the English nation. He sent Laurentius, together with a monk named Peter, to pope Gregory, with an account of his success in his mission, and to propose certain queries relating to the behaviour of the bishops and clergy, in which he required the pope's direction and advice*. Gregory, having considered the questions and replied thereto, sent over Melitus, Paulus Justus, Meleminus, and Rufinianus, to assist him in the work of conversion; by them he also sent a large quantity of church-plate, with directions concerning erecting sees among the Saxons, and a pall† for Augustin. These additional missionaries were ordered by Gregory to recommend to Augustin humility in his behaviour, and that he should not immediately proceed to extremities, by pulling down the Pagan temples, but content himself with destroying the idols and purifying the places of their worship, by the sprinkling of holy water: "for," saith that wise and politic pontiff, "if the temples be well built, it is sufficient to alter the worship to which they have been appropriated, and to convert them into decent dwellings for the God of truth; and, by thus indulging the Pagans in the satisfaction of their senses, they will be more easily wrought upon to embrace the new religion." He likewise recommended to him the instituting of anniversary festivals of saints, and other public religious ceremonies, on which the people were to be allowed to build booths around the places of worship, and to indulge themselves in merriment and good cheer, provided the same was restricted within the bounds of moderation. This indulgence was extremely well judged in regard to the English, who were naturally fond of every thing that wore the face of festivity, or merry-making, and who would have been shocked at a too sudden proposal of fasting or mortification.

Ethelbert was now become so zealous a convert, that he bequeathed his own palace at Canterbury to Augustin for his own use, and retired to Reculver‡, in order to leave the apostle more at ease. But, notwithstanding all these marks of royal indulgence, that haughty prelate could not be contented till he had gained the supremacy over all the rest of the British clergy. With this view he used every art to soothe their bishops into a conformity with the Roman church; and, by dint of persuasion, prevailed over them to meet him at a conference, which he appointed at a place called St. Augustin's see in Worcester-shire. Previous to this meeting, in order to prepossess the British clergy with a notion of his sanctity, he had recourse to the paltry shift of miracle-working; and having procured a mercenary wretch who pretended to be born blind, in the presence of a numerous crowd of spectators, he restored him to sight. But this trick was too gross to impose upon the Britons, even in those days of darkness and ignorance; they called for more substantial proofs, and exacted that the man who aspired to the sovereign authority in spiritual affairs, should bring more authentic testimonies of a divine mission; and before they repaired to the meeting, consulted a venerable hermit on the marks by which they might distinguish if this pretended apostle was really of God, or only assumed a merit of his own invention. "If he is really of God," replied the hermit, "he will behave with meekness and lowliness of spirit; he will be the first to rise and salute you, and will arrogate nothing to himself but in common with the other followers of Christ." Possessed of this criterion, they repair to the assembly, when lo! the apostle receives them with all that supercilious haughtiness, which unhappily his successors in the ministry have but too closely copied. He peremptorily insisted on their observing the feast of Easter, and conforming in every other act of church-office to the manners of the Roman see. The British clergy, however, little edified by his behaviour, and still less convinced by his arguments, answered him, that they knew of no other obedience due to the bishop of Rome, than that which one Christian owes to another in meekness and charity; adding, that in point of supremacy, they acknowledged no other than the bishop of Caerleon. The haughty Augustin, nettled at this noble and spirited reply, threatened them with the most exemplary punishment, unless they conformed to the plan he laid down for their conduct in spiritual matters; which threats he carried but too fully into execution, by stirring up the king of Northumberland to harass their country and destroy their seminary.

He did not, however, long survive this exertion of his power; for he died in 604, after having consecrated Melitus and Justus, and was succeeded in the see of Canterbury by Laurentius, his coadjutor and successor in zeal as well as ecclesiastical dignity. The affair of the observance of Easter, was pushed by him with the same inconsiderate and unchristian heat, as it had been by his predecessor; and he actually sent Melitus to Rome to consult with pope Boniface, the successor of Gregory, about the most proper measures to be taken to enforce a general obedience. Melitus returned, after a short stay, with a copy of the acts of a synod, at which he had assisted, together with several letters from the pontiff, filled with artful persuasions and flattering promises to the chief persons in church and state and the body of the people.

But here an unexpected event happened, which for a while seemed to threaten these ecclesiastical machinations with a total overthrow. Ethelbert

* These queries, with their answers, are to be found in Bede's History of the Church.

† The pall, according to Harpsfield, (Hist. Eccl. Angl. c. vi. p. 58) is a small piece of woollen cloth, about four fingers-breadth, without any dye, and just of the same colour as when taken from the sheep: it is laid upon St. Peter's tomb by the bishops of Rome, and then sent to the metropolitan, who wears it over his shoulders when he officiates. It is in the form of a Y, the lower end of which falls down upon the breast, and the two upper ends are thrown over the shoulders. On each of these ends is a red cross. This pall makes a part of the armorial bearings of the see of Canterbury.

dying about 616, was succeeded by his son Eadbald, who, on his accession, threw off the Christian faith, and, together with the three princes of the East Saxons, returned to his original idolatry; upon which Laurentius thought it high time to quit this island, and actually prepared for his departure; but, as his last resource, put the following stratagem (almost too ludicrous for history) in practice, which however succeeded to his wish. He pretended that St. Peter had appeared to him in a vision, and after having severely reprimanded him for his intention of abandoning the flock committed to his charge, had scourged him severely, and produced the marks, yet fresh and bleeding, to the good king Eadbald, who became the dupe of this religious mummery, and instantly returned to the bosom of the church, and the desired submission to episcopal authority.

Laurentius dying in 618, was succeeded as metropolitan by Melitus, a person of noble extraction and exemplary piety, who, after enjoying the archiepiscopal dignity for six years, was succeeded in 624, by Justus, bishop of Rochester, to whom pope Boniface V. gave an authority to consecrate bishops.

About this time Paulinus converted the king of Northumberland and his court. This prelate likewise met with great success among the Mercians, great numbers of whom he baptised in the river Trent, being assisted in this pious office by one James, a deacon, a man eminent for his learning and upright life.

A. D. 634, the West Saxons were converted to Christianity by Berinus, whom pope Honorius, in reward for his labours, invested with an episcopal character as bishop of York.

Wilfred, bishop of York, effected the conversion of the South Saxons about the year 686. Their king Adelwalch had already embraced the faith from motives of interest; and a lucky incident gave Wilfred an opportunity of improving the king's zeal to the general conversion of his subjects. The people of Suffex, though inhabitants of a sea-coast, were totally ignorant how to make advantage of their situation. A scarcity of grain happening, Wilfred shewed them the way of catching fish in the sea by nets, and by marks of superior merit, impressed an high idea of his abilities on the minds of this ignorant people, who readily embraced the faith he proposed to them.

Having thus given a short sketch of the original conversions of the several kingdoms of the heptarchy, I shall now proceed to lay before my readers a concise chronological account of the history of the Saxon church, in which I shall avoid that unentertaining precision and minute detail, which however it may fall in with the taste of a particular set of readers, is far from being pleasing to the generality, who prefer amusement, blended with instruction, to those elaborate compilations or learned quotations with which our former historians abound.

The archbishops of Canterbury, in virtue of the pretended rights with which they had been invested by the see of Rome, aimed at making not only the Saxons, but the Scots and Britons also, dependent on their authority. A. D. 673, a synod was held at Hereford or Harford, in which Theodore, a Greek, then archbishop of Canterbury, produced the book of canons, and pointed out several particulars which he insisted to have diligently observed by the synods. The principal of these was their keeping Easter on the Sunday next after the fourteenth day of the moon, in the first month*. This was a stroke levelled at the Britons and Scots, who still kept their Easter by a different rule to that which St. Augustin had introduced from Rome; but what this rule was, or how they came by it, we know not. Two British bishops from Icolmkill, the seminary of their clergy, had prevailed with the Northumbrians to follow their rule; but Oswy, king of Northumberland, had so great a regard for the church of Rome, that in 666, he ordered a conference to be held on this important subject at Whitby in Yorkshire, wherein Colman, a Scotch priest, spoke on the one side, and Wilfred, then an abbot, undertook to defend the other. This conference terminated in favour of the Romanists; and Colman and the Scotch party, on being worsted, resigned their dignities, and retired into Scotland.

Another important point discussed in this synod was the priestly tonsure, which those of the church of Rome insisted should be done in such a manner as to represent the crown of thorns worn by our Saviour, in opposition to the manner of the Britons, who shaved the whole head.

About this time Sebba, king of the East Angles, putting himself into the hands of Walder, bishop of London, became a monk; and during his retirement he expended large sums of money (which he had purposely taken with him at his resignation) in pious uses. In his last illness he shewed a spirit of decency and delicacy superior to the manners of that age. Being fearful that he might in the agonies of death betray some indecency in posture or expression, he desired that none but the bishop of London and two of his own domestics might be with him in his last moments, to close his eyes. This precaution however proved unnecessary, for he expired without a groan or the least convulsion.

A. D. 677, Leutherius, bishop of the West Saxons, dying, Theodore consecrated Heddi in his stead, during whose prelacy happened the great revolution in that kingdom under Ceadwalla.

About this period also Putta, bishop of Rochester, quitted his see, and fled for protection to Segwulf, bishop of Mercia, on the invasion of Kent by Ethelbert the Mercian king. Segwulf received the reverend fugitive with great kindness, and gave him a church and a small field for his maintenance, where he ended his days comfortably.

The order of time now brings us to the year 678, when Egfrid swayed the Northumbrian sceptre, between whom and Wilfred, archbishop of York, there arose a difference which was prosecuted with all that heat and virulence, which usually accompanies ecclesiastical disputes, and in which we have the first example of the encroachment of pontifical pride over royal authority. As this controversy was productive of great effects, and is in itself both interesting and amusing, I shall be more particular in my relation of it.

A fanatical delicacy in Egfrid's first queen, had put her upon denying her husband the rites of the marriage bed. The king, sensible that Wilfred had a great influence over the mind of his consort, whom he loved with a warm affection, applied to that prelate to use his endeavours to argue her into a more compliable disposition. Wilfred, on the contrary, rather strengthened her in her first scruples, insomuch that, instead of answering the king's expectations, she even solicited him to follow her example, at the same time pressing him in the strongest terms to suffer her to retire into a monastery.

Egfrid, justly incensed at this treacherous behaviour and disobedience of the prelate, whom he had honoured with his confidence in so delicate a point, and resolved to dispute the heart of his wife with the monks, forbade her entertaining any farther thoughts of depriving him of her society by so rash a step, at the same time using every art he could devise to awake in her a proper sense of her duty, and win her back to his embraces: but all proved vain; for the infatuated princess, mistaking these proofs of conjugal affection for persecution, fled out of her husband's power to Ely.

Such a conduct opened the eyes of Egfrid, and cured that monarch of his fondness; and he soon after married again. And now, thinking he had just reasons to fear for his own authority and safety while a subject lived under him so ambitious and powerful as Wilfred, he determined to secure his own peace and sovereignty by crushing this formidable priest, and began to put his intentions in practice by seizing certain revenues belonging to St. Peter's church at York. This step ended in an open rupture between him and Wilfred, whose haughty temper could by no means brook such an invasion of the ecclesiastical rights; and his behaviour on this occasion furnished Egfrid with sufficient cause of complaint against him. The king, therefore, applies to Theodore archbishop of Canterbury, who at his request erected several sees in the diocese of York without the consent of the bishop. Wilfred exclaimed bitterly against Theodore and the king, and asserted his right to the revenues, which had been appropriated to the maintenance of new made prelates. The king, on his side, insisted on the legality of his proceedings, and Wilfred appealed to the decision of the papal see*. He even took a journey in person to Rome, where he presented a servile petition to the pope and council assembled for that purpose. Agatho, who was pontiff at that time, was so pleased with this first instance of an appeal to Rome, and the deference expressed to that see in the petition, that he, with the advice of the council, granted a decree for reinstating Wilfred in his rights, and denouncing excommunication against all who should oppose him therein.

The power of the Roman pontiff, however, seems to have been very little noticed at Egfrid's court; for upon Wilfred's return to England, and his presenting to that monarch the decrees of the synod, under the hands and seals of the members, Egfrid called a council of his nobles and clergy to consider of the contents, who expressed the highest indignation at the papal claims of authority, asserted there independence on the see of Rome, and concluded with ordering Wilfred to be taken into custody, and committed to close confinement, for having dared to appeal to a foreign power against the decrees of his natural sovereign and liege lord.

Wilfred had been near a year in prison, when Egfrid and his queen Hermenburga coming to the monastery of Coldingham, Æbba, that prince's aunt, who was abbess, prevailed on her royal nephew to set the prelate at liberty, on condition that he should immediately quit the Northumbrian territories. Wilfred, upon his enlargement, retired to Mercia, from whence he was soon driven by Ethelred, who dreaded the displeasure of the Northumbrian monarch, in case he should give an asylum to that factious subject. The prelate was now obliged to fly for shelter into the dominions of Centwin, king, of the West Saxons; by Centwin's queen being sister to Hermenburga, that princess used her interest so effectually at the Saxon court, that he was soon obliged to quit the country, and went and took up his habitation among the South Saxons, where he acquired great influence and power.

Having lived there for some time as bishop, and in great splendor, he was invited by Theodore archbishop of Canterbury to a conference, which being accepted, matters were compromised between the two bishops; and if we may believe Eddius, a great favourer and panegyrist of Wilfred, Theodore promised to make him his successor in the see of Canterbury. It is certain, however, that the latter wrote in his favour to Alfrid, Egfrid's successor, and to Ethelred king of the Mercians. These letters had the desired effect with both the princes to whom they were addressed. Alfrid, in particular, not only recalled Wilfred, and reinstated him in his see of York, but also put him in possession of the monastery of Rippon, as some equivalent for the dismembering of his see.

Not contented with this indulgence, he insisted upon Hexham's being reunited to his diocese, and the full restitution of all the revenues that had been secularized by the king. These insolent demands embroiled him anew with Alfrid, who drove him once more from his church, when he had again recourse to the protection of Ethelred king of the Mercians, who gave him the administration of the see of Lichcester, or Leicester; Segwulf, the Mercian bishop, being lately dead.

About this time, namely, A. D. 690, died Theodore archbishop of Canterbury, in the eighty-eighth year of his age; a prelate to whom the English church had great obligations on account of his nobly refusing to comply with the decision of the Romish synod in the case of Wilfred, and the other steps he took against the papal see; on whom, and its creatures, he appears on all occasions to have maintained an essential independency.

During his stay in the Mercian dominions, Wilfred was summoned, in 701, by Berckwald, the successor of Theodore, to a council at Oenestresfield †, where he was charged with several crimes,

* Previous to this step he went to court, and with an unparalleled arrogance in a person of his character, and a subject, demanded of the king and the archbishop, "How they dared, like a couple of robbers, (prædonum more) to despoil him of the estates given by former princes to the church, without his having been guilty of any misdemeanors?" Eddius in Vita Wilfredi

† This council consisted of almost all the English bishops. importing importing no less than degradation. But this turbulent prelate appealed from the sentence to Rome, and that in such arrogant terms as were so highly resented by the English synod, that they disseized him of all his effects both in Northumbria and Mercia; but, not to appear too rancorous in their resentment, they mitigated some part of the punishment, by leaving him the abbey of Rippon, with its revenues; but, on his making a second appeal to Rome, this was considered as a fresh aggravation of his crimes, and he was excommunicated.

And now, though seventy years of age, he undertook another journey to Rome. John VI. was then pope, and sufficiently disposed to justify the conduct of his predecessors. This Wilfred well knew, and accordingly had no small reliance on the favour of that pontiff, whom he doubted not he should engage to intercede in his behalf with the kings of Mercia and Northumberland. On the other side, the archbishop of Canterbury sent agents to Rome to vindicate his conduct, who were ordered to charge, as a capital crime against Wilfred, his refusing to obey the determination of an English synod convened under a metropolitan.

After several sittings of the Romish synod Wilfred was again fully acquitted, and sent back with letters of recommendation to Alfrid and Ethelred; the latter of whom paid some regard to the papal credentials; but Alfrid had too much wisdom, steadiness, and resolution, to leave Wilfred any hopes of prevailing on him to change his measures. But this prince being succeeded by Eathwulph, Wilfred thought proper to apply to him, in confidence of a former friendship that had subsisted between them; but herein he found himself mistaken; for Eathwulph, so far from listening to his proposals, banished him out of his dominions: but Eathwulph's reign was short; for he was deposed in about two months, and Ofred, a boy eight years old, was proclaimed king of Northumberland; and Wilfred now found himself in as high favour with Brechrid, the chief minister, as he had been detested by the former king.

Berchwald, archbishop of Canterbury, being wearied out with this long contest, and intimidated, as Eddius say*, by the menaces of the pope, thought proper to accommodate matters with a man whose haughty and inflexible spirit he could never hope to subdue. With this view, he made overtures of reconciliation to Wilfred, convoked a council near the river Nid†, A. D. 704, wherein it was agreed, after a stout resistance on the part of the English bishops, that Wilfred should be restored to the see of Hexham‡, together with the abbey of Rippon, with all their revenues and profits; in the full enjoyments of which he continued till his death, which happened four years afterwards, namely, A. D. 708, at his monastery of Oundel||.

And here I shall close my account of this interesting period in the English church with the observation of Carte in his history of England. "Such, saith he, was the issue of the first attempt made to subject the English churches to the Roman judicature, set on foot by a man of the greatest parts, character, and popularity, of any in the age wherein he lived, who employed them all in the most artful manner to propagate the principles he had imbibed, and the prejudices he had contracted in his Roman education; but in which he must have sunk finally, had it not been for some unforeseen accidents, and the troubles which an uncertain and disputed succession had raised among the Northumbrians; and which, disposing every body to put an end to all other occasions of embroiling a nation, opened a way for that compromise, which saved him and his followers from ruin§."

From the council of Nid, however, the papal authority began to gain ground daily in the British church; several monks wrote openly in favour of the Romish tenets, of their manner of celebrating Easter, and performing the ecclesiastical tonsure.

A. D. 710, a synod was held at Alne¶ by the desire of Egwin bishop of Worcester, who is said to have been the first who introduced image-worship into England in the year 712.

About this time church-music began to be improved in England. Acca, the successor of Wilfred, is particularly mentioned by Bede as being eminent in this respect.

The next ecclesiastical transaction of moment is the famous charter of Ina in favour of the monks of Glastonbury, signed by himself, his queen Ethelburga, by Berchwald archbishop of Canterbury, and by the bishops of Winchester and Sherborne. By this charter, made in the year 725, those monks are exempted from all episcopal jurisdiction. It was afterwards confirmed by the pope; but notwithstanding the many evidences brought in its favour, and the great use made of it by the see of Rome, its authenticity is very justly suspected, and no less learnedly confuted by bishop Stillingfleet in his Antiquities, to which we refer the curious reader.

A. D. 731, died Berchwald archbishop of Canterbury, after having enjoyed that dignity thirty-seven years and an half, and was succeeded by Tatwin, a Mercian monk; and about this period ends the ecclesiastical history of the venerable Bede, a most useful and learned historian††,

Tatwin died in 736, and was succeeded in his

†† As at the end of Bede's History we have a catalogue of all the bishops in England at that time, it may not be amiss to give it our readers in a note. Tatwin, as we have said, was now archbishop of Canterbury, and Adulph bishop of Rochester; Ingwald held the see of London, the only one the East Saxons had; Eathbert and Hardulan were bishops of Dunwich and Helmam, in East Anglia; Daniel was bishop of Winchester, and Forthere of Sherburn, among the West Saxons; Alwin was bishop of Litchfield, and Walchford of Hereford, or, as Bede expresses it, over all the inhabitants to the westward of the Severn; Wilfred was bishop of Worcester, and Cunebert of Cydnacester, or Lindsey; Wilfred II. was bishop of York, Ethelwald of Lindisfarne, Acca of Hexham, and Pethelm of Whithern, which had been lately erected into a see.

see by Nothelm, who held it till 741, when on his death that dignity was filled by Cuthbert bishop of Hereford, who was of noble extraction, and, by the character Bede gives of him, a person of learning, and curious in his researches. In his time was held the famous synod of Cloveshoe, which was convened for the reformation of abuses, and the laying a restraint upon the profligacy of manners, which was daily encreasing; as also for the enforcing the due performance of the priestly function. At this synod Cuthbert presided, and, with the assistance of all the Mercian bishops*, compiled an excellent body of canons. Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, honoured this synod with his royal presence, determined, by the amendment of his own life, to set an example to his subjects.

Among the many excellent canons passed by this synod, the twenty-first is of so general and excellent a nature, that we cannot forbear presenting our readers with it.

This canon decrees, "That monks or ecclesiastics shall neither follow nor affect the vice of drunkenness, but shun it as a mortal poison; since the apostle declares, that drunkards shall not inherit the kingdom of God. Be not drunk with wine, in which is luxury, nor let them force others to drink intemperately; but be their entertainment cleanly and sober, not luxurious, nor with any mixture of delicacies, nor intemperate mirth, lest the reverence due to their habit grow into contempt and deserved infamy among seculars, and that, unless some necessary uniformity compel them, they do not, like common tipplers, help themselves or others to drink till the canonical, that is, the ninth hour, be fully come." The wording of this canon plainly shews that the clergy of those days had already departed from that abstinence, and decency of manners, which was the distinguishing mark of their order in the primitive times.

Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, died A. D. 758. and was succeeded by Brethwin, of Saxon extraction, who died in less than three years after his exaltation, leaving behind him a most exemplary character for his piety and prudence. The breath had scarcely quitted his body, when Lambert, abbot of St. Augustin's, came with a party of soldiers to Christ Church, where Brethwin died, in order to carry off his body, and bury it in the monastery of St. Augustin, agreeable to a privilege which those monks claimed. Upon enquiry, finding that the monks of Christ-Church had already caused it to be interred within their precincts, he threatened them with an appeal to Rome, which so intimidated the poor friars, who well knew the haughty disposition of Lambert, and the influence he had with Paul V. then pope, that, to compromise the matter, they elected the angry abbot into the see of Canterbury, A. D. 762.

A. D. 767 died that most excellent prelate Egbert archbishop of York, who was brother to the king of Northumberland, and, by the noble stand he made against the encroachments of the papal authority, received the privilege of the pall, which had been taken from it, and with it the honour of having the three bishoprics north of the Humber made suffragan to his diocese, A. D. 736.

During Lambert's enjoying the archiepiscopal dignity, he had a warm contest with Offa king of the Mercians, whose ambition prompted him to erect an archiepiscopal seat within his own dominions, in which, by his great power, he succeeded, notwithstanding all the efforts of Lambert; and pope Adrian issued a grant for erecting Litchfield into an archbishop's see, to which all the Mercian bishops were made suffragans. This was a deadly blow to the liberties and independency of the English church, of which the see of Rome was so sensible, that the pope presently afterwards sent Gregory and Theophilact, two prelates, in the character of legates to England, who held a synod in Northumberland (at what place is unknown,) wherein several former canons were confirmed, and new ones made; all which were afterwards fully confirmed by a council called at Calcuith, and Adulph, the new-made metropolitan of Mercia, received the pall from the pope as archbishop of Litchfield: but Canterbury afterwards recovered its rights, and Litchfield was again reduced to its original state of a suffragan to that see.

Lambert was succeeded in the archbishopric of Canterbury by Athelard bishop of Winchester, a bustling prelate, and one who had considerable influence with the nobility. By his indefatigable perseverance, and warm remonstrances, he procured from Kenulph, king of the Mercians, the restoration of the privileges of his see, which restoration was fully confirmed in a council at Cloveshoe, A. D. 803, at which king Kenulph was present in person; when the severest ecclesiastical censures were denounced upon any king who should comply with such infringements for the future.

The year 804 was distinguished by the death of Alcuin, a priest of the most amiable character, and whose learned was as uncommon for those times as his piety was exemplary. He had been ambassador from Offa, king of the Mercians, at the court of Charlemagne, who, having himself a taste for literature, cherished Alcuin, and profited by his lessons; in return for which he bestowed on him every mark of royal favour, and from his tutor made him his minister; in which post Alcuin distinguished himself by the wisdom of his counsels, and the uprightness of his conduct. To the persuasions of this illustrious monk was owing the happy change made in the disposition of the monarch of the Franks, whose haughty and ambitious temper, whose unbounded thirst for power, and ferocity of manners, were by him softened into an affection for the arts of peace; and of a brutal and lawless invader, he became the encourager of the liberal arts, and the patron of genius, by founding the universities of Paris and Pavia, to which scholars of all nations were invited, particularly those of England and Scotland, which latter long asserted a claim to the birth of Alcuin, through the Northumbrians appear the most justly entitled to that honour.

In the same year died Athelard, the restorer of the metropolitical rights of Canterbury, and was succeeded by Wulfrid, a monk of Christ-Church.

A. D. 816 another council was held at Calcuith, where Wulfrid presided, attended by twelve of his suffragans, together with Kenwulph king of the Mercians, and most of the nobility. To this synod the inferior clergy were also admitted. Here several canons were passed relative to church-government, the worship of relics, consecration, &c.

A. D. 821 the same prelate held another synod at Cloveshoe, in presence of Beornulph king of the Mercians, and the temporal powers of the kingdom.

The last fact relating to the state of religion before the dissolution of the heptarchy, shall be the council held at Calcuith under the same Beornulph, A. D. 824, at which were present Wulfrid archbishop of Canterbury, and the chief of the clergy and laity. This synod was convened in order to settle certain disputes that had arisen between Herbert bishop of Worcester, and the monks of Berkeley. Here, according to Sir Henry Spelman, the method of deciding by oath was first introduced, an hundred and fifty priests being sworn in upon this occasion. The lands were adjudged to the bishop; but here we find both the temporal and spiritual powers signing the charter of confirmation.

Having closed this summary of the state of religion during the Saxon heptarchy, I come next to consider the laws, manners, and customs, that prevailed amongst them after their conversion to Christianity, to the end of the heptarchy.

The Saxons, notwithstanding their natural ferocity and barbarity, had the wisdom to make several valuable regulations for domestic peace*, which, however, were but rarely executed, owing to the tumults

* The chief legislators among the Saxons were Ethelbert, Ina, and Offa. The Digesta of the two former being in themselves very remarkable and curious, and having come down to us entire, they deserve the reader's notice. I have therefore given them a place in the notes. The laws drawn up by Ethelbert, after his conversion to Christianity, by the advice and consent of the wisest men of his kingdom, and which were engrossed in the Anglo Saxon language, were as follow:

1. Let sacrilege be compensated twelve fold, the theft of the goods of a bishop eleven-fold, the goods of a priest nine-fold, of those of a deacon six-fold, of those of a clerk three-fold, the violation of the peace of a church two-fold, and that of a monastery two-fold.
2. If the king call an assembly of his people, and any damage be done to them there, let it be repaid two fold, and fifty shillings be paid to the king.
3. If the king is at an entertainment at any one's house, and any damage be done there, let it be compensated two-fold.
4. If a freeman steal any thing from the king, let him compensate at nine-fold.
5. Let him that killeth a man in the king's own city be fined fifty shillings.
6. Let him that killeth a freeman pay fifty shillings to the king for the loss of a subject.
7. If any one kill the servants of the king's master smith, or butler, let him pay the ordinary mulct.
8. Let the violation of the king's patronage be compensated with fifty shillings.
9. If a freeman steal any thing from a freeman, let him repay it three-fold, let a mulct be imposed, and all his goods confiscated to the king.
10. If a man lie with the king's maid-servant, being a virgin, let him compensate her virginity with fifty shillings.
11. If she be a grinding maid, let the compensation be twenty-five shillings, if of the third rank twelve shillings.
12. Let the violation of the chastity of the king's victualling maid be compensated with twenty shillings.
13. Let him that killeth a man in the city of an earl be fined twelve shillings.
14. If a man lie with a maid that is an earl's cupbearer, let him compensate her virginity with twelve shillings.
15. Let the violation of the patronage of a yeoman be compensated with six shillings.
16. Let the violation of the chastity of a maid that is a yeoman's cupbearer be compensated with six shillings, that of a yeoman's other maid servants with fifty scættas, and those of the third rank thirty scættas.
17. Let him that first breaketh into another man's house be amerced six shillings, the second three shilling, and the rest one each.
18. If any one lend another arms where there is a quarrel, though no harm be done thereby, let him be amerced in six shillings.
19. If robbery be committed let it be compensated with six shillings.
20. But if a man be killed, let the murderer compensate his death with twenty shillings.
21. If a man kill another, be the ordinary mulct of an hundred shillings imposed upon him.

22. If a man kill another at open grave, let him compensate his death with twenty shillings besides the ordinary mulct which he must pay in forty days.

23. If the homicide fly his country, let his relations pay half the ordinary mulct.

24. Let him that bindeth a freeman pay twenty shillings.

25. Let the murderer of a yeoman's guest compensate his death with six shillings.

26. But if the landlord killeth his chief guest, it shall be eighty shillings.

27. If he kills the second sixty shillings, if the third forty shillings.

28. If a freeman cut down a hedge, he shall pay six shillings.

29. If a man take away a thing kept within the house, he shall pay it three fold.

30. If a freeman break over an hedge, let him compensate with four shillings.

31. Let him that killeth a man make compensation according to the true valuation in current money.

32. If a freeman lie with a freeman's wife let him make amends by buying another wife for the injured party*.

33. If a man prick another in the right thigh, let him compensate the same.

34. If he catch him by the hair let him pay fifty scættas.

35. If the bone appear let him pay three shillings.

36. If the bone be hurt let him pay four shillings.

37. If the bone be broken let him pay ten shillings.

38. If both be done let him pay twenty shillings.

39. If the shoulder be lamed be it compensated with twenty shillings.

40. If he is made deaf of an ear let it be compensated with twenty-five shillings.

41. If the ear be cut off let it be compensated with twelve shillings.

42. If the ear be bored through, let it be compensated with three shillings.

43. If clipped off, with six shillings.

44. If the eye be struck out let fifty shillings compensate it.

45. If the mouth or eye be injured, let twelve shillings make a compensation.

46. If the nose be bored through, let nine shillings be the compensation.

47. If but one membrane be bored, be three shillings the compensation.

48. If both, six shillings.

49. If both nostrils be slit, let each be compensated with six shillings.

50. If bored, by six shillings

51. Let him that cutteth off the chin-bone, pay twenty shillings.

52. Let each of the four fore-teeth, be compensated with six shillings; for the one that stands next, four shillings; for the next, three shillings; for each of the rest, one shilling. If it be an impediment to his speech, twelve shillings; if the jaw-bone be broke, six shillings.

53. Be the bruifery of the man's arm compensated with six shillings; and the breaking it, with six shillings.

54. If the thumb be cut off, let it be compensated with tumults of war, the ambition of their petty sovereigns continually engaged them to invade each others dominions, and to destroy all the good order and harmony which the short intervals of public tranquillity had enabled them to establish.

It would require a volume to give a clear abstract of all their political and civil institutions; and to draw the comparison betwixt their code and ours: suffice it then to observe, that the monarchy was limited, that the king was accountable for his conduct to the general assembly, as appears in many instances, that the crown was partly hereditary, and partly elective, during the heptarchy; the people never opposing the lineal succession; but when through imbecility, tyranny, or some atrocious crime, the lineal heir became obnoxious, and in that case, in every kingdom of the heptarchy, the crown became elective.

55. For each nail, a shilling.

56. For the least blemish, three shillings; for greater ones, six shillings.

57. A blow on the nose with the fist, three shillings.

58. If the nose be wounded, a shilling.

59. If the stroke be black without the cloaths, let it be compensated with thirty scattas; if within the cloaths, with twenty.

60. If the midriff be wounded, let it be compensated by twelve shillings; if bored, by twenty shillings.

61. If one is made to halt, let it be compensated with thirty shillings.

62. If one wounds the calves, let thirty shillings be the recompence.

63. If any man's privy member be cut off, let it be compensated by thrice the ordinary mulct; if it be bored, by six shillings; if cut, by six shillings.

64. If a man's thigh be broke, let twelve shillings be the recompence; if it is lamed, let the friends judge.

65. If a rib be broke, let it be compensated with three shillings.

66. If the thigh be pricked, for every prick be paid six shillings; if it be an inch deep, one shilling; if two inches, two shillings; if above three, three shillings.

67. If a vertebra be wounded, let it be compensated with three shillings.

68. If the foot be cut off, with fifty shillings.

69. If the great toe be cut off, with ten shillings.

70. For each of the other toes, half the price, as for the fingers.

71. For the nail of the great toe thirty scattas, and ten for each of the rest.

72. If a free woman, wearing her hair, do any thing that is dishonourable, let her pay thirty shillings.

73. Let the compensation of a virgin be the same as that of a freeman.

74. Let the violation of the patronage of the chief widow of a noble family be compensated by fifty shillings, of the next by twenty shillings, of the third with twelve shillings, of the fourth with six shillings.

75. If a man marry a widow that is not at her own disposal, let him compensate the violated patronage.

76. If a man buy a maid with his money, let her stand for bought, if there is no fraud in the bargain; but if there be, let her be returned home, and the purchaser's money restored to him.

77. If she bring forth any live issue, let her have the man's goods, if he die first.

78. If she has a mind to depart with her children, let her have the half of his estate.

79. If she have no issue, let her relations have the goods and the dowry.

80. If a man take a maid by force, let him pay fifty shillings to her first master, and afterwards redeem her according to his pleasure.

81. If she be before betrothed to another, let him compensate with twenty shillings.

82. If she be with child, let him pay thirty-five shillings, and fifteen shillings to the king.

83. If a man lie with the wife of a servant while her husband is alive, let him make double recompence.

84. If a slave kill another slave, being innocent, let him compensate his death with all his substance.

85. If a servant's eye or foot be struck off, let it be compensated.

86. If a man bind another's servant, let it be compensated with six shillings.

87. Let the robbery of a servant be compensated with three shillings.

88. If a servant steal any thing, let him compensate the same twofold.

Ina, is the first we know of who regularly summoned a great council for the purpose of enacting laws for the better government of his kingdom, and these may be considered as the acts of a Saxon parliament. The introduction to them is as follows:

"Inna, by the grace of God, king of the West Saxons, by the counsel and advice of Centred my father, and Edde and Erkenwald my bishops, with all my eoldermen and sage antients of my people, as also in an assembly of the servants of God, have religiously endeavoured, both for the health of our soul and the common preservation of our kingdom, that right laws and true judgments be founded and established throughout our whole dominions; and that it shall not be lawful, for the time to come, for any eoldermen, or other subject whatever, to transgress these our constitutions."

1. If a servant do any work on a Sunday by command of his master, he shall be free, and his master shall be amerced thirty shillings; but if he went about the work without his master's privity, he shall be beaten, or redeem the penalty: but a freeman, if he work on that day without the command of his master, shall lose his freedom, or pay sixty shillings: if he be a priest, his penalty shall be double.

2. The portion or dues of the church shall be brought in by the feast of St. Martin: he that payeth them not by that time, shall be amerced forty shillings, and, besides, pay twelve times their value.

3. If any, guilty of a capital crime, shall take refuge in a church, he shall save his life, and yet make recompence according to justice and equity: if one deserving stripes run to a church, the stripes shall be forgiven him.

4. If any one fight within the king's house or palace, he shall forfeit all his goods; and it shall be at the pleasure of the king, whether he shall have his life or not. He that fights in a church, shall pay one hundred and twenty shillings; in the house of an eolderman, or other sage nobleman, sixty shillings. Whoever shall fight in a villager's house, paying scot, shall be punished thirty shillings, and shall give the villager six shillings; and, if any one fight in the open field, he shall pay one hundred and twenty shillings.

5. He that, on his own private account, shall revenge an injury done to him, before he hath demanded public justice, shall restore what he took away, and, besides, forfeit thirty shillings.

6. If a robber be taken, he shall lose his life, or redeem it according to the estimation of his head. We call robbers to the number of seven or eight men; from that number to thirty-five, a band; all above, an army.

7. If a country boor, having been often accused of theft, be at last taken, he shall have his hand or foot cut off.

8. If any one kill another's godfather or godson, the satisfaction shall be according to his quality and circumstances: let the compensation due to the relations, and that due to the lord for the loss of his man, be both alike, and let the one encrease according to the circumstances of the person just as the other doth; but if he be the king's godson, let him make satisfaction to the king as well as the relations; but if his life was taken away by a relation, then let the money due to the godfather be diminished as it useth to be when money is paid to the master for the death of his servant: if a bishop's son be killed, let the penalty be half so much.

9. If any Englishman, who has lost his freedom, do afterwards steal, he shall be hanged on the gallows, and no recompence made to his lord: if any one kill such a man, he shall make no recompence on that account to his friends, unless they redeem him within a twelvemonth.

Offa compiled a body of laws which he published under the title of Mercius Leaga, in which there is nothing sufficiently interesting or curious to induce us to swell our note with extracts therefrom.

counties, and furnishing him with arms and ammunition, without fee or reward; for which reasons I call it honorary service; and as none were admitted to perform these grand services but such as had large estates, they could not be supposed to want any assistance from the king; and their vassals again being obliged to serve under them, there could be no necessity for funds to carry on their wars, or to pay their officers either in the field or cabinet; yet this was the age of ignorance, of superstition, and ferocity.

The same regulations ran through the whole of their administration, when not disturbed by civil wars; for we do not find that any magistrate, from the highest to the lowest, received any pecuniary recompence for the distribution of justice, if the trial by ordeal can be so called; and it does not appear that even the inferior officers of their courts were allowed any fees, but that the whole expence of all proceedings, including the charges of their meetings, was defrayed from the fines levied for particular crimes.

Lastly, let us not forget the antiquity of trials by juries, which undoubtedly were in use at this time; for according to Lambert, page 49, there were six Welch freemen and six Anglo-Saxons appointed in the time of the heptarchy, ex medietate lingue, to try causes between the Welch and the English Saxons: and these are very plainly distinguished from the twelve thanes mentioned in Ethelred's law, who were joined with the hundred-aries as coadjutors to assist him in adjudging causes at the inferior sessions, where the earl did not preside.

It is very remarkable that these jurors, or jurymen, were always men of the most unblemished characters, who did not stand accused of any particular immorality: that they were always men of property in the county in all cases civil and criminal; that they were answerable with their whole estates, real and personal, for false verdicts, unless they could plead in their defence ignorance of the law; and that the condemned parties might always appeal to the king's court, which enjoyed the same supremacy as our house of peers.

This being the true state of the trials at law in the time of the Saxons, let us be indulged in one reflection—If these trials by juries are the foundation of the English liberty, it must be when every necessary precaution is taken to procure men whose characters are unblemished, who make a conscience of their oaths, or, if that cannot be obtained, whose fortunes are responsible for a false verdict—such precautions were taken by the Saxon legislators, who, could they return from the dead, would doubtless be astonished, nay, “I will be bold to say,” would highly censure the conduct of this enlightened generation, when they heard a set of men, in a civilized, free country, crying aloud for liberty and independency, especially in courts of judicature, and extolling to the skies the privilege of juries, and, with the same breath, in all companies, openly declaring, that they had so much at heart the decision of particular causes according to their own ideas, that they would give large sums of money to be jurymen, purposely to decide the cause in their own favour; when it is plain that men so determined, if they should be called upon to serve as jurymen in these particular causes, would act contrary to the very intention of establishing juries, and with their own hands pull down that pillar of liberty, which they so zealously pretend to support.

Having given a short sketch of the religion, government, and laws of this barbarous age, we proceed to observe, that learning at this period was at a very low ebb; none but the priests and the nobles could read their own language, and not all of these; the priests could not so much as translate Latin into Saxon or Old English. This is the reason the history of these times is so imperfect, and emersed in fable and tradition, and that there is such a want of materials. Gildas copied from foreign authors, and not from any annals he found of any other historian of this country. Bede followed Gildas, with some additions; and most others Bede, and the imperfect chronicle of that time. The devastation of the Saxons probably destroyed what remains of learning were found in those days, and which, being confined to cloisters, was burnt, or buried in the ruins of the monasteries these pagans rifled and erased in their blind rage, before they were converted to Christianity. After Bede, no writer undertook to give the history of those times, till after the Norman conquest.

As to the arts and sciences, not the least traces are to be found of their existence in these troublesome times: indeed, they can never make any progress, where rapine, desolation, and cruelty, carry the brand of civil war through a divided country. The foundation and endowment of an English college at Rome is the only vestige of an encouragement given to the sciences, and this I take to have been confined chiefly to theology; and whether the students found preferment at Rome, or grew enamoured of the place, or whether they dreaded to return to a country continually in arms, one tyrant opposing the progress of another, we are at a loss to determine; but it is to be observed, that these were not the persons sent over to convert their countrymen; the missionaries chosen for this purpose were all foreigners.

The barbarous customs of these times are very imperfectly recorded; all we know is, that their dress, like their manners, was rude and despicable, that their disposition was savage, and the robustness of their constitution suited to their disposition; and if in any thing they merit commendation, it is for that temperance and simplicity of diet and dress, which gave them such a robust constitution, that, had the force of virtue been as strongly impressed on their minds as brutal strength was attached to their persons, they might have passed for demi-gods with the admirers of antiquity, who find every rare quality in the character of a Roman, while they often overlook the superior talents of the generous Briton of their own day, expiring in the cause of a country justly preferable to ancient Rome.

The reader is by this time, no doubt, heartily wearied with this dry and uninteresting period of our history: we shall therefore conduct him into a more extensive field, where his prospect will be enlarged, and he will find himself emerge from the night of obscurity and error into the more agreeable paths of enlightened certainty.

FROM

The First Founding of the ENGLISH MONARCHY by EGBERT, to the NORMAN CONQUEST.

PART III.

EGBERT, First KING of ENGLAND, A. D. 800.

WE have already shewn, in the course of the confused history of the heptarchy, that the illustrious Egbert, being obliged to abandon his country to avoid the destruction with which he was menaced by Brithric, king of the West Saxons, had fled for protection to the Mercian court, where Offa, at the instigation of his queen, refused him an asylum, and the young prince was obliged to take refuge in the court of Charlemagne. Here he made the most salutary use of his exile, by employing his time in learning the arts of government in the politest court, and under the greatest prince of the age, and in taking all the necessary steps to arrive at universal monarchy. Fortune, who had hitherto frowned on this young hero, began to give proofs of a greater complacency, and he saw the completion of his designs grow near upon the death of Brithric, A. D. 800, who had scarcely paid the debt of nature when the West Saxons sent an invitation to Egbert to return to his native kingdom, and assume the crown of his ancestors.

And now he found himself at the head of an united, rich, and powerful people, whose affection to him was the certain earnest of future greatness. It is more than probable that he had already formed the design of uniting the several kingdoms of the Saxon heptarchy under one head; but this he kept a profound secret, and even affected to appear in the light of a mediator rather than that of a person ambitious of conquests, or desirous of universal rule. Accordingly we find him bringing about a reconciliation between Eardulf king of the Northumbrians, and Kenulph king of Mercia, when these two sovereigns were on the point of deciding their differences by the sword, having actually taken the field for that purpose. This conduct, together with the just and pacific manner in which he governed his own people, begot so high an esteem of his character with the other Saxon princes, that he was unanimously chosen chief of the heptarchal confederacy.

And now, considering the inveterate hatred which the Britons nourished, not only against himself, but against all the Saxon race, Egbert very wisely determined to make them the first object of his arms. By this artful and well-judged step he not only rendered himself more dear to his allies, but paved the way to the completion of his grand design in a manner that left no room for the least shadow of suspicion.

A. D. 808, he led his army into the country of the Cornish Britons, a hardy race enured to the toils of war, who, though often on the brink of being reduced, had always hitherto found means to baffle the efforts of their enemies, and preserve their independence. Now, as at all times when attacked, they made the most obstinate resistance, and a furious slaughter ensued on both sides. On the other hand, the West Britons, burning with the same ardour for liberty, and alarmed at the attempts of Egbert to subdue their countrymen, threw all their force into the balance in their favour, so as to render this war long, doubtful, and bloody, for, though some modern historians treat the conquest of Cornwall as a cheap and easy victory, it evidently appears from the Saxon chronicle cle of Matthew of Westminster, as also from Speed, that Egbert was still engaged in this same war five years afterwards, namely, in 813*.

Egbert, incensed at the assistance which the Welch had afforded their brethren, and despairing to be able to subdue so warlike and inflexible a people, if suffered to unite; he made an expedition into Wales, and laid all that country waste with fire and sword, and wrested the province of Gwyneth from them. Not contented with this, he made a law, by which death was denounced against any Britain who should be found to have passed Offa Dyke †. Nay the English historians, notwithstanding their great fondness and partiality for this prince, tell us, that he had the meanness to wreak his vengeance on inanimate objects, and that he actually ordered that statute of Ceadwalla, the British king, which had been erected over one of the city gates in London, to be demolished. Be that as it may, he at length totally reduced Cornwall to his obedience, and annexed that country to his own dominions.

The rapid success of Egbert's arms began at length to raise the suspicion of the neighbouring princes. Beornulf, king of Mercia, the proximity of whose dominions to those of the conqueror, exposed him the most to the effects of his ambition, was at the same time the most able to oppose any attempts, as being the most powerful monarch of the heptarchy. Determined therefore to be beforehand with his formidable neighbour, he made an alliance with the Britons, and it was agreed to fall upon Egbert at the same time with their united forces. Agreeable to this plan, the Britons invaded the newly-conquered countries of Devon and Cornwall; but, in a battle fought in 823, they were defeated. Beornulf himself, who had advanced at the head of an army into Egbert's dominions, as far as Ellandunum, now called Wilton ‡, and who was prodigiously superior in numbers to the West Saxon king, was nevertheless beaten by him; and the Mercian army, which had penetrated to so great a distance from their own dominions, was almost entirely cut to pieces in its retreat.

Egbert felt a sensible satisfaction in the fair pretext which Beornulf had given him by this invasion for turning his arms against him, and joyfully embraced this opportunity of humbling the Mercian power, which was the only bar to his favourite project of uniting all the kingdoms of the heptarchy under his own dominion.

For the present, however, instead of pursuing Beornulf, he sent his son Ethelwolf, Alstan, bishop of Sherborne, and Wulfhard, one of his ealdermen, into Kent, where Baldred, then king of that country, held his power, as tributary to the Mercians. Immediately upon the arrival of Egbert's troops, this dastard vassal fled and abandoned his kingdom to Egbert, who making use of the rights of conquest, annexed it to his own dominions; and so great was his success, that all that part of the South Saxon kingdom, which had not been absolutely reduced by Ina, submitted to the victor, together with all the country of the East Saxons: so that in less than in twenty years after his return from exile, Egbert saw himself in full possession of four of the kingdoms which formed the Saxon heptarchy. In a very short time afterwards, having persuaded the East Angles to throw off the Mercian yoke; they accordingly took up arms, and Beornulf, marching to quell the insurrection, was slain. Upon his death the Mercians unanimously raised Ludican to the throne, who continued the war against the revolted East Angles, and in the pursuit of it was either slain in battle or assassinated; but authors do not agree in this point. However, it is certain that he died A. D. 823. The Mercians began now too late to be convinced of the real design of Egbert, who privately assailed the East Angles, and plainly saw that it was high time to think of securing their own liberties, instead of carrying on a fruitless war to preserve their title to East Anglia. On these considerations they elected Wiglaf, a general of approved valour, for their king, who probably would have maintained their cause against the East Angles, singly; but unable to withstand the united force of Egbert, who had now thrown off the mask, and declared openly in favour of the insurgents, he was driven from province to province, and at length retired for refuge to Seward, abbot of Croyland; and Egbert took possession of his kingdom, A. D. 825, which ever after remained subject to him. However, at the intercession of the pious abbot above-mentioned, Egbert restored the fugitive king to the throne, on condition that he should pay him homage and a considerable tribute.

Egbert now was at leisure to resume his operations against the Welch, who, from the intestine broils that prevailed amongst them, became an easy conquest to so experienced a leader, followed by troops accustomed to the arts and toils of war. So that, A. D. 829, Egbert, having totally quelled the Britons, found himself sovereign of all the country on the south-side of the Humber, and made preparations for extending his power northwards.

Northumberland, long wasted by domestic bloodshed and rebellion, was in no condition to withstand such an invader as Egbert; the throne was at that time filled by one Ealdred, who, sensible of the little dependance he could place in the loyalty or affection of the wavering Northumbrians, resolved to anticipate an event he foresaw as certain, and voluntarily submitted to the same terms which had been accepted by the East Angles, and to continue in possession of his shadow of royalty as tributary to the all-powerful Egbert.

That enterprising prince, who, by this submission, saw himself the undisputed monarch of all the seven provinces of the heptarchy, resolved to give the strongest sanction to his title. Accordingly, in the year 829, he summoned a general council of all the great men of the kingdom, clergy and laity,

* Rapin, with his usual inaccuracy, pretends, that the entire conquest of Cornwall was the work of but one campaign; but had the French historian giving himself the smallest trouble to enquire into this matter, he would have found that it cost the Saxon conqueror no less than thirteen or fourteen years of bloody contest to vanquish these glorious assertors of their native liberty.

† The exact time of enacting this law is not mentioned by historians; but it could not be till after the conquest of Mercia, in whose confines this ditch lay.

at Winchester, where, by the unanimous consent of all present, he was solemnly crowned king of England; and it was at the same time resolved to give the name of England to South Britain, then under his dominion, and to distinguish it in all edicts for the future under that denomination. Wales being at this time conquered by him, it was likewise included in the domains in England; from this time, therefore, it will be proper to distinguish all transactions south of the Tweed, by the title of the history of England*, till the time of the happy union of England and Scotland, under the title of Great Britain.

Egbert was as much indebted to his popularity arising from his great abilities, as to the force of arms, for the superior power he attained; and, if he had not been interrupted in his designs for the public welfare by the descents of the Danes on the English coasts, it is very probable that he would have distinguished himself in the milder acts of peace; but these pirates disturbed his reign by their perpetual invasions and depredations. In the year 831, they landed in the Isle of Sheppey, in Kent, which they laid waste with fire and sword. Next year they returned again with a superior force, their vessels amounting to thirty-five, and landed at Charmouth in Dorsetshire, without meeting with any opposition. They immediately marched forwards, plundering and laying waste the country as they went along.

Egbert, on receiving news of their landing, collected a slight force in great haste, and was the first time guilty of that error which has so often proved fatal to the greatest generals: he despised his enemy without knowing their force, and was so firmly persuaded they would retire as soon as he appeared, that he invited his bishops and principal nobles to accompany him, and to partake of the diversion of pursuing the flying Danes to the seaside; but he soon found his mistake; for the Danes giving him battle, victory declared in their favour. The king himself was indebted to the darkness of the night for a secure retreat, and four prelates and two earls were left dead on the field of battle†.

Two years after this, namely, in 835, a larger fleet arrived and landed in Cornwall, having been invited by the Welch, who intended to join them and throw off the yoke of the Saxon supremacy. Their design was to have surprised the king; but taught by experience, and expecting a second visit, he had kept an army of disciplined troops on foot, and upon the first notice of the Danes landing, he immediately set out to meet them. By this prudent precaution, he turned the surprise upon them, and the two armies coming to an engagement, at Heston in Cornwall, Egbert obtained a signal victory over these savages, which amply recompensed him for his former loss, and for some time freed England from their invasions. Historians say that he was again attacked by them in the year 836, and again proved victorious. In the year following this great prince, the founder of the English monarchy, payed that tribute which nature exacts in common from the monarch and the peasant, the coward and the brave, after having reigned as sovereign of England ten years, and twenty-seven as the superior of the heptarchy. He was succeeded by his son, ETHELWOLF, A. D. 838.

ACCORDING to William of Malmesbury, the illustrious Egbert, when he was dying, told his son Ethelwolf, that he might be a great and happy prince, if he did not by his indolence suffer the kingdom to crumble away, which he had, by the most laborious industry, gathered together and cemented. The event proved this speech of the dying monarch to have been uttered with a truly prophetic spirit; for that indolent disposition which he had acquired during his residence in a cloister, while his elder brother was yet living, never forsook him; and although, upon his quitting the monkish habit after his brother's death, we find him assisting his father in his expeditions, against the Danes, and behaving with remarkable courage and intrepidity, yet a love for ease was the predominant passion of his soul, and he appeared not to have the least relish for the arts of war.

He was scarcely seated on the throne, when the Danes appeared off Southampton with a fleet of thirty-three sail. Ethelwolf sent Wulfhard, a brave general, against them, who fell upon the pirates and put them to flight with great slaughter; but the death of Wulfhard, which happened immediately upon his victory, gave the brutal invaders fresh spirits; insomuch that, before the English army had retired to quarters, they made a second descent upon Portland. On this occasion, one Ethelhelm was dispatched with the Dorsetshire men to oppose them, who encountered them, and at first had the advantage; and, had he not unfortunately lost his life, might have given them a total defeat: but, the Danes making a second stand, victory passed over to their side, and the English sustained an entire overthrow.

A. D. 840 they landed again at Romney, where Herebert, or Herebyht, an ealdorman, endeavouring to oppose them, lost his life. Flushed with success, they advanced farther up the country, and over-run all Lindsey, East Anglia, and Kent, where they committed the most brutal cruelties. The next year London, Canterbury, and Rochester, underwent the same fate.

Hitherto their sole object had been plunder, and therefore they landed only in small bodies, and retired again to their vessels when the business of rapine was over, or there appeared any reason of fearing a powerful opposition: but having, in their frequent descents, remarked the great fertility of the country, they determined to make a settlement in it. Accordingly they arrived with thirty-five large ships at Charmouth, the place where they had formerly defeated the English army under Egbert. This powerful invasion awakened the indolent Ethelwolf from his lethargy, who probably more fearful of losing his beloved ease, than

* The name of England, and the appellation of Englishmen, was in use as far back as in the time of Ina, A. D. 688; but it had never been ratified by a general assembly, nor indeed could it so long as the kingdom was divided into seven desirous of acquiring any martial fame, assembled his forces in haste, headed them in person, and gave battle to the Danes; but, by a strange fatality, experienced the same ill success as his father Egbert had done on the same spot, being obliged to fly, and leave the foe masters of the field; but, for particular reasons, they did not at this time chuse to maintain the footing they had acquired.

They were not long, however, before they returned again; for in 843 we find them assisting the Britons against Wiglaf, the tributary king of Mercia, and in 845 they appeared off Parrett, in Somersetshire: but here their wonted success seemed to have abandoned them; for they were routed with great slaughter; and the check they met with on this occasion procured the kingdom a short respite from their attacks. At this time Ethelwolf eased himself of some part of the burden of sovereignty, by bestowing the kingdoms of the East and South Saxons, together with that of Kent, on his son Athelstan.

A. D. 851 the Danes appeared again in greater bodies, and with more numerous fleets; but fortune did not favour their wishes, for they were routed at two different times; once in Devon, by Ceorl, governor of that country; and another time by Alcher, governor of Kent; and Athelstan took nine of their vessels in an engagement he had with them at sea, and drove them entirely off the coast. Notwithstanding these checks, they returned again in the spring of 852, and entered the river Thames with a fleet of three hundred sail when they were least expected, and consequently they met with little or no opposition. In this expedition they took London and Canterbury, and defeated Bartulph, king of Mercia; when, thinking that nothing could withstand them, they entered Surry, and prepared to penetrate farther into the country; but, being met by Ethelwolf and his other son Ethelbald*, the two princes fell upon them, and routed them with such a slaughter as almost to exceed the bounds of credibility; yet, even after all these losses, they made good their winter quarters in the Isle of Thanet.

After this period we find no more mention made of the young king Athelstan; from whence there is reason to believe, that he died soon after the defeat he gave the Danes at sea, as above-mentioned.

A. D. 853 the Welch took up arms, but were soon reduced to obedience by Ethelwolf and his son-in-law, Buthred king of Mercia, who had married his daughter Ethelwetha.

This year the Danes made a descent from their settlement in the Isle of Thanet upon the coasts of Kent and Surry, in revenge for which the forces of those counties made an attempt to dislodge them, but with bad success; for the Danes obtained a complete victory, and the two governors, Alchet and Hudda, perished in the fight. This day's success left the Danes at full liberty to fortify their new settlement in the Isle of Thanet, where we shall leave them making preparations and collecting all their force (by means of the communication which they had open by sea) for the general inundation with which they soon afterwards overspread the face of the land, which they drowned with the blood of its native inhabitants, and attend Ethelwolf from the field to the cabinet, where we shall find his conduct too plainly verifying the prophetic speech of his dying father.

The defeat of the Danes at the battle of Okely had furnished Ethelwolf with leisure to indulge himself in the conversation of monks and the exercises of bigotry. He had shared his confidence and favour between two prelates of very different characters, Swithin bishop of Winchester, and Alstan bishop of Sherborn. The former of these who, with all the bigotry of his royal master, had more art and cunning, by the most fawning adulation, soothed him in his darling disposition, and was continually preaching up to him the joys of a holy retirement, and the expediency of despising worldly splendor for the more lasting benefits of a religious attachment. Alstan, who was the most amiable of characters, and who, at the same time, was a much better politician than his partner in the royal favour, left no stone unturned to rouse his sovereign from the lethargy into which the other sought to plunge him; but all his endeavours to animate him, by setting before him the examples of his illustrious ancestors, and the yet blooming fame of his father Egbert, were thrown away upon the supine Ethelwolf. Whenever the inroads of the Danes made the nation tremble for its safety, then indeed he listened to the counsels of Alstan; but no sooner was the impending storm blown off, when he gave himself up again to the guidance of Swithin, who knew so well how to take advantage of his weakness, that he engaged him in the most profuse and destructive donations to the church.

That nothing might be wanting to manifest his zeal for religion, he sent his young son Alfred† with a numerous retinue to Rome, in the year 853, to receive confirmation at the hands of pope Leo IV. who shewed the young prince the greatest marks of affection, and anointed him according to the manners of those times, when these two ceremonies of confirmation and unction were always administered together. On his son's return home, Ethelwolf resolved to crown his fanatical farce by taking a journey in person to Rome, and taking his son Alfred with him. Regardless of the danger his kingdom might be threatened with in his absence from those enterprising banditti the Danes, and even without naming a regency, he set out in the year 855, and was received with great honour by Benedict XIII. ‡. (lately made pope by the assistance of the Franks, in spite of the Roman people), who omitted nothing that he thought could render his stay agreeable to so great a benefactor, secure to find in his weakness an ample recompence for any civilities he might shew to him: nor was he disappointed in his conjecture; for the bigotted

* At a place called Okely, in Surry.

† Alfred, afterwards surnamed The Great, was the fourth son of Ethelwolf, and was born A. D. 849, at Wantage, in Berks. His mother, whose name was Osberga, a lady remarkable for her piety, as well as her birth. Her father was butler to king Ethelwolf, one of the principal officers about the court, his name Osar, and descended from the two first Saxon princes in the Isle of Wight.

‡ Smollett, and from him Rider, has it Leo IV. which is a mistake; for Leo IV. to whom Benedict XIII. succeeded, died in the latter part of the year 854, soon after he had performed the ceremonies of confirmation and unction on young Alfred.

Ethelwolf not only engaged to establish the tax of Peter's Pence over his whole kingdom, but also obliged himself to pay yearly, during his reign, the sum of three hundred mancuses, or merks, to be expended in tapers for the churches of St. Peter and Paul, or in such other purposes as the pope should see fit.

From one folly this weak prince passed to another; for, having taken France in his way home, he fell in love with Judith, daughter of Charles the Bald, then a widow, though very young; and, notwithstanding the great disparity of their years, was married to her. By this imprudent step he embroiled the future part of his life, and was very near paying the forfeit of his folly and rashness with the loss of his crown.

While Ethelwolf was thus bandied between love and religion, he totally neglected the affairs of his kingdom, for whose safety he had not made the least provision at his setting out on his ridiculous expedition to Rome. This want of attention to his subjects gave them but too just a plea to withdraw their obedience, and every thing began to wear such a face of anarchy and confusion, that the patriotic prelate Alstan, thinking it his duty to exert those talents with which heaven had blessed him on this occasion, and, besides, not improbably excited by motives of resentment and jealousy at the ascendant his rival Swithin had gained over him in the favour of his royal master; this Alstan, I say, engaged Ethelbald prince-royal of Wessex, and Eanwolf earl of Somersetshire, in a plan for putting the government upon a more firm foundation, by taking it out of the hands of a monarch who had given so many proofs of dotage and incapacity for rule. The young Ethelbald, who was already disgusted at his father's having refused him the crown of Kent on the death of his elder brother Athelstan, readily embraced the proposal of the warlike and politic bishop: a great part of the nobility likewise espoused these measures, and it was unanimously agreed to prevent the old king from landing with his French consort.

However Ethelwolf, having gotten some notice of the machinations carrying on against him, arrived so suddenly, that the intentions of the conspirators were in some measure frustrated. Nothing then remained but to lay aside all thoughts of carrying their design into execution, or to avow it openly, and trust the event in the hands of fortune. Ethelbald chose the latter of these alternatives, being encouraged thereto by the general discontent of the people, who murmured loudly against the king for bestowing the title and dignity of queen upon his young consort, contrary to the law which had been made by the West Saxons upon their king Brithric's being poisoned by his wife.

A civil war now appeared inevitable, when happily a few of the principal noblemen and prelates, who had the good of their country at heart, determined to use their utmost endeavours to bring about an accommodation between Ethelwolf and his son. Their generous purpose met with the wished for success: the old king, wearied out with the toils of government, and willing to end his latter days in the downy bed of peace, consented to cede the crown of Wessex to his son Ethelbald, reserving to himself only the kingdom of Kent, Essex, and Surry.

This condescension, which, by the way, does not appear to have been altogether voluntary, if we consider the measures made use of to obtain it, restored peace throughout the whole nation; and, during the two remaining years of his life, Ethelwolf met with nothing to interrupt his quiet; and, dying A. D. 857, divided his private patrimony between all his children, and his kingdoms between his two eldest sons, Ethelbald retaining the antient inheritance of the West Saxons, and Ethelbert succeeding to the territories over which he ruled himself, and which, upon the death of Ethelbert, were to devolve to Ethelred, and after him, in case he died without male issue, they were entailed upon Alfred.

ETHELBALD, A. D. 857, & ETHELBERT, A. D. 860.

THE first of these princes began his reign with the incestuous act of marrying his father's widow, the fair Judith, and governed for some time with a tyrannic sway; but being at length reclaimed by the prudent counsels of his prelates, and such of the nobles who had the honour of their sovereign, and the good of their country, at heart, he put away Judith; and during the remainder of his reign made atonement for the faults he had committed at first coming to the crown. He died in 860, and left the crown to Ethelbert, who added the West Saxon dominions to his own, governed with exemplary moderation and justice, nobly defended his country against the invasions of the Danes, who, having for some time intermitted their depredations, were become again troublesome; and, after a reign of only six years, died in 866, greatly regretted by his subjects. He was buried at Sherborne in Dorsetshire, near the remains of his brother. He left two sons, named Eadlhelm and Ethelwold; but was succeeded on the throne by his younger brother Ethelred, pursuant to the last will of his father Ethelwolf.

ETHELRED I. A. D. 866.

THIS prince's reign was full of action and disasters; he began it by a deed of injustice, in withholding from his younger brother Alfred the conquered provinces which Ethelwolf had by will bestowed on him in appanage. But a convention was shortly after made between the two brothers, who thereupon were firmly reconciled, and ever after acted in concert against the common enemy, the Danes, who were now grown so formidable, that nothing less than the strongest union could have been able to withstand them: for in this same year they landed in the country of the East Angles, under the command of Ivar, a bold and warlike chief, who had been previously invited over by a discontented nobleman, named Bruern Brocard*. They wintered in East Anglia, and at the beginning of the succeeding spring marched

* The cause of this invitation may be found as large in Guthrie, Smollett, and Rider; but we have purposely omitted it, as the several circumstances would only serve to swell the

into Yorkshire, defeated the two Northumbrian kings, Osbert and Ella, and remained masters of the greatest part of Northumberland: from thence they meditated the extension of their conquests over the rest of England; and with this view Ivar, in the beginning of the year 868*, marched southward as far as Nottingham, of which he made himself master, and fixed his residence for the winter. Buthred, the king of Mercia, alarmed at this progress of the Danes, applied to Ethelred for assistance, who was but too sensible of the fatal consequences of their invasions, to let slip the opportunity that offered of joining his forces to those of the king of Mercia; and accordingly he and his brother Alfred marched with an army of West Saxons to his assistance, and both forces joining, they lay siege to Nottingham, in which city the Danes, fearful of being overpowered if they should hazard a battle, had shut themselves up. After a few skirmishes on each side, both parties consented to a truce, which ended in a peace with the Mercians; and the pagans returned to their quarters in Yorkshire. It was in the year 870, that passing through Lincolnshire, they destroyed Bardney, Peterborough, Ely, and all the monasteries that lay in their route, sparing neither age, sex, nor quality, and carrying away every thing valuable enough to tempt their avarice†. After this they fell upon the East Angles, whose king Edmund they slew, after defeating his forces, at a place called Thetford, and subdued the whole country.

And now, flushed with success, and encouraged by the facility of their conquests, the ensuing year they quitted East Anglia, having left the government thereof in the hands of one Guthren, and advanced into the country of the West Saxons, the only power able to withstand them and prevent their making the conquest of all England. Ethelred, thus attacked, thought himself intitled to the same assistance from the Mercians, which he himself had so lately afforded them: but gratitude making no part of politics, and these people being afraid to rouse the resentment of the Danes, absolutely refused to become parties in the war; their example was followed by the Northumbrians. And thus was Ethelred left as it were alone to sustain the effects of those sons of blood and rapine. The struggle made upon this occasion by our English prince, does honour to his name and nation. Being joined by his brother Alfred, with his forces, they advanced against the savages, who had penetrated as far as Reading. Ethelwolf, earl of that country, had already fallen upon one of their detached parties at Englefield, which he had put to the rout, with the loss of one of their leaders. Being now joined by the royal brothers, they formed a very considerable force, and several battles were fought with various success, the most considerable of those was that of Ashdown‡, where the victory was determined in favour of the English, by the bravery and conduct of young Alfred; and the Danes were routed with the loss of one of their principal kings, five earls or generals, and many thousands of their common soldiers. It is remarkable that at the first onset Ethelred was at prayers within his tent, nor could he be prevailed upon by any alarm or apprehensions of danger to leave his devotion unfinished; upon which Alfred took the conduct of the day upon himself; but Ethelred, having ended his prayers, came in time to his brother's assistance, who must otherwise have been overpowered by numbers. Upon the whole, the event of the day was glorious to the English.

But the royal brothers having encountered another party of the enemy about fourteen days after, at Basing in Hampshire, had the advantage, as they also had in another action that happened two months after the former, at Merton||, where the English were at first victorious; but, pursuing in disorder, the fate of the day proved in the end favourable to the Danes, who remained masters of the field of battle; but the greatest loss was in the brave Ethelred, who in this engagement received his death-wound, and dying a little after Easter, A. D. 871§, left his kingdom to his brother Alfred.

A L F R E D, surnamed The Great, A. D. 871:

ALFRÉD, on the death of his brother, was anointed king at Winchester. Young as he was, having seen but twenty-two years, he had in this short course given such proofs of valour and native goodness of heart, that no monarch ever ascended the throne with more happy presages of being the darling of his people: at the same time no prince had ever greater difficulties to surmount at his first accession to royalty. His kingdom was exhausted of subjects; his country was wasted by lawless and cruel invaders, who had settled themselves in the very heart of it; his cities were ruined, and the nation in general worn out with the fatigue of the many battles it had so lately been obliged to sustain, insomuch that even slavery, upon settled terms, seemed more eligible than a freedom which was to be maintained only by incessant toils, and depended on precarious success in the field.

But Alfred, disdainful of inglorious ease, and superior to all the vicissitudes of fortune, betook himself to every salutary measure that could procure ease or happiness to his people. He knew that great disasters were only to be retrieved by great efforts, and was determined to shew what a king of England could do, secure of the affection of his people, and exerting the natural strength of this island.

* This year is distinguished by a great famine in England, and by the marriage of Alfred to the daughter of Ethelred, eolderman of the Gani, inhabitants of the place now called Gainsborough.

† The heroic behaviour of Æbba, the abbess of Coldingham, and her nuns, deserves particular notice, as the most exalted instance of virtue and magnanimity. In order to prevent herself, and the nuns under her charge, from exciting the lust of the brutal ravishers, she persuaded them to cut off their noses and upper lips, herself setting the example, in which she was followed by all the rest of the sisterhood present. Ivar and Hubba repairing thither the next day, and finding themselves disappointed of the pleasures they expected to taste in the arms of these maidens, became furious, and instantly ordered the monastery to be set on fire, and the abbess, with all her nuns, perished in the flames.

|| Formerly called Merantun, in Wiltshire.

§ He died at Willingham, and was buried at Winburn, in Dorsetshire: he left several children, one of whom, called Alfred, was great-grandfather of the historian Ethelward.

In less than a month after he had paid the last rites to his deceased brother, he took the field in person against the whole power of the Danes, with a force much inferior to theirs. He came up with the enemy at Wilton in Wiltshire, engaged them, and for awhile had the advantage; but being unable to conceal the weakness of his army, when he was to pursue the flying enemy, they rallied, and returning to the charge with that resolution which a consciousness of superior strength infuses, even into the most dastardly, they compelled him to quit the field. This victory however had cost the Danes so dear, and given them such a specimen of what they had to expect from a prince of Alfred's talents, that they gladly embraced an opportunity of entering into a treaty with him, by which they engaged to quit his territories, which they did, and then bending their march to London, they took up there winter quarters in that city, having entered into a treaty with the Mercians.

After having left Alfred at quiet for near five years, they landed again in Dorsetshire, and surprised Wareham Castle, the strongest fortress belonging to the West Saxon dominions; but, on Alfred's marching against them, they sued for peace, delivered what hostages he demanded, and swore by those things which were most sacred to each party, that they would retire out of his kingdom.

But such a savage and rapacious people were not to be bound by any ties, however sacred, longer than their interest concided with their assurances. This Alfred found to his cost; for the Danes, in direct violation to this solemn agreement, fell upon a party of English cavalry in the night, and surprised the city of Exeter, where they fortified themselves and passed the winter, being continually reinforced with supplies out of their own country by sea.

Alfred therefore, wisely considering that he could never hope to subdue or expel these invaders of his country, so long as they remained superior on that element, determined, with genius truly great, to raise a maritime power that should be able to encounter theirs, and prevent their landing in such numbers as heretofore. He accordingly fitted out a kind of gallies that drew but little water, and were admirably well contrived for guarding the coasts. These he furnished with men, arms, and provisions; and in the year 876, we find him at the head of his own navy, putting to flight a Danish armada, of one hundred and twenty sail, off Sanwic in Dorsetshire, which unexpected blow so terrified the Danes that were in Exeter, and against whom Alfred was now in full march, that they once more sued for peace, renewed all their former oaths, and gave fresh hostages for their speedy departure out of the country. And now entering Mercia, they set up Ceowulph, a man of mean abilities, as deputy, or king, under them, and shared the rest of the provinces among themselves*.

The West Saxons, however, did not long enjoy the sweets of repose; for the Danes being masters of all England north of the Thames, and being joined by continual swarms of new-comers, they began to be straitened for room, and, proud of their superior numbers, determined, if possible, to drive Alfred altogether out of his dominions. With this view, their chief general, Haldane, sent one of his brothers with a strong fleet to effect a descent on the western coasts; while Gutheren fell upon the eastern parts of Alfred's dominions, A. D. 878, and this so suddenly, and with so great fury, that he made himself master of Chippenham in North Wiltshire, and with his numerous forces over-run the whole country like a deluge. Nothing was now able to withstand the bloody progress of these barbarians; the terror was so great and universal, that the king found it impracticable, either by threats or soothing, to engage his subjects to second him in the defence of their liberties.

Alfred, though thus deserted, did not follow the example of his uncle Buthred, who, on the like occasion, retired to the English college at Rome; on the contrary, though alone and unassisted, he resolved to revenge the wrongs of his country, or perish in the attempt; of such materials was the soul of Alfred composed. Divesting himself of every badge of royalty, tearing himself from every endearing charm of domestic happiness, he bestowed his young family among persons of approved fidelity, and himself took service under his own cowherd. He afterwards retired into the marshy island of Athelney†, within five miles of Taunton in Somersetshire, without imparting the secret of his retreat to any one but Odun, earl of Devon, a servant truly worthy of such a master. After some time this nobleman gathered a body of forces together, and gained a small advantage over the enemy, and took their Reafin‡, or royal standard. This gleam of success made Alfred resolve to give notice of the place of his retreat to his nobles, whom he invited to come and confer with him on the most proper measures to be taken to rid their country of the enemy. At this juncture, cloathed in a shepherd's dress, he ventured into the Danish camp as a player on the harp, where, after being eye-witness of the situation and defects of their camp, and having learnt from the unguarded barbarians themselves, that they were soon to celebrate a great festival, he flew to inform his nobles of the same, and appointed a general rendezvous of all their forces on a day fixed, at Buxton, on the forest of Selwood in Wiltshire, when marching directly with his small but resolute army for the enemy, who then lay encamped at Yattenden, on the borders of Hampshire, he surprised them in the midst of their merriment, and gained a compleat victory.

The Danes, after their defeat, fled to a castle, to which Alfred laid siege; and cutting off all supplies of provision, obliged such as had escaped the fury of the sword to capitulate, and were treated

* About this time the famous Rollo first appeared upon the English coasts; but either unwilling to interfere with the conquests of his countrymen, or fearing a stout resistance, he continued his route for the French shore, where in a short time afterwards he made himself master of all Normandy.

† This was a small peninsula formed by the waters of the Thone and Parret. It had not above two acres of solid ground in it, was enclosed every way with water, and had no entrance but by boats or wading. Upon this peninsula was a small fort, in which Alfred took his humble refuge with his royal consort Elfwitha. When his friends repaired to him, he gave that place the name of Æthelingey, or rather Æthelingage; that is, the Island of the Nobles; in time changed to Athelney.

by Alfred with the greatest lenity, notwithstanding the laws of conquest and retaliation entitled him to demand ample compensation for the miseries their ruthless arms had before inflicted on his country: but in this the conqueror acted politically as well as humanely. The terms agreed to were as follows:

That their leader Gutheren, the chiefs of their army, and the main body of their people, should embrace the Christian faith, depart his kingdom at an appointed time, and give hostages for the due performance of the treaty.

Those who did not chuse to part with their old religion embarked for Flanders where they exercised their darling trade of depredation under the command of one of their generals called Hastings, while Gutheren, their only surviving chief in England, became a convert to Christianity, and was baptized, with several of his principal noblemen, and a great number of officers, at Athelney, Alfred standing his godfather, by the name of Athelstan. These events fell out in the year 879. After a stay of twelve days, Gutheren and his train returned to their army, and, retiring into Mercia, passed some time at Cirencester, from whence they marched into the kingdom of the East-Angles, which, together with the adjoining county of Essex, had been allotted them by Alfred for their habitation, Gutheren being to hold it under him as a *feudatory.

The Danes were now made denizens of England, and Gutheren received from Alfred a short code of laws for the government of his subjects, the first part of which related to religion and morality, and the second respected the limits of the territories of the two kings.

A. D. 881, a fresh body of Danes landed at Fulham, and took possession of it; but Alfred marching against them, and they finding that their countrymen would not assist them, reembarked in haste, and passed over to Ghent in Flanders, of which they made themselves masters.

A. D. 882, news being brought to Alfred, that four Danish pirates had appeared off his coasts, he went on board his fleet in person, and engaged them; and, as both sides had given orders not to grant quarter, the dispute was bloody and desperate; but victory at length declared in favour of Alfred. Two of the Danish ships were taken, and their crews put to the sword as pirates; the rest made their escape. After this defeat the Danes gave Alfred some respite; but in the year 885 certain of their countrymen who had been committing depredations in France, landing on the Kentish coast, laid siege to Rochester. The besieged, though greatly distressed, made a gallant resistance, which gave Alfred time to come up to their relief, who obliged the pagans to retire to their ships in such haste, that they left a number of prisoners behind them.

In a short time afterwards, Alfred had another naval engagement with these pirates. His fleet met with sixteen of their ships on a cruise off Harwich, thirteen of which they took, burnt and sunk the rest, and returned home with considerable spoils.

Altho' this wise and vigilant prince had taken every precaution that human prudence could suggest, by the strengthening his marine, and repairing the decayed castles on the sea-shore, to protect the coasts of his realm from those enterprising freebooters, yet one avenue remained open, which he could not shut. This was the river Thames, thro' which the Danes were always sure of a free access to his dominions so long as their brethren remained in possession of London. He therefore turned his victorious arms against that city, which he took A. D. 886, fortified and embellished, and put it into the hands of his son-in-law Ethelred, whom on this occasion he invested with the dignity of earl of Mercia†.

This year all the English took an oath of fidelity to Alfred, who was now looked upon as their immediate sovereign; and he now saw himself in possession of a greater extent of territory in Britain than had ever been enjoyed by any of his predecessors. His friendship and protection were universally courted. The princes of South Wales had submitted to him long before, and Anrwd, eldest son of Roderic the Great, and prince of Wales, waited on him with the tender of his homage; offering to hold his principality of him by the same tenure as Ethelred did Mercia. The Northumbrians also, left without an head by the death of their general Haldane, applied to him to give them a king; he accordingly put over them Guthered, of Danish race, but a Saxon by birth, and a Christian.

Having thus attained to the meridian of power and glory, and having no enemy to disturb the quiet of his reign, he turned his thoughts to the cultivating the arts of peace, and to repair the mischiefs that the ravages of the barbarous Danes had done to his country. He also appointed London as the place of the assembly of the states of the nation, thereby making that city the metropolis of England. He invited artificers and manufacturers of all kinds to come from foreign parts and settle in his country, to whom he proved an indulgent patron, and a munificent benefactor. In fine, he employed himself, during the intervals of peace, in improving and polishing his subjects. His laws were mild, but strictly enforced. He was the first who settled juries, divided England into shires and counties, and encouraged the spirit of trade among his subjects. To him likewise is owing the original of doomsday-book, so famous in our histories. We are told, that he lent ships and money to certain learned and enterprising men, who made a voyage as far as Alexandria in Egypt, and from thence, passing the Isthmus of Suez, traded in the Persian gulph. He established militias, erected several councils, and introduced that good order and regularity throughout his kingdom

* In this year Alfred built the town of Shafesbury, as appears from a manuscript copy of William of Malmesbury, in the possession of lord Burleigh.

† We have no particulars of the manner in which this queen of cities again fell into the hands of Alfred, and indeed the historians of those days are very superficial in their accounts of the progress of Alfred's arms; for, notwithstanding that this year abounds with the most bloody and interesting events, yet we find Alfred on a sudden in full possession of which are the never-failing sources of peace and plenty.

Mercia, repairing his capital in the neighbourhood of his strongest enemies, and awing Northumberland itself, though then in the possession of the Danes, into submission and respect. All this must have required many labours, and the exertion of many royal virtues, to effect. What a pity is it that particulars, so glorious and interesting to that prince and posterity, should have been passed over in a manner unnoticed! Guth. Hist. Eng. vol. I. pag. 219.

It is a very just observation of M. de Voltaire in speaking of this prince, that there never was a truly great man, who was not at the same time a man of understanding and learning. Alfred particularly verifies this remark, being himself the finest scholar and politest gentleman of his age, and consequently the patron and favourer of learning and learned men. With this view he founded the university of Oxford, and sent for a collection of books on all subjects, his people being at that time in a state of the darkest ignorance; inso-much that, as he himself complained, he had not one priest in all his kingdom who understood Latin; as for himself, he was perfect master of it; and some writers pretend that he wrote poems in the Anglo-Saxon language. By a prudent œconomy he had it in his power to be liberal; for we find that he built several churches, monasteries, and other public edifices; but he never gave into the fanatic prodigality of which too many of his predecessors had been guilty, by squandering away those sums upon monkish favourites, and in donations to the all-grasping see of Rome, that in prudence they should have appropriated to the enriching their own dominions, and providing for the wants of their subjects; for this reason it is, in all probability, that we find not the name of this great king in the Catalogue of Saints; but history, that reproaches him neither with crimes nor weakness*, deservedly assigns him the first rank among those heroes who have been the benefactors of mankind, that without such extraordinary personages, would have still continued in a state little better than that of savages.

And here I shall postpone the more circumstantial detail of the several excellent laws and regulations made by this prince, to that part of our work wherein we consider the state of religion, and the laws, manners, and customs, that prevailed during a stated period.

Proceed we now in the order of our narration.

The happiness and peace which the people of England enjoyed under the parental sway of the excellent Alfred, having lasted near eight years without interruption, was at length disturbed by new alarms; for, at the latter end of the year 893, an army of Danes arrived on the coasts of Kent and Sussex in a fleet of two hundred and fifty sail; and, landing near Rye, they seized on the fort of Appledore, while another squadron, under the command of Hastings, sailed up the Thames, landed a body of troops at Milton upon the Wells, in Kent, where they intrenched themselves†, and the two chiefs of the invasion seemed to enter into a contest which should exceed the other in exercising acts of outrage and barbarity on the miserable inhabitants of those places which fell under their respective departments.

Alfred was at this time in East-Anglia, settling the affairs of that country, upon the death of Guthred; but no sooner had he received notice of this invasion, than he with all haste gathered together a body of forces, and marched against the pirates; having previously exacted a renewal of the oath of fidelity from all his subjects in that province, both English and Danes. Nevertheless, the Danes inhabiting those parts no sooner saw his back turned than they declared for their invading countrymen under Hastings, in hopes of sharing in the plunder, and regardless of the solemn assurances they had so lately given. Alfred, upon this, immediately directed his route into Kent, in order to prevent their junction; and the Danes, finding themselves disappointed in their expectations that the whole of the East-Anglian kingdom would join them on their arrival, sent their fleet to the Isle of Mersey; and secure in the superiority of their forces, which greatly out-numbered those of the English under Alfred, they fell to plundering the country.

Thus they passed the winter, and in the spring of 894, Alfred advanced against them, in person, at the head of his troops, and coming up with their main army, which was encamped at Appledore, they began an hasty march to get on board their ships in the Thames, which were to meet and waft them over into Essex; but Alfred, too vigilant to let them execute their schemes without opposition, intercepted them at Farnham in Surry, gave them a total defeat, and took all their baggage. Such as escaped the fate of the day made the best of their way for their fleet, which carried them up the Colne, and landing, they fortified themselves at Bricklesey in Essex. On the other hand Hastings, who had quitted his fort at Milton, intrenched himself at Beamesfleet, near the isle of Canvey, in the same county.

Whilst Alfred was employed as above, advice was brought him that the Danes in Northumberland had revolted and fitted out a fleet of one hundred and forty ships, with which they were ravaging the northern and southern coasts, and that one of their squadrons, consisting of forty sail, had landed in Devonshire, and laid siege to Exeter.

The king, alarmed at this news, put himself at the head of a chosen body of troops, leaving the rest of his army to carry on the siege of Mersey, and making hasty marches, came upon the Danes of unexpectedly, that, struck with a panic, they fled to their ships, sending all the plunder they had gotten in the country, to Chichester in Sussex, upon which they made a fruitless attempt, and then sailed to Beamesfleet, and joining Hastings, who, encouraged at Alfred's absence, ravaged all the lands belonging to him in Mercia. The troops which the king had left in London for the security of that place and the neighbouring country, taking advantage of the Danish general being absent on his incursions in the Mercian district, suddenly attacked Beamesfleet, and carried the place by storm, in which they found Hastings's wife and his two sons who had been lately baptized. These they made prisoners, and sent to Alfred, who, with a greatness of soul unparalleled in those times, and that might serve as an example, even for these more enlightened ages, returned them to Hastings with this message, "That he did not make war upon women and Christians." Hastings returning from his pillaging expedition, gave all over for lost, and once more sued for peace, which Alfred, with a clemency almost unpardonable, if viewed in a political light, granted him, on his giving fresh hostages for his fidelity for the time to come.

Hastings, with the true spirit of a Dane, observed those conditions no longer than till it was his interest to infringe them; for soon after he fortified Shoebury, in the hundreds of Essex, from whence, being joined by forces out of Northumberland, he passed the Thames, and pursued his march as far as the banks of the Severn: against him marched three of Alfred's generals with a pretty strong army, still further reinforced by a body of the Welch, who were exasperated at seeing their country made the seat of desolation by these barbarians. The English army came upon the Danes at a place called Badington in Montgomeryshire, besieged them in their entrenchments, and reduced them to such an extremity of famine, that actuated by despair, they resolved to make a last effort, and strive to force their way through the besiegers; in this attempt they were dispersed and slaughtered in great numbers, some however were fortunate enough to escape into the woody parts of the country, where they remained till a change of fortune should bring them to their usual occupation.

Another part of them got to the fortifications which Hastings had erected at Beamesfleet, which they now repaired; then, being joined by their countrymen from East Anglia and Northumberland, they turned westward, and, having found means to elude the pursuit of the king's forces, got to Chester, where they intrenched themselves, and passed the winter, subsisting by such plunder as they could make in the adjacent country.

Early in the following spring, A. D. 896*, they retired into the Northumbrian territories, and from thence got back again into East Anglia, and seized on a small island, called Merseg, or Mersey. They afterwards took post at Hertford, on the Ley, up which river they drew their ships; and, having erected two small forts, bid defiance to the attempts of the Londoners to dislodge them. But Alfred, who was ever to be the guardian genius and deliverer of his country, fell upon a stratagem to distress them, by turning the course of the stream, so that their vessels were left on dry ground. The pagans were now struck with astonishment and dismay, and quitting their ships and camp, fled with all haste towards the Severn, and fortified themselves at Quatbridge†. Thither Alfred pursued them; when, finding themselves thus hunted and destroyed, they resolved, in a fit of despair, to abandon a country, in which they found no hopes of being able to maintain a footing so long as it was under the government of such an experienced, warlike, and active prince as Alfred. Accordingly, having found an opportunity of retiring into Northumberland, where their friends furnished them with shipping, they embarked and went back to Normandy, A. D. 896, in a wretched plight, after three years of fruitless endeavours to make themselves masters of this island.

Alfred, being rid of these troublesome enemies, found little or no difficulty in reducing the rebellious Northumbrians and East Angles, whom he now took under his own immediate rule, not chusing any longer to trust the government of those people in the hands of a substitute or vassal king. Matters being thus settled upon a peaceable footing in all parts of his dominions, he began to take such measures as might secure them from any future attacks of the Danes, and even render the return of those pirates impracticable. With this view he determined to acquire the mastery at sea.

In prosecuting this intention, he was fully sensible that the superiority of numbers would be always against him; but his genius, ever fruitful in resources, suggested to him a method of surmounting this difficulty, which would have thrown the damp of despair over a mind less formed for great actions than that of Alfred. He had made the art of ship-building his study, as well from natural inclination as the necessities of state, and from having carefully attended to the manner in which the Danish vessels were constructed, he improved their own invention against them, and ordered a number of galleys to be built with all expedition, of a greater bulk, swifter in sailing, and loftier than those of the Danes, some of them carrying sixty rowers.

The very year that his ships were built, viz. A. D. 897, he had occasion to order nine of them upon service against a squadron of Danish pirates that infested the coasts of Dorsetshire and Hampshire. On this occasion there followed a sharp encounter between the two fleets, in which the Danes met with a total defeat; and the king ordered such of the crews who were made prisoners to be hanged along the sea-coasts, as a terror to the rest of their faithless countrymen.

A. D. 899, or 900, according to some authors, died this truly excellent prince, after a reign of twenty-nine years and an half, and in the fifty-second year‡ of his age, and was interred at Winchester, leaving behind him the most perfect character recorded in history, and such as hath deservedly procured him among foreign writers, as well as our own, the glorious appellation of GREAT.

Alfred had five children by his wife Elfwitha, daughter to earl Ethelred, two of which were sons, and the other were daughters, of these Edward, the eldest, succeeded him on the throne. His second son Ethelward, the youngest of all his children, was bred a scholar. His eldest daughter Ethelfleda was married to Ethelred, earl of Mercia; she was a woman of a spirit superior to what is generally found in her sex, and inherited such a portion of her father's virtues, as enabled her to be of great assistance to her brother Edward. Alfred's second daughter, named Ethelgiva, was abbess of the monastery he founded in the Isle of Athelney.

* The confused manner in which the old historians have huddled together the accounts of these times, both with regard to facts and chronology, have rendered it extremely difficult for us to observe any uniformity in our relation. We have, however, endeavoured to keep as close to verisimilitude as possible, and to deliver that verisimilitude with as much perspicuity as the nature of the subject would admit.

† Probably the town now called Bridgenorth.

‡ On the sixth day of October. The Saxon Chronicle and Florentius place his death in 899; but as they agree that he reigned twenty-nine years and a half, and that he began his reign A. D. 871, as Assef also allows, whose authority is unexceptionable, it is clear that this fatal event must have happened in 900.

His youngest daughter, named Elfrida, or Ethelwith, married Baldwin, earl of Flanders.

EDWARD; or, The ELDER, A. D. 900.

SO called as being the first king of England of that name, and to distinguish him from Edward the Confessor. Upon the demise of his father he was anointed king at Kingston, by Plegmond, archbishop of Canterbury, and notwithstanding his right of primogeniture, he underwent the ceremony of a formal election by all the chief men of the kingdom, and, in consequence thereof, was invested with the regalia at the place above-mentioned.

Edward, though inferior to his father Alfred, in learning and other talents, did by no means fall short of him in military skill, insomuch that he never lost a battle wherein he was engaged in person.

The very first moments of his reign were disturbed by domestic contentions; for Ethelwald, the son of his uncle Ethelbert, elder brother to Alfred, set up a counterclaim to the crown, on pretexts of consanguinity, and found means to get together a party in his favour, and seized upon Winburn in Dorsetshire, and Tweoneham* in Hampshire. Edward was employed in reviewing the several fortifications of the kingdom, when advice was brought him of his cousin's insurrection. Upon which he, in all haste, assembles an army, advances against Ethelwald, and pitches his camp within two miles of Winburn†. Ethelwald, after some faint shew of standing his ground, but in reality dreading the superior force of Edward's army, made his escape privately in the night, and took refuge with the Danes in Northumberland, leaving behind him his wife, together with his friends and adherents, whom he abandoned to the mercy of the king.

The Danes, being no longer overawed by the superior power and abilities of Alfred, rejoiced in this opportunity of shaking off the Saxon yoke, and as in all probability they had at first excited Ethelwald to this act of rebellion; they now received him with open arms, and even acknowledged him as king, and their example was followed by their countrymen of East Anglia.

Edward, though much alarmed at this event, was nevertheless too great a warrior to pass over any of the necessary precautions on such an occasion, and after having put all the fortifications in a proper state of defence, he marched northward, and with so great expedition, that the Danes, struck with astonishment, and finding themselves in no condition to resist his army, which had been greatly increased on its march by the inhabitants of the places through which it passed, who were still warmly attached to the family of their late common parent, Alfred; the Danes, I say, finding themselves unable to cope with the superior force Edward was bringing against them, endeavoured to avert the chastisement which they thought justly awaited them, by obliging the pretender they had so lately protected to quit their country.

Edward, however, was not to be so easily pacified by this shew of submission, extorted only by approaching danger: he justly resolved to punish the perfidious Danes for their breach of allegiance, and to make them severely repent the having espoused a cause they were no better able to defend. Accordingly he over-run the whole country of Mercia, reducing many of the Danish strong holds, which he kept in his possession as the surest pledges of the peaceable behaviour of the inhabitants.

About this time, viz. A.D. 904, Elsted, the king's sister, who was married to Ethelred earl of Mercia, signalized her courage at the head of her husband's troops, and was of great service to Edward in making head against the Danes of Mercia, and preventing the Welsh from joining them‡. But it would be doing great injustice to this noble amazon, not to take notice that she was no less remarkable for her wisdom than her courage, and that she assisted her royal brother, as much by her councils as by her arms, not to mention that she built several towns and exercised many other acts of public utility.

Ethelwald, after being driven out of Mercia, had been obliged to retire into Normandy, from whence returning the next year with a body of forces, the East Angles were prevailed on to declare in his favour.

A. D. 905, having assembled a considerable body, he made incursions into Oxford and Gloucestershires, passed the Thames at Cricklade in Wilts, and ravaged the adjacent country; but Edward, having gotten together a sufficient force, he prepared to revenge these insults of the invader, and marching into East Anglia, laid waste all the borders of that country; and advanced as far as Badenstoke in Wiltshire. Ethelwald, on his approach, retired before him, probably with a view to draw him into a pursuit that might have weakened his army, and thereby have enabled the rebels to give him battle with a prospect of success. Edward however would not be thus lured, but retreated with the main body of his army. A body of Kentishmen, who staid behind to gather plunder, notwithstanding the king's repeated orders sent to them to march up and join the army, were surrounded and cut to pieces by the Danes; but the latter payed dearly for this glimmering of success, their king Eric or Eornric || being left dead on the field of battle, together with the pretender Ethelwald, in support of whose claim they had taken up arms. The royalists lost Eadwald, the king's thane, Earnwulf the abbot, the earls Sigulf and Sigelm, and several other persons of distinction. This battle, or rather skirmish was fought near Bury.

The Danes, finding their hopes of raising any

‡ This lady, having suffered a very dangerous and difficult labour, would never afterwards admit the embraces of her husband; but, throwing aside the weakness of her sex, dedicated herself to the exercise of arms, and, on account of her many gallant exploits, was distinguished by the name of King Elsted, as appears from Huntingdon's verses to her memory:

Tu regina potens rexque.

|| There is some doubt who this king of the Danes, Eric, was. It is most probable that he was the Danish prince of East-Anglia, and acted as a general in the expedition, since William of Malmesbury places his death about this time to the account of the English, who were exasperated at his government. In this same year 905 Elfwita, the queen-mother of England, died.

considerable commotions among the West Saxons, totally destroyed by the fall of Ethelwald, they not long after were glad to sue for peace; for in 907, we find Edward concluding a treaty with them at Ickford in Buckinghamshire*.

But the Danes, who, as we have already shewn in several instances, were to be bound by no oaths or treaties, broke this peace in the year 910; and the Northumbrians, being joined by their countrymen of Derby, Nottingham, Leicester, Lincoln, and Stamford, continued their depredations, and ravaged the adjacent country; at which Edward was so incensed, that he sent an army of West Saxons and Mercians into Northumberland, with orders to let loose the fury of the sword without mercy upon these restless infringers of domestic peace. His orders were obeyed with the most cruel exactness, and for forty days his troops killed and made prisoners all the Danes that came in their way. Edward, at the same time, ordered his fleet, consisting of an hundred sail, to put to sea, and infest their coasts to the south-east. Upon the knowledge of this formidable armament, the Danes rashly concluded that the king had put the greatest part of his military force on board, and that consequently his dominions were left unguarded and might be made the prey of a sudden and vigorous invasion. Buoyed up with these false hopes, and elated with the prospect of a certain and rich plunder, they entered his territories with a powerful force, and for a while ravaged the country undisturbed. At length, having made a great booty, they were on their march back overtaken by an army of Mercians and West Saxons near Tetenhall, in Staffordshire, by whom they were routed with great slaughter, leaving all their plunder behind them as a prey to the conquerors.

The next year, 913, Edward lost a faithful and useful adherent in Ethelred, count of Mercia, who died, leaving his widow Elfleda to assume the reins of government, which she managed with great ability and success. By some private convention, London and Oxford now fell into the hands of king Edward. The first care of the gallant countess of Mercia was to fortify the principal cities in her dominions, in order to secure them from the incursions of the Danes†. After having taken these wise and necessary precautions, she turned her arms against the Welsh, in revenge for the loss her husband had sustained from that people, over whom she gained several victories, and took the towns of Brecknock and Derby sword in hand, in the former of which she made prisoner the wife of one of their kings.

While she was thus employed her brother Edward rebuilt the town of Hereford, A. D. 914, which had been destroyed by the Danes; and being sensible that numbers of his subjects, who would willingly return to their allegiance to his family, could they be assured of protection from the power of their neighbours the Danes, on whom they stood in great awe, he for this purpose, in the spring of the year 915, marched with a numerous army to Witham, in Essex, which he fortified. Hither many of the English, who were before under the Danish government, resorted, and put themselves under his protection.

The years 915 and 916 passed without any commotions being raised by the Danes; and Edward, copying the example of his great father Alfred, employed this interval of peace in works of public utility, and the propagation of arts: among others, he distinguished the school of Cambridge by erecting it into an university, as his predecessor Alfred had done that of Oxford.

But this calm was not of long continuation; for A. D. 917 the Danes, who could never remain quiet for any length of time, marched a body of cavalry into Oxfordshire, where they surprised a detachment of Edward's troops at Oaknorton, and defeated them; returning home loaded with plunder. Another party, encouraged by the success of their brethren, marched to Leighton, in Bedfordshire; but here they met with so warm a reception, that most of them were killed, and their plunder, together with all their horses, fell into the hands of the English. These incursions put Edward upon fortifying Buckingham, Towcester, and Bedford; upon which earl Thurketyll submitted, with the Danes under his command, to Edward, and went with such as would follow him into France.

A. D. 918 was ushered in with a storm that foreboded as many dreadful consequences to England as it had ever yet experienced. The Danes on the continent had now increased to such numbers, that there were no longer found places to contain them; so that an emigration was become unavoidable. The swarm, as usual, lighted on this island, the sweets of whose soil and situation they had already experienced: a numerous body from the southern coast of Brittany, under the command of two leaders, Otar and Rohault, enter the mouth of the Severn, and fall to plundering the Welsh and English coasts, and in the course of their ravages carry off prisoner Cumeleac, bishop of Erchenfield in Herefordshire, favourite of king Edward, who afterwards ransomed him for forty pounds; and, being greatly alarmed at this formidable invasion, ordered the militia of Herefordshire and Gloucestershire to summon all their forces to oppose the enemy's further progress, which they did with so great courage and success, that in a battle to which they compelled them, they totally routed their army, and drove them into a wood. Rohault and Otar's brother were slain in the engagement. The Danes pent up in the wood, and finding no way to escape, had recourse to their usual artifice of oaths and hostages for their speedy quitting the kingdom. Being released upon these conditions, they immediately embarked on board their ships, but it was only to recruit their shattered forces; which having done, they stole ashore again under covert

* Historians differ greatly in regard to this event. Simeon of Durham says, that Edward was forced to make peace; Speed and Hollingshead give it the name of truce only; and that the loss Edward's army had sustained made that prince more ready to enter into it. Florence, Tyrrel, and Milton, leave this point undecided. Rapin, Carte, and Smollet, say that the Danes sued for peace. Carte brings for his authority Paroch Antiq. pag. 39, and the Saxon Chronicles. Upon the whole, it appears most probable, that the overtures were on the part of the Danes, who, by the death of their king or general, Eric, and of Ethelwald, who had stirred up the rebellion, were left without an head.

of the night; and dividing themselves into two bodies, the one advanced to Watchet in Somersetshire, and the other to Portlock-Bay, in the same county, where they recommenced their customary depredations. But this fresh instance of their perfidy met with its condign punishment; for Edward, who had cantoned a strong body of forces from the south of the Severn's Mouth, and from the west of Wales towards the east as far as the river Avon, to prevent all future accidents, now reaped the fruits of so prudent a precaution. His troops fell upon the barbarians on all sides, and few of them escaped alive to their ships. Unappalled by any check, and regardless of all difficulties, whenever plunder was in view, they laid siege to a small island, named Sheepholme, in the mouth of the Severn; but failing in their expectations, either through the poverty of the place, or the courageous resistance of the inhabitants, famine began to make a cruel havock among such of them as had escaped the fury of the sword. The few who survived the attacks of this most formidable of all enemies sailed round to the south coast of Wales, from whence they passed over into Ireland.

But the success of Edward's arms was more than counter-balanced by the loss of that excellent lady his sister Elfreda, who died this year at Tamworth; a pattern of virtue and prudence, and of a courage superior to her sex, and in every respect a daughter worthy the great Alfred.

The death of this princess overwhelmed Edward with a sincere grief for some time: nevertheless, he found his domain greatly enlarged and strengthened thereby; for, immediately on the countess's demise, he seized upon all Mercia, to which step he was more particularly induced on having certain information that her daughter Elfwina was privately treating of a marriage with Reginald, king of the Danes; a circumstance which, abstracted from political considerations, could not but be highly offensive to Edward, who had been left the sole guardian of this young lady by the last will of her mother Elfreda: he therefore boldly marched an army into the Mercian territories, declared himself guardian of the kingdom, obliged the inhabitants to take an oath of allegiance to himself, and carried the young lady back with him into his own dominions.

Nor were the Danes the only people whom Edward had reason to be apprehensive of at this time; for we find one Griffith ap Madoc, brother-in-law to the prince of West Wales, together with Leofred, a Dane, landing in the year 920*, with an Irish army in Wales with a design to make the conquest of that country. Here they met with no resistance, but advanced as far as Chester before Edward was in a condition to oppose their progress; but, having at length got together his forces, he divided them into two separate bodies; one of which he led in person against the invaders, whom he overtook at Sherwood, where a desperate battle ensued, and Edward himself was in great danger of being taken, had not he been timely relieved by his son Athelstan, who hearing that the king's division was furiously attacked, and he himself on the point of falling into the hands of the enemy, flew to the spot, fell upon Leofred, who directed the attack against his father, and gave the Dane so desperate a wound in the arm, that he dropped his spear, and surrendered himself prisoner to the gallant young prince.

Edward's other division proved equally successful against Griffith, the Welsh prince, who lost his life in the fight. But Edward sullied all the glory of this success by inhumanly ordering the head of Leofred, the Irish chief, to be struck off in cold blood, which, together with that of Griffith, which had been also brought him, were set upon the top of the Tower of Chester. Probably this act, which appears so meanly inhuman to us in these more civilized times, might have been considered by Edward as a just retaliation on lawless invaders, and a warrantable precaution to strike terror into the Danes, whom he looked upon as no better than pirates, and the Welsh as rebels to the allegiance they owed. The more effectually to restrain the former, he built several strong holds on their frontiers; and, amongst others, Wigmore in Herefordshire, and Tocester in Northamptonshire; but the Danes of this last county and of Leicestershire looking upon these curbs with an evil eye, they suddenly broke the peace, and made an attempt upon Tocester, in which they were repulsed with considerable loss. They then laid the country under contribution; but being pursued in their retreat, they were defeated at the forest of Bernwood and Ailesbury. These commotions served only as the prelude to a more general insurrection; for all the Danes inhabiting the environs of Huntingdon and East-Anglia took up arms, and openly revolted; and, in imitation of Edward, built a fort at Thamesford, in Bedfordshire, at the conflux of the rivers Ival and Ouse: from hence they made incursions into the country, which they ravaged with their usual barbarity.

Edward, incensed at these ravages, ordered their new fort at Thamesford to be besieged, which was carried by storm, and the Danish king, with several of their nobles, and all that were found in the place, were put to the sword. The loss of this fort gave a fatal blow to the Danish affairs in England, and so animated the English, that they laid siege to Colchester, carried the place after a short resistance, and sacking the town, put to death all the Danes they found therein. This severity exasperated the rebels to such a degree, that the same year the insurrection became general. They invested Malden; but a body of the king's forces coming to its assistance, the Danes were obliged to raise the siege; and in their retreat were fallen upon by the English, who put them to flight, and killed great numbers of them. In this expedition the East Anglian Danes had been joined by a great number of English pirates, who had landed upon their coasts.

Disheartened at length with such repeated losses, they once more resolved to throw themselves upon the mercy of the English king, and accordingly earl Thurtfurth, and the chief leaders of the Danish forces of Southampton, made their submission, and took an oath of allegiance to Edward, in which they were followed by the Danish army, lying at Huntingdon.

* At Snowdon, in Caernarvonshire.

But however great might be the check which the Danes had met with to the southward, their brethren in the north still maintained their footing, and occupied considerable territories in Northumberland, and a great way into Scotland. The Scots had been successively governed by two politic princes, Gregory and Donald, who were too well acquainted with the real interests of their country ever to enter into a league with the Danes. The former of these princes had been a very useful and faithful ally to Edward's father, Alfred. Donald, his successor, had likewise furnished that monarch with an army in his wars against the Danes. But Constantine III. who succeeded these two princes on the Scottish throne, and who was greatly inferior to them in abilities, had suffered himself to be drawn into an alliance with the general enemy: but this league was of short duration; for, in less than a year and an half, a favourable opportunity offering for the Danes to make their peace with the English, they abandoned their new allies the Scots.

It was about this period, viz. in the year 921, that Edward, having subdued all the southern Danes, his name became so formidable to those inhabiting the northern parts of this island, that they once more had recourse to the Scots, using all the persuasions they could devise to wheedle them into a second alliance with them against the English, whom they represented as powerful and over-reaching neighbours.

The Scottish king, imposed on by the artful insinuations of the Danes, or, (what seems most probable) corrupted by their money, came into their proposal, and sent his son Malcolm, the prince royal of Scotland, with a powerful army to assist the barbarians. The gallant Athelstan was at that time at the head of the English forces in the north, but in too weak a condition to oppose the invaders with any hope of success; he therefore found himself necessitated to act altogether upon the defensive, till he might happily find some favourable opportunity to engage them. It was not long before one offered; for the prince of Scotland, attacking the English army with great fury, the latter, agreeable to the dispositions, previously concerted by Athelstan, made a feint of retreating, upon which the Danes and Scots, instead of pursuing them, fell to pillaging their camp. Athelstan, who kept a watchful eye on their motions, no sooner beheld them dispersed here and there, in search of plunder, than he rallied his forces, and attacking the stragglers loaded with plunder, he put them to rout with incredible slaughter. After this victory he marched into Cumberland and Westmoreland, which he reduced, and then returned to Northampton.

A. D. 923, Edward marched to Stamford, which surrendered upon his first appearance, and he fortified it by a strong fort, which he raised on the south-side of the river Weland. Having also made himself master of Mercia, he fortified Nottingham, and marched to the Peak of Derby, where he erected a fort at Bakewell. All the inhabitants of these parts having sworn allegiance to him, he directed his march westward, and received the submission of Howel, Cledwe, and Jeothwell, the three princes of North Wales.

Edward's care seems to have been less directed to the making sudden conquests, than to the rendering them sure and lasting; he therefore provided for the safety of these provinces, by erecting a fortress at Thelwal*, on the Mersey, and another at Manchester†, and then turned northward to complete the entire conquest of England.

In this year, 923, we find the city of York in the possession of the Danish king Regende; but the particulars of this acquisition we are not made acquainted with‡.

The terror of Edward's arms now flew every where before him. Sidric and Regenald, kings of the Northumbrian Danes, together with the princes of the Cumbrian and Strathcluid Britons, with all the petty princes and states of Galloway, implored his protection, while the Scots, after their late defeat, were glad to purchase peace; and their king consented to hold his dominions in vassalage of the crown of England.

Edward had now attained the utmost summit of human glory; he was dreaded by his enemies, respected by his allies, and beloved by his own subjects. He had reduced the whole kingdom of England and principality of Wales to his obedience, and had triumphed over the haughty Scots, those early enemies to the peace and glory of England. Nothing now remained for him to do, but to secure, by wise and prudent regulations, those conquests which he had acquired by his military skill and prowess. Accordingly we find him governing his people with a mild and equitable sway, till death terminated the career of his glory with his life, in the year 925, after having sat on the throne twenty-four years.

If we take a retrospect of this prince's character and conduct, we shall find him very little inferior to his father Alfred. That great prince had retrieved the independency of the nation, and by his superior abilities had awed the Danes into obedience; but nature did not allow him sufficient time to perfect the great works he had begun. And no sooner were his eyes closed, than perfidy and rebellion, freed from their apprehensions, stalked boldly through the land. His son Edward, however, by his personal valour, in which he fell nothing short of his father, so effectually humbled the invaders of his country, and seconded so well the wise police and regulation which his predecessor had laid down, that had those princes who followed after him walked in his steps, England would never have experienced the unhappy turn in affairs which it did afterwards. If Alfred embellished and beautified the kingdom, Edward fortified it. If Alfred was respected by his neighbours, and was the darling of his subjects, Edward was no less so; and closely copying the example of his great pro-

† The annotator of Milton's History, and with him some other historians, suppose this to be a mistake; but Higden, who is a very judicious author, corroborates it in the following words: "Inde transiens aquam mensæ instauravit urbem Maencestra quæ est in australibus finibus Northambrorum."

‡ Simeon of Durham places this event A. D. 919, and attributes it to a Danish prince, named Ingwal.

genitor, he employed his thoughts in the intervals of peace, to promote domestic harmony and happiness. His laws were those of a prince who was the professed foe to injustice or oppression. One regulation which he made with regard to servants, merits particular notice, and may serve as an example even in these days of refinement and superior knowledge. "If a servant commit theft, the person that has given him a character shall be responsible for his crime, and be obliged to become his security."

In private life his character was peculiarly amiable and highly worthy of imitation; and the plan he observed in the education of his children, was as praise-worthy as it is uncommon. His daughters employed their leisure hours in such branches of learning as were best suited to improve their minds, and at other times exercised their distaff, or amused themselves with their needles. Accordingly we find Edward's alliance courted by the most respectable foreign potentates. As to his sons, they were so accustomed to study, that they were masters of every useful science, and fitted to fill a throne with dignity and applause. In a word, whether we consider Edward as a king, or a private man, we shall find few characters less exceptionable*.

Edward had issue as follows: by Egwynnea, his first wife, he had two sons, Alfred, who died before him, and Athelstan†, and a daughter named Edgytha; by his second wife Elfleda, daughter of earl Elfhelm, he had Ethelwold, who died about the same time with his father, and Edwin, the time and manner of whose death is uncertain. He had also six daughters by his second marriage, two of which lived and died single, though only one of them turned nun; the other four were married, to Charles the Simple, and Hugh Capet, kings of France; the emperor Otho 1. and a duke, whose territories lay near the Alps. By Edgiva, his third wife, he had Edmund and Edred, who afterwards reigned, and two daughters, the eldest of whom retired to a cloister, and the other was married to Lewis, prince of Guienne‡.

A T H E L S T A N, A. D. 925.

EDWARD was succeeded in his throne by his eldest son Athelstan, who was crowned by Athelen, archbishop of Canterbury, at Kingston upon Thames; but, previous to this ceremony, he had, after the example of his father Edward, submitted his right to a formal election by the people||.

Soon after his accession some discontented nobles, who pretended to call his legitimacy in question, and were also fonder of the other children of Edward, entered into a conspiracy to dethrone him. The chief of the conspirators, whose name was Alfred, had formed a plot to seize upon the person of the king at Winchester, and to have put out his eyes. Athelstan, having come to the knowledge of the design hatched against him, gave orders for seizing the conspirator; but, for want of sufficient proof of his guilt, the king, in his great lenity, consented to his undertaking a journey to Rome, in order to purge himself, by oath, at St. Peter's shrine, and in presence of the pope. Alfred accordingly was sent thither; but, whether from remorse of conscience, the fatigue of the journey, or some other cause, he was suddenly seized with a fit as he was walking up to the altar, and fell down speechless, upon which he was carried to the English school, where he died three days after in great agonies. The pope (at that time John X.) considered his sudden death as a punishment inflicted on him by the hand of heaven for his guilt, and in this belief refused his body the rites of sepulchre, until such time as he should know Athelstan's pleasure on that head. The humane prince, when he was informed of the shocking catastrophe which had befallen the wretch, disdained to carry his resentment beyond the limits of life, and therefore, with the consent of his council, desired that he might have the usual interment; but his estates were confiscated to the king, who bestowed them on the monastery of Malmesbury.

* As an instance of the great mildness and humility of this prince, we offer to our readers the following anecdote, related by Walter Nape, in his Nugis Curialium, in MS. "When Edward the Elder came to Austelen (probably the place we now call Aust, where is a ferry to pass out of Somersetshire into Wales), Lewellyn prince of North Wales came to Bethesda to treat about a peace, he refused first to cross the Severn, which, when king Edward heard, he took boat, and rowed towards him; but the prince, who was then by the water-side, when he saw and knew who he was, cast off the rich robe he then had on (and which he had prepared purposely for the meeting); and entering the river breast high, and taking hold of the end of the boat, submissively said: 'Most sage king, thy humility hath overcome my insolence, and thy wisdom triumphed over my folly; come, pray Sir, get upon this neck, which I (like a fool as I am) have lifted up against thee, and thus enter that land which thy benign clemency hath this day made thine own.' So taking the king upon his shoulders, and setting him on shore, he made him to sit down upon his own royal robe; and putting his own hands between the king's there did him homage."

† The story of Athelstan's birth is thus told by Brompton: "In the reign of king Alfred, when his son Edward was young, there was, in a village of the West Saxons, the daughter of a certain shepherd, called Egwynnea, who, falling asleep, dreamed that the moon shone out of her womb so bright, that all England was enlightened with her splendor. This dream she told to a grave matron that had been nurse to several of the king's children. Upon this, she takes her into her house, and educates her as carefully as if she had been her own daughter, teaching her so to demean herself as might be becoming a person of birth and breeding. In process of time, it happened that prince Edward, the king's eldest son, passing upon some occasion through this town, thought himself obliged, in honour and good nature, to visit his nurse. Here he got a sight of this maid; and she being exceedingly beautiful, he fell passionately in love with her, and by his violent importunity got her consent to lie with him, and by one night's lodging proved with child; and being afterwards delivered of a son, in respect to the mother's dream, the father gave him the name of Athelstan, which signifies the most noble."—From this story, and on account of her being a shepherd's daughter, several authors will have it that Egwynnea was only concubine to Edward: but Brompton himself, who gives us the story of the father's amour, speaking of the rest of Edward's children, says, "Ex aliâ uxore tuâ genuit Edvinum;" that is, He had Edwin by another wife, which is a direct testimony that Edward was married to Athelstan's mother; and notwithstanding that Simon of Durham says, "by a most noble lady he had his eldest son Athelstan, but by his queen Edgiva he had three sons." These words rather confirm than refute the legitimacy of Athelstan's birth; for his mother dying before his father was made king, though she was his wife, she could not properly be styled his queen; and she could not have acquired the title of most noble lady, unless by marriage, because she was by birth only a shepherd's daughter. To this we may add the great care taken of his education by Alfred, and his knighting him; strong proofs that he was not esteemed a bastard.

‡ Hist. Major. Winton,

|| The Cottonian MS says, electus est in regem. See also Huntingdon and William of Malmesbury, which latter expresses himself thus: "After being chosen by a majority of nobles, he was crowned at Kingston." But this is by no means to be taken as an argument against the hereditary right of English kings.

This dangerous conspiracy was scarcely suppressed when a fresh storm broke out in the north. The Danes, whose submission had been only the effect of compulsion, thought this a favourable juncture for resuming their former independency, not doubting that they should be joined by the discontented party in Athelstan's dominions. With these hopes they took up arms, being headed by their kings Sithric and Ingwald, and surprised the city of York.

As soon as Athelstan was informed of this insurrection, he marched against the rebels with such expedition, that Sithric, the king of Northumberland, not having time to make any preparations for the defence of his country, was glad to sue for peace, which Athelstan, with a clemency, that even bordered upon weakness, not only immediately granted, but thinking to secure the Dane's fidelity, and attach him to his person, he bestowed his sister Edgitha on him in marriage, on condition that he himself would embrace the Christian faith, and moreover permitted him to take the title of king, giving him all that extent of country from the river Tees to Edinburgh, known formerly by the name of Bernicia: but the death of Sithric, who survived his nuptials only a few months, rendered abortive all the salutary effects which Athelstan hoped to gather from his extreme condescension. The Scotch writers, with that implacable malice which they ever shew towards those who have either the spirit to resist their encroachments and the good fortune to humble their pride, have most cruelly and unjustly attributed the death of Sithric to poison, which had been given him by his wife, at the instigation of his brother Athelstan; but as they appear to be ignorant of the very name of this lady, whose reputation they thus blacken, and as she bears an exemplary character for piety and virtue, common charity will make us look upon the whole as the offspring of malice and national inveteracy*. But to return.

Immediately upon the death of Sithric, his brother Earnulph endeavoured to make himself master of his dominions, and for that purpose seized on Bamburgh, the capital of his kingdom, but was quickly driven out by Athelstan, who in a short time reduced the whole country, and kept it in his own hands, not being willing to trust it any more to a subordinate king, after so ill an use had been made of his late indulgence. This was highly resented by Guthric (or Guthfrith, as some authors call him), the son of Sithric, who expected to have succeeded his father in his sovereignty, and who was moreover actuated by a spirit of zeal for his old religion, and could not brook the state of vassalage to which Athelstan had reduced his country. He therefore threw off all dependency, assumed the title of king, and, having recourse to arms, seized upon most of the forts in the kingdom, drove out Athelstan's garrisons, and forbade any farther payment of tribute to the English; but on Athelstan's advancing against him with a powerful army†, raised with that expedition which the exigence of the case required, he fled into Scotland, which Athelstan was no sooner informed of, than he sent deputies to Constantine king of that country, demanding him to surrender him up his enemy, which Constantine refused; and the impartiality of a historian obliges us to say that it was upon very just grounds, since it would have been the highest degree of baseness and treachery to deliver up a prince, who, depending upon the known laws of hospitality, had taken refuge at his court, and put his life into his hands; and it should seem that Athelstan was generous enough to subscribe to these sentiments. Be that as it may, a conference was agreed upon by both kings at Dakers, in Northumberland, where it is probable that the king of Scots promised to give no further protection in his dominions, either to the fugitive prince or his brother Anlaff, who had been the companion of his flight, as he had been of his rebellion. Our English historians are very fond of making Constantine surrender all his territories into the hands of Athelstan, and to give his son as an hostage for his fidelity. This circumstance is related by William of Malmesbury, with the addition of another that carries with it all the marks of improbability. "Athelstan, saith he, upon this occasion, stood god-father to Constantine, whom he had prevailed upon to turn Christian, and who was baptized." But every unprejudiced reader will see the glaring absurdity of this pretended submission, and that it is no more than an idle tale, calculated to flatter a mean, national vanity, at the expence of truth. This however is certain, that during this conference, Guthric escaped into Northumberland, and his brother Anlaff into Ireland. The former, being joined by his friends, made an unsuccessful attempt upon York; after which he retired to his ships, and passed the rest of his days at sea in acts of piracy.

We find that Constantine parted from the interview in some displeasure; and at his return to his own dominions, Anlaff, informed of his discontent, repaired to his court from Ireland, and artfully inflamed his resentment and ambition, by inveighing against the insolence and dangerous power of the English monarch, and representing the practicability of conquering Northumberland by means of the assistance he should be able to bring from Ireland. Constantine readily joined with his proposal, and they immediately set about making the necessary preparations; and in the mean time, by their joint remonstrances, prevailed on Howel king of Wales to make a diversion in their favour. But Athelstan, by his diligence and activity, defeated all their measures; for so soon as he received intelligence of a commotion in Wales, he marched an army into that country, and obtained a complete victory over Howel, whom he punished for his revolt by augmenting the tribute paid to England.

After this victory he marched into Scotland, in order to chastise Constantine for having sent a body of forces to assist Howel. Anlaff having not yet arrived with his reinforcement from Ireland, the Scots were in no condition to make head against

* After the death of her husband, Edgitha returned to her brother, and became a nun at Polesworth, in Warwickshire.

† An old chronicle, left by John Wallingford, saith, that this army consisted not only of his own natural born subjects, but also of aliens. This, if true, was an unusual measure, and must have been occasioned by the great want of men in England, owing to the havock made by the late wars. Be that as it may, the Chronicles of Normandy expressly mention aids sent from thence on this occasion.

Athelstan's army; so that Constantine was compelled to sue for peace in the most submissive manner. The English monarch complied with his request, and at the same time restored all the places he had taken in the course of this descent, hoping thereby to work upon the mind of Constantine, and detach him from his alliance with the Danes. But here that came to pass which we frequently meet with in the more common events of life: Constantine's haughty soul was offended at the visible superiority which the victor assumed in thus loading him with favours: he could as ill brook the triumph of Athelstan's generosity as of his arms; and no sooner was that prince returned to his own dominions, than he began to treat even with Anlaff, and even formed alliances with the neighbouring states, in order to raise a powerful confederacy against the person to whom he had been lately indebted for his existence as a sovereign. The powers who engaged in this confederacy, were Constantine king of Scotland, Owen king of the Cumbrian Britons, and Anlaff, who, though a Danish prince, having acquired a settlement in Ireland by the success of his arms, is on that account known by the title of The Irish King.

We shall take the interval during the formation of this confederacy to introduce the story of prince Edwin, brother to Athelstan. The fact, as it has passed down to us, is as follows:

Edwin was a young prince that possessed many noble and virtuous accomplishments: but these great qualities, instead of rendering him more dear to his brother Athelstan, awakened in that monarch's breast the most rancorous jealousy. He was sensible that the people, notwithstanding their submissions, were not quite satisfied with regard to the legitimacy of his birth: he remembered that the traitor Alfred had coloured over his rebellion with the pretence of setting Edwin on the throne, as the only lawful heir of the deceased Edward: he saw his dominions threatened by a powerful invasion both from Ireland and Scotland, and was not sure that some secret sparks of Alfred's conspiracy might not lurk in the hearts of his subjects, wanting only the breath of Edwin to blow them into a flame. Full of these ideas, he wished for nothing so much as a favourable opportunity of removing this dangerous competitor in the affections of his people. The virtues of Edwin, and all his professions of respect and loyalty, appeared to him but so many specious arts to disguise the real sentiments of his heart. There wanted not then, any more than in the present times, court sycophants, who were ready to flatter the weakness of their king at the expence of his honour and future happiness. They represented all the actions of the young prince in the most odious light; his humility they called deceit, his respectful behaviour was construed into design, and the act of the most detestable nature was represented as a prudent precaution. Unhappily Athelstan, who on every other occasion displayed many royal virtues, was not proof against the dictates of ambition and the practices of his courtiers, who were incessantly representing, that not only his own welfare, but that of his people, was endangered by the impunity of Edwin, whom they at length scrupled not to accuse openly of having been an accessory in the late rebellion. In a word, the young prince was tried, and, being found guilty by his suborned judges, was sentenced to be put on board a leaky vessel with no other attendants than his armour-bearer and his page, and in this condition committed to the mercy of the winds and waves. The unfortunate Edwin, unable to support the severity of the weather, the continual prospect of death, and the want of food, desperately threw himself into the sea, and was drowned. It happened that the chief promoter of this iniquitous deed was cup-bearer to Athelstan. One day, as he was serving the king at table, he made a false step and had like to have fallen, but recovered himself suddenly with one foot; upon which he said to the king, who indulged him with much freedom, "See, Sir, how one brother assists the other." Athelstan, struck with these words, which were probably spoken without any meaning, felt all the consciousness of guilt awakened in his soul; and whether he construed this speech of his cup-bearer into a tacit insult, or that he was determined to begin with this incendiary as an atonement to the manes of his murdered brother, he ordered a strict examination to be made into the charge which had been brought against him, when it appeared that he had been falsely accused; upon which Athelstan ordered the cup-bearer to be put to a cruel death, and then he sought to expiate his own guilt by a profusion of penances and benefactions to the church*. Buchanan has improved upon this story, making him guilty not only of fratricide in killing Edwin, and another brother named Edred, but likewise guilty of parricide, in putting his father to death; "because," adds this Scottish historian, "he bears the title of Martyr." However guilty Athelstan might be with respect to Edwin, it is certain that he could not murder Edred; because that prince not only survived, but likewise succeeded him. As for the murder of his father, it is an accusation that betrays either ignorance or malice. Edward, the father of Athelstan, was never called The Martyr, but only Edward the Elder, and he died a natural death†.

It is to be lamented that the memory of so great a prince as Athelstan certainly was, should be stained even with the imputation of so shocking a crime; a crime which appears very irreconcilable with his known affection to his brothers and sisters, which we find recorded by many historians, who declare he lived single purely for their sakes. And as we meet with no instance of Athelstan's jealousy, with respect to his other brothers, though he had as great a cause to be apprehensive of them as of Edwin, charity, and the respect we bear to the other shining qualities of this English monarch, would make us wish that a veil could be drawn over this incident of his life. But, on the other hand, the testimonies of so many historians, who have transmitted this fact to posterity, and which have never as yet been fully refuted, must have their weight; and we fear that all the apologies made will not be able to clear him from

* He did seven years penance, and built the monasteries of Middleton and Michaelnefs, in the county of Dorset.

† Edward the Martyr did not begin his reign till the year having at least connived at the action*. We now resume the thread of our history.

After the death of Edwin, Athelstan received a very splendid embassy from Hugh, king of France, who sent Arnulph, earl of Flanders, in person, to the English court, with many rich presents for the king†, and a commission to demand his sister Ethel-da in marriage. Athelstan gave the earl audience at Abingdon in Berks, having called a public assembly of the states of the kingdom to consider of the French king's proposals, which upon mature consideration were embraced. The ambassador was treated with a magnificence suitable to the greatness of Athelstan's soul, and the dignity of the monarch whom Arnulph represented.

While these things passed at the English court, Athelstan was threatened with a powerful invasion. In the year 938, the Irish, under their king Anlaff, passing over into Scotland, were joined by a great number of the Scots, and embarking on board two hundred and sixteen ships, they landed at the mouth of the Humber, where they were joined by Owen, the petty prince of Cumberland. After this junction, they bent their march northwards, in order to conquer Bernicia for the Scottish king, where they seem to have over-run the whole country before Athelstan took any notice of their landing, whether it was that they conducted their design with such secrecy, or that he purposely connived at it in order to draw them further on. At length, however, having assembled an army, he marched against them with surprising expedition, and at the same time equipped a strong fleet in order to fall upon the ships which had brought them over. The allies had no sooner received advice that he was coming towards them, than they altered their route, and marched directly to meet him.

Both armies came in sight of each other at Winendune near Bromsbury in Northumberland. And now, each side reflecting that the action would prove a decisive one, they lay by awhile, watching each other's motions, and waiting for a favourable opportunity, when the remissness of the adversary might leave an opening for one of those coups de main, which frequently over-balance a seeming equality of force. During this pause, there happened an adventure which hath in it something extraordinary, and which we find thus related by W. of Malmesbury.

Anlaff, desirous to discover the situation of the English camp, and the condition of their army before he engaged, and, as some authors say, having formed a design to surprise the person of Athelstan, and put an end to the war, by killing him in the confusion, disguised himself like an harper‡, and found means to be introduced into the royal tent, where he played with so much skill, that the king, who was at dinner with his chief officers, was highly pleased with his performance, and when he had done playing dismissed him with a handsome reward. Anlaff disdaining to carry away the money, cut a hole in the ground as soon as he came out of the king's tent, and hid the money therein. A soldier who had formerly served under him, seeing him thus employed, and having a suspicion that he might be some other person than what his garb declared him, watched him narrowly, and discovered that it was his former general Anlaff; upon which the man gave notice of the thing to Athelstan, who at first reprimanded him for not having discovered it in time, so as that his enemy might have been apprehended. The soldier alledged in his own excuse, that when in Anlaff's service he had taken an oath to be true to him, and that if he had betrayed his old master on this occasion, the king might with justice have suspected him as capable of the like treachery to himself, if opportunity should offer; but concluded with beseeching his majesty to be upon his guard, and provide for the safety of his royal person, by ordering his tent to be removed to another quarter. Athelstan commended the fidelity of the man, and followed his advice. The place being left vacant by the removal of the tents, was taken up by a bishop and his train, who arrived that evening with a reinforcement of troops, for which the king had waited before he would come to an engagement. Anlaff, in the middle of the night, broke suddenly into the English camp, and making directly to the place where he had observed the king's tent, slew the bishop and all his followers, which giving a general alarm, he was soon obliged to retire.

The next day both armies came to a general engagement. The English were headed by king Athelstan, his brother Edmund, and chancellor Turketyl, general and prime minister to Athelstan. The Scottish troops were commanded by their king Constantine, Anlaff led the Irish forces, the Cumbrian Britons marched under the direction of their petty sovereign Owen, and one Froda was general of the Danish auxiliaries. Athelstan, wisely considering that the foregoing night's attempt on his camp must have greatly fatigued Anlaff and his Irish, began the attack on that quarter which they occupied; and at the head of a chosen body of his trusty West Saxons, fell upon them in their intrenchments, which he forced sword in hand, with great slaughter of the enemy. At the same time Turketyl, marching up at the head of a corps of the London militia, pierced the enemy's ranks, and falling upon the battalions of Scotch highlanders, cut them in pieces. Constantine himself was in the greatest danger, and had it not been for the vigorous efforts his Scots made to rescue him, must inevitably have become the prisoner of Turketyl and his valiant band, whom Ingulf dignifies with the title of heroes, and whose gallant behaviour on this occasion surpassed all praise. The battle lasted from morning till night; victory hovered for a long time dubious; at length she settled on the English standards; and the combined army was

* Henry of Huntingdon, though he mentions the death and virtues of young Edwin, is silent as to the occasion. In speaking of his catastrophe at sea, he mentions it as a sad accident; but Matthew Florileg, delivers the whole as an indubitable truth. William of Malmesbury again as roundly contradicts it, and says the whole story was founded only on an old ballad.

† These presents consisted of a curious vessel of onyx carved in the most masterly manner; a golden crown adorned with diamonds; the sword of Constantine the Great, the hilt of which was curiously overlaid with plates of gold, and adorned with one of the nails with which Christ was fixed to the cross; the banner of Constantine the Great; with several other relics in great estimation in those days of error and superstition.

‡ This stratagem in most of its circumstances bears a strong resemblance to that made use of by Alfred on a like occasion. See page 68 of this volume.

routed with prodigious loss, five Danish kings, and seven generals falling among the slain, and the three chiefs of the confederacy, Constantine, Owen, and Anlaff, with a very small train of followers, escaping to their ships with the utmost difficulty*. Athelstan and his brother Edmund gave distinguishing proofs of their valour in this day's contest, which historians represent to us as the most bloody that had ever been fought in Britain; and although the English had the advantage, yet truth obliges us to declare that it cost them very dear; for, besides a great number of their best soldiers, they lost Edwin and Ethelwin, the two sons of Athelstan's uncle Ethelwald, whose bodies were buried in Malmesbury church.

By the Scots and Irish chusing the mouth of the Humber for the place of their debarkation, it should appear that Athelstan had taken the wisest precautions to provide for the safe-guard of the western coasts, otherwise the invaders had a much better prospect of success in landing where they could have been more readily joined by the Welch.

Besides this signal victory by land, the English arms proved at the same time successful at sea, the king's fleet having given that of the enemy a great overthrow; but the particulars of this latter advantage have not been thought worthy of historical notice; so that we are not able to give a minute detail thereof.

After this grand defeat, Athelstan had leisure to turn his arms against the Welch, to chastise them for the part they had taken with the invaders of his territories; and, having got the better of them, though not without a stout resistance on their side, he compelled their king Ludeval to meet him at Hereford, accompanied by all the neighbouring petty princes, there to do him homage; at the same time he made them engage to pay him twenty pounds of gold, three hundred pounds of silver, twenty-five thousand heads of black cattle, and as many hawks and hounds as he should think proper†.

After he had settled the affairs of the north, Athelstan marched against the Cornish Britons inhabiting Exeter and the adjacent countries, whom he drove out from thence, and removed them out of Devonshire into Cornwall, making the river Tamar the boundary of their country on that side, as he had fixed the Wye for their limits on the other. On his return from this expedition he made a descent upon, and took possession of, the Isles of Scilly‡.

A. D. 941, put a period to the great actions and life of this illustrious prince, who bid farewell to the glories of conquest and the toils of state, at Gloucester, in the forty-sixth year of his age and the sixteenth year of his reign||; his days, saith Malmesbury, having been but short, but distinguished by glory.

I have already taken notice of the only blemish with which the prince's memory is stained, namely, the compassing the death of his brother Edwin. I have also quoted such authorities as are of the most consideration to support or invalidate the truth of the story; and shall therefore proceed to give the testimonies of historians in regard to the general character of Athelstan, leaving to the reader to determine how far such a deed may be found to detract from that esteem which posterity otherwise owes to the memory of this great king.

The elegant historian I have before quoted assures us, that he was a just, wise, and great prince, graceful in his person, affable in his carriage, generous in his sentiments, beneficent, charitable, and religious. Other writers represent him to us as no less consummate in the arts of policy and peace than formidable in war. He was adored by his subjects for his humility, and dreaded by his enemies for his valour; and so great was his attention to the welfare of his people, that he made it the whole study of his reign to protect and encourage commerce, insomuch that, according to Spelman, he granted a privilege in favour of those of a mercantile profession, whereby a person who had made three voyages to the Straights (the chief seat of commerce in that age) on his own account, and not as a factor for another, should be put upon the foot of a thane, or raised to the condition of a gentleman; a privilege of the highest utility in those days, when the German government laid it down as a standing maxim, that the being concerned in traffic derogated from gentility. He in every thing made his father Edward, and his illustrious grandfather Alred, the shining examples he copied after; and being as able a politician as he was an expert general, he took such measures to provide for the securing of his kingdom as none of his predecessors had thought of. If we consider him in his legislative capacity, his laws were no less curious than beneficial (as will be shewn in their proper place) and at the same time that they ministered to the happiness of his people, they raised his own name as the greatest civilian and writer of his age; nor did he content himself with barely enacting the best laws, but also exerted all his authority to enforce the due observance of them, in which he gave a striking instance both of his understanding and his justice.

To all the accomplishments of the king, the judge, the general, and the common parent of his people, he added those of the scholar and the patron of learning and learned men. Not satisfied with possessing knowledge himself, he was willing to diffuse it amongst his subjects; and whilst with one hand he was leading them out of the paths of worldly ignorance, he with the other opened to them the road to eternal happiness, by ordering the Bible to be translated into the Saxon tongue for the use of the vulgar. In a word, he stands up in the records of impartial history, as the most consummate politician, one of the best kings, and the greatest generals that the Saxons had ever given to this kingdom.

* Constantine, according to some English historians, was in the number of the slain; but as the most unquestionable authorities among the Scotch contradict this fact, in which they are countenanced by the best English annals, we must therefore suppose that he escaped.

† But we are not to believe with some of our English historians that this tribute was to be continued annually, because in the laws of Howel Dba, i. e. the Good, we find no more tribute due to the king of London, than an hundred marks, or about sixty-six pounds, besides the hawks and hounds.

‡ Athelstan, after having reduced Cornwall and the Isles, founded the collegiate church of St. Burien at the land's end.

|| On the 27th of October, according to the Saxon chronicle, and Angl. Sacr. t. ii. pag. 80.

His person we find thus described by Malmesbury: "Athelstan was of a middling stature, stooping a little in his gait; his hair of a bright yellow, which he usually wore beautifully plaited; his countenance was rather chearful than merry, and his body rather slim than lusty."

Dying without issue, he was succeeded by his brother

WHO ascended the throne when but eighteen years of age. He was the sixth son of king Edward by his wife Edgitha*. His coronation was performed with great solemnity at Kingston upon Thames. He had in his brother's life-time given signal proofs of his valour and military accomplishments, and began his reign with the fairest presages of equalling his predecessor in fame.

The Danes, ever restless under the English yoke, looked upon the youth of Edmund as a favourable opportunity to make another struggle for independency; and with this view they privately sent an invitation to the brave Anlaff, who was still in Ireland, waiting with impatience for some happy turn in affairs, that might enable him to wipe out the shame of his last defeat; and no sooner was he apprized of the sentiments of the Danes, than he resolved to acquiesce in their wishes, and put himself once more at their head; but, conscious of his being too weak to oppose the whole united force of England, he entered into a treaty with Olaus king of Norway, whom he engaged to furnish with a certain number of ships and men. Having received the desired supplies, he began to think himself strong enough to attempt the invasion of Northumberland; and landing in the country, he made himself master of York, having previously entertained a private correspondence with the principal inhabitants of that city. The possession of the metropolis soon made him master of many other towns, whose garrisons were either put to the sword, or obliged to capitulate, by the Danes who dwelt in those parts. Not contented with the possession of Northumberland, Anlaff advanced into Mercia, where he likewise met with a most favourable reception, and his countrymen in that kingdom assisted him in retaking some places which had been wrested from them by the young king's father, Edward†.

Edmund, notwithstanding his tender years, was not intimidated by the rapid progress of the enemy: he assembled his forces with an amazing expedition, and seemed rather animated than appalled by the prospect of danger. In a short time he repossessed himself of the places which the enemy had taken, and put strong garrisons into them, composed wholly of such of his English subjects in whom he knew he could place the most confidence. After this, he continued his march, and came up with the rebels at Westchester, when, both armies joining battle, an engagement ensued, which, faith Matthew of Westminster, lasted the whole day without either side having the advantage. At length, Odo and Wulstan, the one archbishop of Canterbury, and the other of York, desirous to save the further effusion of blood, interposed their christian mediations so effectually, that a peace was agreed to upon the following terms, viz. That Anlaff should enjoy all that part of England lying north of Watling-street, and Edmund all the territories south of the same, with a grant to the survivor of the whole. And here I must confess myself at a loss to make such strange concessions in favour of an invader any way tally with the general character of Edmund, or the state of the kingdom under his reign. Certainly a single battle, as yet likewise doubtful in its event, could never induce a prince of common prudence or courage to share his kingdom with rebels and pirates. By these concessions of Edmund, it seems as if he was worsted. On the whole, therefore, we may come nearest the truth by supposing that these terms were not willingly granted by Edmund, but forced from him by the nobles who were in his army, and who probably might have been tampered with by the invaders, and that his compliance was no more than an expedient to prevent a mutiny; and unhappily we do not want instances in the course of history, where the ambition or avarice of great men in power may counter-balance the intentions of the best of kings, and convert the greatest successes, purchased with the blood and treasure of the nation, into the scourge of an ignominious peace.

Edmund, therefore, seems to have been very much distressed when he made this peace, or had been grossly betrayed; and it is more than probable that in a short time he perceived how much he had been imposed upon, since we find him, in the year 944, invading Northumberland, and driving from thence both Anlaff and Reginald king of the Danes, which the character of this prince gives us no room to suppose he would have done, had this peace been agreeable to the honour and dignity of his crown, or of his own deliberate procurement.

Anlaff, however, does not appear to have demeaned himself in such a manner as to conciliate the affections of the Northumbrians, who had invited him over; for no sooner was he established in peaceable possession of that country, than he began to burden his new subjects with most grievous taxes, in order to discharge certain debts which he had contracted with the king of Norway to fit out this expedition. The Northumbrians, a restless, dissatisfied people, ever aiming at independency, and yet incapable of tasting the sweets of ease, threw off the subjection which they had so lately voluntarily entered into; and the inhabitants of Bernicia revolting, sent for Reginald, Anlaff's nephew, from Ireland, and crowned him their king at York, who, immediately on his accession to his new dignity, set about making preparations for war against his uncle; so that the kingdom of Northumberland was instantly divided into two factions, which menaced each other with defiance and destruction.

This was too favourable an opportunity for Edmund to let slip, and he now resolved to take advantage of the change of affairs to wrest from the common enemy those countries which he had been obliged to cede to them. With this view, he began to make all the necessary preparations for invading Northumberland before either of the contending parties should be apprised of his design; and such was the secrecy and expedition he observed on this occasion, that he was ready to fall upon the two kings before they had the least notion that he meditated a rupture; and, being wholly unprepared for defence, they were glad to embrace whatsoever terms he thought fit to impose; but Edmund, listening rather to the dictates of generosity than those of ambition or revenge, contented himself with obliging the Northumbrians to send back both their kings, and to renew their oath of allegiance and fealty.

* Guthrie, by some unaccountable mistake, makes Edmund the son of Athelstan.

† It was in the year 942 that the Northumbrian Danes of

After this, Edmund, A. D. 945, turned his arms against the inhabitants of Cumberland*, who had incurred his displeasure by assisting the Northumbrians in their late revolt. Accordingly he marched into their country, dispossessed the petty prince whom they had set up of his dominions, and bestowed them as a fief, to be held of the crown of England, on Malcolm, king of the Scots, whom he thus attached to his interest. The terms of this tenure were, that Malcolm, and his successors, should on all occasions be ready to furnish succours, either by sea or land, to the king of England, and acknowledge him as lord paramount of those lands†. But Matthew of Westminster restricts the service which was exacted of the Scottish monarch to the defence of the northern border.

The fame of Edmund, like that of his great progenitors, was too ample to be confined within the narrow limits of the country over which he ruled: it made its way into the continent; and Lewis the Foreigner, king of France, being about this time dethroned by Hugh the reigning king, sent to Edmund to supplicate his assistance. The English king, in pity to his misfortunes, sent an embassy to France, demanding his restitution. The success they met with hath not come to our knowledge; nor should we have taken notice of so imperfect a circumstance, only as such a commission serves to shew the strength of this nation even in that early period.

Peace being now universally restored, the kingdom began to taste the sweets of an upright and mild administration under this hopeful prince, when an accident, as singular as it was deplorable, cast a deep shade over this enlivening prospect, and once more threw all back into confusion.

As he was keeping the festival of St. Augustin, the convertor of the Kentish Saxons, at Puckle Church, in Gloucestershire, and sitting at table with his nobles, he observed among them, at the end of the tables in the hall, one Leod, or Leoff, (a notorious malefactor, whom he had some years before banished) disputing with the steward of his household, who probably would have obliged him to withdraw. The king was naturally passionate, and, being provoked at the intolerable insolence of the fellow, rose from table, seized him by the hair, and threw him upon the ground; but, whilst he was holding him down, the villain drew forth a short dagger, which he had concealed about him, and plunged it into the king's breast with such force, that he expired immediately. The company, in their fury, fell upon the murderer, and cut him to pieces; but not till the desperate wretch had wounded several of them‡. This fatal catastrophe happened on the 6th day of May, A. D. 946.

Thus ignobly fell the young Edmund in the very bloom of his age, having barely attained his five-and-twentieth year; six and an half only of which he had been king. His reign, short as it was, had been noble. His exploits in the field may serve as a proof of his courage; but the care he took to improve the civil policy of his kingdom are noble illustrations of his humanity.

EDMUND left two sons by his wife Edgiva; but these being both infants§, and the completion of the times seeming to call for a stronger sway, the states of the kingdom agreed to place Ethred on the throne of his deceased brother; and he accordingly received the crown from the hands of Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, at Kingston.

The Northumbrians, as usual, laid hold on this change in the government to stir up new seditions; for no sooner did they receive the news of Edmund's death, than they broke out into acts of rebellion; upon which Ethred, without hesitation, marched an army into their country; but would not proceed to severities, however justifiable, without first trying the gentler methods of persuasion. With these views, that sufficiently bespeak the goodness of his heart, he dispatched the trusty Turketyl, as his commissioner, to receive their allegiance. This minister, whose talents as a statesman were only to be equalled by his fidelity as a subject, conducted himself so prudently, that he disconcerted all the schemes of the malecontents, and prevailed with Wulstan, archbishop of York, and their principal noblemen, to renew the oath of fidelity to the English government in a solemn manner at York. Malcolm, the king of the Scots, who (in open violation of his former engagements with Edmund) had assisted them in their revolt, followed their example; and the peace

* The kingdom of the Cumbrians extended from the Wall of Severus as far as Dunbarton, in the western part of Scotland, and comprehended Galloway, Kyle, Carrick, and Cunningham.

† Several historians have taken occasion to infer from this circumstance, that the Scottish king paid homage to the king of England for the whole kingdom of Scotland; which is as absurd as if they were to say, that the kings of England were vassals to France, because they did homage to the French kings for Normandy; or that the present royal family, as kings of England, were vassals to the emperor of Germany, on account of their doing homage to him for the electorate of Hanover.

‡ This story is variously related by Powel in his History of Wales; by Brompton; Osborn, in his life of Odo; in the Anglia Sacra; by John Wallingford, in his Chronicle; and by Simon of Durham. We have given it as told by Malmesbury.

|| According to the Saxon Chronicle. Higden places this event in A. D. 947; the Peterborough and Laudean copy of the annals, in the Bodleian Library, and Ethelward, in 948: but, as Edmund was murdered in 946, there must have been an inter-regnum of near two years; during which Ethred might probably have governed as protector of the kingdom in the minority of the young princes: but as none of our English historians take any notice of such a vacancy in the throne, I have thought it most agreeable to order and probability to place Ethred's accession as in the text.

§ The eldest of Edmund's children was but four, and the youngest only three years old.

of the North being now, in appearance, provided for, Ethred withdrew his army southwards.

The Danes however were no sooner freed from the immediate terror of Ethred's arms, than they broke their oath, and, in the year 949, made another effort to throw off the Saxon supremacy. Anlaf, then in Ireland, was again invited by them to make a fresh descent upon England, with promises of placing him on the throne, and protecting him on it with their lives and fortunes. He accordingly landed with a considerable force in the Northumberland territories, and was instantly joined by the treacherous prelate Wulfstan, most of the nobles, and a strong body of the inhabitants, by which junction he found himself in a condition to bid defiance to any army Ethred could bring into the field. All these transactions were conducted with so much secrecy and expedition, that the invader had reduced the most considerable places in Northumberland, before the king could assemble his troops to oppose his progress, and was therefore obliged to leave him for the present unmolested in the possession of his conquests, which, however, he did not long enjoy; for, whether owing to his own tyrannical disposition, or to the natural inconstancy of the Northumbrians, we find him obliged to relinquish his ill-gotten throne to one Eric, a Dane, in the year 952.

And now Ethred, being either awakened from his former lethargy, or thinking he had found a proper opportunity by this revolution to recover Northumberland, marched with an army to the borders of that kingdom. At his approach Eric fled for refuge into Scotland, and the Danes, finding themselves thus deserted by their prince, had recourse to supplications and delusive promises of future fidelity, which the exigence of the times obliged Ethred to accept of as sincere, and not only forgave them their revolt, but reinstated their king Eric on the throne.

Were it not for the frequent instances we have met with in the course of this history, of the little reliance that was to be placed on the most solemn oaths or promises of the Danish race, it could scarcely be supposed that after the repeated proofs of lenity and forgiveness, which they had experienced from the princes whom they had offended by their rebellious spirit, they would have again dared to trample under foot every tie or obligation sacred or profane. But such was in reality the case; for Ethred, after he had quelled the troubles in Northumberland, and restored Eric to the throne on certain conditions, set out for his Wessexian dominions; and, not thinking that he stood in need of much circumspection in marching through the country of a people whom he had laid under such recent obligations, the perfidious Danes sallied out of York, and attacked the rear of the English army at a place called Casterford. It was now wholly owing to the king's personal valour that all his troops were not made the victims of this unparalleled and unsuspected treachery. This flagrant instance of their perfidy and ingratitude incensed Ethred to such a degree, that he immediately turned back, and, contrary to the mildness of his nature, destroyed the whole country with fire and sword; and, in the fury of his indignation, would have extirpated the whole rebel race, had they not once more humbled themselves in the most abject manner, laying the whole blame upon the archbishop of York and their king Eric, the former of whom was imprisoned by Ethred's order, and the latter was put to death by the Danes themselves, as a victim which they offered to the just indignation of Ethred, who, upon this mark of their sincerity, restored them to his favour and protection; but, at the same time, to cut off all possibility of future revolts amongst them, he took all their strong holds into his own hands, and turning out the Danish tenants, filled their places with his faithful English, under the command of Asulf, a countryman of their own.

Ethred having now restored quiet to his kingdom, gave himself up, without reserve, to all the follies of superstition, and suffered himself to be governed in the most despotic manner by Dunstan, the abbot of Glastonbury, a priest whose portrait we find thus drawn by an English historian: "His merits as a churchman were great, as a Christian none, and as an Englishman execrable; his zeal was furious, his understanding shallow, his ambition deep, his malice invincible by kindness, his spirit unsubmitting to authority, not possessed of genius enough even for artful dissimulation; his profusion without elegance, his bluntness without sincerity, and his cunning without wisdom." This man, such as he is here represented, did Ethred take, not only for his spiritual, but his temporal guide likewise; and while this overbearing priest gave his king corporeal discipline with one hand, with the other he disposed of all the benefices in church and state, in which none were admitted to a share but such as were his devoted creatures. In this distribution, he took care not to forget his brethren the monks, whom he provided for with a degree of prodigality, while the secular clergy were wholly neglected. The honest monks, not to be behind-hand with their benefactor in generosity, took every occasion to trumpet him up as a pattern of holy life, a prophet, and an apostle, which made such an impression in his favour in the minds of the unthinking vulgar, that he stood fair to acquire an absolute controul, both in church and state, when heaven, in compassion to the expiring liberties of the land, was pleased to remove the bigotted Ethred from his temporal throne, by afflicting him with a quinsy, of which he died on the twenty-third of November, A. D. 955.

In his last moments he sent for Dunstan, who happened to be absent from court, that he might settle his spiritual affairs, as also some temporal concerns with which he had privately entrusted this ghostly director; but the monk, who had imbibed none of the principles of restitution, artfully kept out of the way, until he was assured of the king's death, and by that means secured to himself the possession of great sums with which Ethred had entrusted him, and for which, being a secret between themselves, he well knew no one could call him to an account. With the monies he thus piously embezzled, he was enabled to live with greater splendor and magnificence than any of the nobles of the English court. But to conclude the history of Ethred.

He was a prince who had given abundant proofs of a personal valour in those wars wherein he was engaged, and as none of his vices have come to our knowledge, we may reasonably suppose that they were few in number, or greatly overbalanced by his virtues. He was the first monarch who assumed assumed the title of king of Great Britain, or monarch of all England. During his reign the English government had suffered no diminution; and, abating the weakness which he shewed in his attachment to the insolent and rapacious abbot, we may venture to pronounce him a descendant not unworthy an Alfred and an Athelstan.

He had issue two sons, Bertfrid and Elfred; but as they were both born before he was raised to the throne, he was succeeded by the eldest son of his brother Edmund,

E D W Y, A. D. 955.

WHO was elected king by the suffrages of the clergy and nobility, and ascended the throne, though only fourteen years of age. We are told that he was remarkably beautiful in his person, and the monks, of whom he was no favourer, have blackened his character with every shameful vice that could debase human nature; but these calumnies are too general to merit the least regard, being founded purely upon Osborne's Legend of the lives of Odo and St. Dunstan, and propagated with a view to divert posterity from the insolence and brutality of Dunstan, and the treasonable practices in which both he and Odo were too deeply concerned. Be this as it may, Edwy at his accession shewed Dunstan a very different countenance to what his predecessor had done; and an event which happened on the very day of the young monarch's coronation, contributed not a little to confirm in him the dislike he had conceived of that overbearing abbot.

Edwy, who had a soul formed for the tender passions, was deeply enamoured of a young lady named Æthelgiva; but whether the conversation between them was criminal or not, his bitterest enemies have not ventured positively to assert. Fatigued with the ceremony of his coronation, and perhaps to avoid the excessive drinking then too much in practice, he stole from table after dinner, and retired into this lady's apartment, to divest himself awhile of the load of regal state, and taste the sweets of an unconstrained conversation with the fair object of his regard. The great men of the kingdom, thinking themselves affronted by the king's withdrawing himself from their company, expressed their resentment at the contempt shewn them, and proposed that the king might be sent for back. No one however could be found to charge himself with so disagreeable a commission but Dunstan, who, starting up from the table, ran hastily to Æthelgiva's apartment, where he found the young king in company with that lady and his mother, and after reproaching him in very unbecoming terms with a fondness so derogatory to majesty, dragged him forcibly back to the great hall.

Edwy, young as he was, had nevertheless prudence sufficient to curb his resentment on this occasion; but determined to lay hold of the first opportunity to punish this officious monk for the outrage he had committed on his love and dignity. The king's friends, who to a man hated Dunstan, let no occasion slip to cherish the prince in his sentiments, and persuaded him after some time to demand a restitution of the sums which the deceased monarch had committed to his charge. The king readily complied with this advice, and accompanied his demand with strong hints that he had made use of the public money in order to purchase a dangerous popularity. But Dunstan, who, like a true monk, was never without a false pretence to serve the present turn, declared that he had expended the whole in pious uses, agreeable to the intention of his late royal master at the time he put those sums into his hands. Edwy, finding his design of calling the abbot to a public account baffled by this artful reply, contented himself with banishing him the kingdom, and Dunstan thereupon retired into Flanders.

This stroke, which seemed aimed at the priesthood, roused all the virulent fanaticism of Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, who, suspecting that female resentment had the greatest share in this exile of Dunstan, resolved to wreak the whole fury of his malice upon the fair Æthelgiva, well-knowing that he could not wound Edwy in a more sensible part, nor more effectually punish him for having dared to lift his hand against the chosen band of religion. Unhappily, the blind superstition of the times favoured him but too much in his insolent designs, and the monks had wrought so powerfully upon the minds of the people under their direction, that the just resentment shewn by offended majesty, was construed into an act of the highest impiety; and the vulgar were taught to believe that nothing less than a miracle could avert the wrath of heaven from a nation, whose chief had been guilty of such an insult upon one of its vicegerents here on earth. Secure then of the assistance of the multitude, the implacable prelate gave orders to a band of soldiers to enter the royal apartments, and to tear, even from the arms of majesty itself, the victim which the church had devoted to its resentment. Strange as it may seem, Edwy was not able to prevent this more than brutal violence, but saw himself obliged to part with the object of his love. The unfortunate fair one was dragged from the king's palace to Odo's house, who, with unrelenting fury, ordered her face to be branded with a red hot iron, (notwithstanding that such a punishment was directly contrary to the laws then in being), and banished her for life into Ireland.

The king had now seen all the respect due to his person violated in the face of all the world, and, as an addition to his vexations, he knew that Odo, the cause of them, was too powerful for him to venture to attack: he therefore directed the storm of his resentment against the whole order of monks, whom he drove out of his territories, bestowing the monasteries of Glastonbury and Abingdon, together with all their religious houses, on secular clergymen; but this only served to embitter those minds which he ought effectually to have filled with terror. In banishing Dunstan, and dispossessing his turbulent monks, he did no more than what his honour required of him; but he should not have stopped here. He should have rid his kingdom of the traitor Odo, to whom Dunstan was no more than an instrument; but, as we have already observed, he was overawed by this insolent subject; and the fear he was under of hazarding his crown by a bold attempt, was the very cause of his losing it altogether.

Dunstan, before his exile, had secretly entered into a conspiracy with Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, and the discontented monks, against Edwy, whose character they had blackened with all the virulence virulence of disappointed malice. Not content with this, they had applied underhand to young Edgar, the brother of Edwy, who, being a prince of great ambition, readily joined in with the conspirators on their offering to place the crown on his head. Dunstan's exile, instead of casting a damp upon the conspiracy, rather served to rouse those concerned in it to more speedy action: accordingly, A. D. 957, the Mercians and Northumbrians, who had been entirely brought over to the party of the archbishop and the other malecontents, broke out into open rebellion; and, having Edgar at their head, became so powerful, that in a little time Edwy was abandoned of all his subjects, except the West Saxons; and finding it in vain to resist the torrent, he retired to the city of Gloucester, where he shut himself up*. The artful and ambitious Edgar took advantage of this retreat of his brother, to give his usurpation the sanction of a formal election by assembling the states of Mercia, who solemnly deprived Edwy of the sovereign power, and in his stead elected Edgar king of all that country to the northward of the Thames, except the ancient kingdom of Essex. On this occasion the monks, who had been principally concerned in these commotions, had recourse to their usual expedient of miracles, in support of a cause that justice, honour, and virtue, discountenanced; and a voice was said to have come from heaven, declaring Edwy unworthy of longer reigning, on account of the profligacy and iniquity of his life, and commanding the assembled nobles to place the crown on the head of his brother Edgar. So violent and unjust a revolution, however, could not be effected, even with all the power of monkish falsehood over the minds of an ignorant and deluded people, without producing great commotions; the nation in general seemed far from being reconciled to the act of the council, which had transferred the succession to Edgar; and a civil war ensued for some time, till at length, both parties being wearied out, a treaty was set on foot, in which Edgar was admitted to retain all his conquests with the title of king; and the unfortunate Edwy was obliged to be contented with the country of Wessex.

Edwy survived the loss of his territories only two years, during which time he languished in those heart-piercing miseries, which none but a youthful monarch, torn from the woman he loved, and stripped of his kingdoms, can possibly conceive. At length death put a period to his sorrows with his existence, A. D. 959. Huntingdon, who extols the goodness of his government, and the happiness his subjects enjoyed under him, drops some hints as if his death was the effect of treachery. Be that as it may, upon his decease without issue, the whole kingdom of England was again united under his brother and successor,

EDGAR, A. D. 959.

THE great abilities this prince had shewn in obliging his brother to consent to a partition of his dominions, during his life-time, shone forth with redoubled lustre when he became possessed of the sole sovereign sway.

The first act of his reign was recalling Dunstan from his exile, and putting himself wholly under his direction, heaping upon him all kinds of honours and preferments. He was immediately promoted to the see of Worcester, and his character for sanctity shone forth with double splendor after the eclipse he had undergone. It was not long before the see of London fell vacant, to which he was likewise preferred, and held them both together, till he intruded himself into the archiepiscopal seat of Canterbury.

As those who have made the infidelity of traitors the instrument of serving their own ambition are ever the first to distrust them when their purpose is effected, so fared it with Edgar, who was too well acquainted with the restless tempers of the Northumbrians to place any trust in the allegiance they had sworn to him. He therefore resolved to awe them into quiet by taking such measures as would most effectually deprive them of all hopes of success from any attempts against his authority; and accordingly divided Northumberland into two governments, constantly maintaining a strong body of forces in the northern parts, who might be at hand to quell any insurrection in its infancy; and at the same time, in order to secure his dominion from all invasions from abroad, especially those of the Danes, the unrelenting disturbers of the peace and tranquility of this island, he determined to fit out a fleet stronger than ever had been known under any of his predecessors, and to surround his dominions therewith, as with a floating rampart. He accordingly augmented his navy to a number of ships that almost surpass the bounds of credibility: some writers say it amounted to four thousand eight hundred; but all agree that it consisted at least of three thousand six hundred†.

This fleet he divided into three squadrons, or lesser fleets, consisting each of one thousand two hundred sail; and were stationed in such a manner, that they were continually cruising round the island; by which prudent regulation he at once rendered his men complete sailors, and effectually covered his kingdom from an insult.

To keep the Scots quiet, he ceded all the country of Lothian, together with the city of Edinburgh, to their king, Kenneth III. on the like terms of homage and vassalage as Cumberland, which secured Kenneth as an ally; and, in consequence of this treaty, Maccuse, or Macho, king of Man and the Isles, together with the to-

* About this time the fair Æthelgiva returned from Ireland with a face as beautiful as ever, the scars made by searing being entirely worn out. The frantic Odo, being informed of her return, ordered her to be seized on her way to the king, and to hamstring her, after which it is said he caused her to be murdered at Gloucester. Angl. Sacr. t. ii. p. 106.

† Though the modern reader may be struck with astonishment at the greatness of this number, yet upon reflection we shall find it by no means incompatible with truth or probability, if we suppose (as we may reasonably do) that in this account is comprehended the whole of his naval forces; and that every little cock-boat and pinnace is thrown in to add to the magnificence of the relation. To defray the expences of this armament, he laid a tax on his subjects, and exacted a proper consideration from each of the petty princes who enjoyed the benefit of this valuable protection. Campbell's Lives of Engl. Admirals, vol. I.

parchs of Galloway and Dinnal, Griffith Hunald, Jacob and Jeodefthil, petty princes of Wales, readily submitted to the government of Edgar. We are told likewise, that, having appointed all these princes to meet him at Chester, he went on board his royal barge; and each of these princes handling an oar, he himself holding the helm, he was thus rowed in triumph up the river Dee; a story which, if true, serves only to shew the foolish arrogance of Edgar, and the mean servility of the other princes; and is in no-wise to be erected into a proof of his absolute sovereignty over them, or that they were otherwise subject to him than as weaker allies to a more powerful one.

A. D. 961 an infinite number of wolves, coming down from the mountains of Wales, destroyed all the cattle, and greatly alarmed the inhabitants of that country; which calamity being made known to Edgar, he changed the tribute usually paid by the Welsh into that of three hundred wolves heads, to be yearly paid in lieu of money and cattle. This laudable regulation had so good an effect, that in less than three years not a single wolf was to be seen, either in that country, or throughout England.

The blind partiality which Edgar shewed for the whole monkish race, attached them so warmly to him, that they have mutilated history in the most miserable manner, in order to dress up every period of this prince's reign in the tinsel garb of flattery. In short, we have no one example of a reign so late, so long, and in several respects so truly glorious, in which the chronology has been so strangely neglected; and what account we have of it is rather a panegyric on his person and character, than an history of his life and actions. Thus muffled in the veil of superstition, we are obliged to catch at facts by random. However, in spite of all the gloss that adulation has spread over the memory of Edgar, we find that he had failings that fell not short, if they did not exceed, those for which the pious brotherhood had doomed his brother Edwy to obloquy and wretchedness during his life-time, and branded his name with infamy to posterity.

If we were to say that no woman's chastity was safe under Edgar's reign, provided her form was such as to attract his amorous inclinations, we should not say more than we have warrant for in history, as will appear from the following anecdotes.

The first instance we have of the irregularity of his passion, is his committing a rape upon Wolfheda, or Wilfreda, a beautiful lady, whom he pursued even into a cloister, where she had taken refuge to avoid his criminal addresses, but which proved ineffectual to secure her against the forcible attempts of the lustful monarch. He had a daughter by her, named Editha, who was afterwards a nun in the same convent from whence her mother was taken. This invasion upon the privileges of the church (rather than the crime itself) so exasperated the godly Dunstan; that he obliged Edgar to atone for it by a seven years penance.

This, however, did not prevent Edgar from indulging himself without controul in the pursuit of his passions; and having heard that there was a young lady of singular beauty at Andover, he immediately sent word to the mother, that he intended to come and take a night's lodging with her daughter. The good parent, who held her daughter's virtue in esteem next to the preservation of her life, yet fearful to incense the amorous monarch, who was not accustomed to take a denial of that nature without resentment, bethought herself of a stratagem by which she might at once secure to her beloved child the invaluable jewel of her modesty, and gratify the warm desires of the king, and sent him word that her daughter was prepared for the honour he intended her; and in the mean time prevailed upon one of her maids, a good likely wench, and whose scruples were easily over-ruled by the high notions of being a king's bed-fellow, to submit to Edgar's embraces, to whose couch she was to be conveyed in the dark, with a charge, however, to quit his side before the light of day should discover to him the innocent fraud. Edgar, burning with desire, no sooner received the welcome note from the mother, than he posted in all haste to riot in those guilty pleasures with which he had feasted his imagination. Every thing was conducted at this meeting in the manner which had been previously concerted. Before the dawn of day the maid stole from the bed, yet not so softly but that Edgar perceived it, and asked her why she was in such haste to be gone. Confused at the suddenness of the question, she inadvertently answered, that she was going about her mistress's work. This startled Edgar, and he now discovered the whole imposture, which at first filled him with rage and resentment; but having had no reason to be displeased with her as a companion during the preceding night, he forgave the mother and daughter the deceit they had put upon him; and is said to have taken the maid away with him, and to have kept her till his marriage with Elfrida.

These youthful irregularities, however palliated, give us no very favourable idea of Edgar's virtues; but the manner in which he gained possession of Elfrida, the heiress of Devonshire, is no less horrid than singular.

This young lady was so beautiful, that notwithstanding her father Ordgun, count of Devon, had educated her in a very private manner, the fame of her charms reached the ear of Edgar, with whom to hear of beauty, and pant for its possession, was the work of the same instant. Accordingly he resolved to satisfy himself whether she answered the encomiums which fame had lavished on her; and therefore employed his favourite and first minister Ethelwold (who also appears to have acted as the pander of his passions) to pay a visit to the father under some pretext, by which means he got a sight of the daughter.

Ethelwold, who was himself of an amorous complexion, and who, upon first beholding the maiden, was convinced, that fame, instead of being lavish, had been scanty in her report, was immediately smitten; and as love disdains any partner in the breast which it chuses for its habitation, so Ethelwold, unmindful of his duty when inflamed with this new passion, and knowing her to be the heiress of her father's immense estate, he determined to run all hazards to make the lovely Elfrida his wife; and, in order to detach the king entirely from the pursuit of her, he gave him such an account of her person as divested Edgar of all curiosity curiosity to be more intimately acquainted with her. Ethelwold, taking advantage of this indifference, artfully gave him to understand, that he had himself entertained some notion of making Elfrida his wife; not from any particular liking to her person, but only that, as being the heiress of her father's estate, his own would be so much enriched by the match upon the death of her father, that it must be for the interest of his majesty to have a subject of so great property inviolably attached to his person and government.

The artful manner in which Ethelwold opened this design removed all suspicion from Edgar's mind; and being glad to have an opportunity of so easily obliging his favourite, he gave his consent. But Ethelwold had not long enjoyed the fruits of his amorous deceit, when Edgar was informed of the whole truth; and, inflamed with rage at the treacherous use his favourite had made of the confidence he reposed in him, meditated a bloody revenge; and, to make the more sure of his purpose, he had recourse to the same dissimulation which Ethelwold had practised upon himself. Accordingly he told the minister, in a careless manner, that he intended to take a day's hunting in the country where his estate lay, and purposed to take a night's lodging at his house. Ethelwold, taken thus unprepared, could not devise any plausible pretext to elude the royal visit; therefore, hastening home, he disclosed to his wife Elfrida the manner in which he had gained the possession of her; entreating, at the same time, that she would, as much as possible, obscure those charms which nature had lavished on her, lest they should attract the desires of the amorous Edgar, and prove the destruction of their domestic peace. Elfrida heard him, but it was with the ears of a woman conscious of the power of her charms, and inflamed with ambition: she already beheld, in imagination, her sovereign at her feet, and in her heart detested Ethelwold, who had robbed her of a conquest that would have exalted her above the rest of her sex and quality. Full of these thoughts, which were the instant effect of her husband's discovery, she promised him all he required, that she might be under less restraint in acting as she pleased. The day appointed for the royal visit now arrived. Edgar came, saw, and loved. Elfrida, instead of following her husband's advice, made use of every art to set her charms out to the greatest advantage, and make herself appear more amiable; and knew so well how to play off the artillery of beauty, and to teach her eyes the language of her heart, that Edgar read in them every sentiment of her ambitious soul, and burnt in the double flames of love, and rage for abused confidence; but, assuming an exterior of complacency and satisfaction at his reception, Ethelwold had not the least suspicion of the gathering storm. In a short time after, the king invited him to an hunting match in Harewood Forest, where he took an opportunity, while no one was near, to run him through with a lance. A son (Malmesbury says a bastard) of Ethelwold's passing by at the instant the king was drawing his lance out of the body of that unhappy husband, Edgar asked the young man how he liked that game? when the degenerate wretch, with a detestable courtliness, replied, "That, if it pleased his majesty, it ought not to displease him." Edgar was so taken with this unexpected instance of submission to his will, that he is said to have taken the youth about his own person, and to have bestowed on him singular marks of his favour.

After this fatal catastrophe, Elfrida was married to the king, by whom she had two sons, named Edmund and Ethelred, the latter of whom came to the throne in the course of succession.

Edgar was so continually repeating offences of this kind, that it was not till the latter end of his reign that there could be found a proper time to crown him; it not being deemed lawful to use the rite of unction in the case of a prince subject to canonical censure, and in a state of penance. At length, however, he was crowned with great solemnity and splendor at Bath*, in a grand assembly of the clergy and nobility, called Wittena Gemot, by the hands of Dunstan, on Whitsunday, A. D. 973.

The same year an insurrection happened in Wales, Iago, the prince of that country, who had deposed and imprisoned his brother, being himself dethroned and deprived of his kingdom by Ivaf, his nephew, who replaced his father on the throne. Upon this revolution the usurper applied to Edgar for his assistance, who, glad to take advantage of the commotions among the Britons, and thereby pave the way to an entire conquest of them, led an army himself into North Wales; but being met at Bangor by Howel, a treaty was concluded, by which the two contending princes agreed to a partition of dominions.

Edgar, after the solemnity of his inauguration was over, held the congress at Westchester with the six kings already mentioned; and, in all probability, it was at this time we may place his adventure with Kennith, king of Scotland, which was as follows.

The last named prince, who was very strong and robust in his person, and apt to be a little boastful in his cups, had taken great liberties in ridiculing the diminutiveness of Edgar's stature, which came to that monarch's ears, who, though he did not immediately take notice of the affront, was resolved to resent it. Accordingly he one day took an opportunity to walk abroad with Kennith, when, having insensibly drawn him into an unfrequented place, he gave him to understand that he had been informed of the indecent liberties he had taken with his person, and presenting him with a couple of swords, insisted upon his chusing one of them, in order, he said, that he might convince him that personal courage did not depend upon the strength of muscles, or the advantage of bodily force. Kennith, struck with the greatness of Edgar's soul, stood self-condemned, and blushed at his own unguarded behaviour, begged pardon for his rudeness, and Edgar, who was no less generous than brave, readily forgave him. The Scottish historians, with a weakness hardly pardonable, have been at great pains to refute this story, by alledging that there was no king of the name of Kennith

* Alured. Bever. l. viii. Flor. Wigt. Ang. Sacr. t. I. p. 223; but Guthrie says at Axminster in Devonshire, from what authority he himself best knows.

cotemporary with Edgar. Be that as it may, the story itself does honour both to their king and country. To the former, in having generously acknowledged his fault; a reparation which every man of real courage and honour looks upon himself obliged to make to those he may have rashly offended. It does the country honour; in that, Edgar, who was the most haughty prince of his time, thought it no way derogatory to his dignity to put himself upon an equality with the Scotch king, a condescension to which he would certainly never have submitted had he considered Kenneth in the light of a tributary vassal.

Edgar survived the ceremony of his coronation only two years, dying on the eighth of July, 975, in the thirty-third year of his age, and the sixteenth of his reign.

It is a matter of no small difficulty to give our readers the true character of this prince. Some historians, not contented with applauding him as an excellent king, have endeavoured to set him up as a saint also; while others brand his name with the vilest epithets, and endeavour to hand him down to posterity, as a lawless and bloody tyrant. For us we shall endeavour to keep the mean between those two extremes, and making facts the ground-work of our portrait, we shall neither brighten with the pencil of flattery, nor disfigure with the shades of detraction. History will not permit us to deny that Edgar ascended the throne by an act of the most flagrant injustice and rebellion, and that he maintained himself in it by an arbitrary authority. We have seen that he was lascivious, revengeful, and bloody; and, together with all these, a dupe to the overbearing insolence of the monks, and their arch-bishop Dunstan; and the story of his being rowed by six kings, is a sufficient proof of his barbarous vanity.

Let us now turn our eyes to the more favourable part of his character; and here we must confess he appears to great advantage; for he was a sound politician, an excellent legislator*, and a monarch who exerted the great talents which he had received from nature for the benefit of the kingdom he governed. In a word, we may pronounce him to have been an extraordinary compound of virtues and vices, in which the latter seem rather predominant; and, if we consider that he was but sixteen when he mounted the throne, we cannot, without surprise, behold him displaying so many signs of sagacity, conduct, and wisdom, nor forbear wishing that those vices which he was guilty of had not been of so deep a dye, or that they had been buried in oblivion.

By his first wife Elfreda, he had issue Edward, who succeeded him; and by his second, Edmund, who died in the fourth year of his age, and Ethelred, who was afterwards king of England. By the lady whom he took out of the nunnery, he had Editha, who was afterwards abbess of Wilton†.

EDWARD, surnamed The MARTYR, A. D. 975.

UPON Edgar's death, those noblemen and others who had with impatience beheld the exorbitant power of the monks, thought they had now a good opportunity to humble their pride and reduce them to their original mediocrity. Elfre, duke of Mercia, struck the first blow, by taking from them all the benefices they enjoyed in that province, which he bestowed upon the secular clergy. Some other of the nobles followed Elfre's example within their respective districts, and in all probability a total revolution would have ensued, had not Ethelwin opposed his great power in favour of the monks. These jarring factions, however, rendered the election of Edward to the crown of his father very precarious. Elfrida, the queen dowager, an intriguing, artful, ambitious woman, aspiring to the government of the kingdom, in the name of her son Ethelred, formed a party to set aside Edward, and raise him to the throne; but this scheme was defeated by the vigilance and activity of Dunstan, who well knew that the support of Edward's title was the only thing which he and his monks had left for the preservation of their possessions. This prelate caused an assembly of the states to be called, to which he came in great pomp; and, without giving time for disputation, he himself placed the crown upon the head of the young Edward, while the assembly, which consisted chiefly of clergy, being desirous of peace, and probably over-awed by Dunstan's great power and reputed sanctity, concurred in electing Edward, who was accordingly proclaimed their sovereign.

Edward was but fourteen when he began to reign under the tutelage of Dunstan, who, profiting of the prince's minority, took all the power into his own hands, and laboured with all his might to keep the monks in possession of the benefices which had been lavished on them in the last reign; but herein he met with great opposition, notwithstanding all his orders were issued in the king's name. Dunstan, therefore, found himself obliged to convene several councils on this affair. But such matters will fall more properly under the head of religion, to which we shall therefore refer our readers.

A. D. 976 a great famine prevailed throughout England; but we have no account of any transaction in this prince's reign that can properly be termed civil: the altercations among the priests make up the whole of his history, till he came to his end in the following tragical manner.

Upon Dunstan and his party having prevailed in favour of Edward, and placed him on the throne, the queen-dowager Elfrida retired with her son Ethelred to Corfe-Castle, where she in secret hatched schemes for the destruction of the innocent monarch. It happened, that one day, as he was returning from the chace, and having out-rid his attendants, he found himself near the place of his mother-in-law's residence; and having always shewn her great respect, and being, at the same time, very fond of his brother Ethelred, he determined to call and pay them a short visit. On his arriving at the castle, Elfrida received him in the most affectionate manner, and pressed him to alight and take some refreshment; but the young

* The civil character of this prince will be best known by his laws, an abstract of which we shall give in their place.

† This lady is celebrated for her chastity and beauty, which, it seems, she chose to set off with those ornaments of dress which appeared more suitable to her birth than her profession, with which, being one day reproached by a bishop, she smartly replied, "That God regarded the heart more than the dress; and that a virtuous mind might be concealed as well under a splendid habit, as under an hair-cloth."

monarch excused himself, saying, that his stay would alarm his attendants, to whom he had given the slip, and, therefore, that he would for the present take only a cup of wine on horseback, being very thirsty. Wine being accordingly brought, as the young prince was lifting the goblet to his head, he was stabbed in the back by a ruffian, whom Elfreda had posted for that purpose, upon finding that all her intreaties could not prevail on Edward to dismount and enter. The king, finding himself wounded, instantly set spurs to his horse; but he had not rode many paces when, fainting with great loss of blood, he fell from his saddle, and one of his feet catching in the stirrup, his beast dragged him in that position a considerable way, and at length stopped of its own accord, at the house of a poor blind woman by the road side, where some of Elfreda's domestics, who had traced him by the blood to the place, found his corpse terribly disfigured by being dragged over the stones. In order to conceal the murder as long as possible, they threw the body into a well; but it was found soon afterwards and carried to Wareham in Dorsetshire, from whence it was afterwards removed to Shaftsbury, and deposited in a monastery founded there by king Alfred.

Thus fell the unfortunate Edward, in the year 979*, the eighteenth of his age, and the fourth after his coronation by Dunstan. As to his character, we can say little more on that head, save that he appears to have put himself entirely under the direction of the monks. Many miracles are reported to have been wrought by his dead body. It is difficult to assign a reason for Edward's having been dignified with the double title of Saint and Martyr, unless we suppose him to have been murdered on account of his great attachment to, and favour for Dunstan, and then indeed the problem is easily solved; for every friend or patron of the monks in those days, were sure to be cried up for saints, and their enemies represented as hated and accursed of God. Be that as it may, this prince is generally known in history by the name of Edward the Martyr.

Elfreda, either troubled with remorse for this act of cruelty, or having been enjoined to commute for her crime, according to the fashion of the age, founded two nunneries, one at Ambresbury, and another at Wherwell near Andover in Hampshire; in the latter of which she spent the residue of her days in acts of mortification and penance.

DUNSTAN, who plainly foresaw that the accession of Ethelred to the throne, would prove fatal to his party, used every artifice he could devise to keep him out of it; accordingly he made overtures to Edgitha, the natural daughter of Edgar by Wilfrida; but she, intimidated with the fate of her brother Edward, flatly refused to fall in with the archbishop's designs, notwithstanding that he offered all his interest and power to secure her election.

Finding therefore all his plans frustrated, he was compelled to put a good face upon the matter, and acknowledged as king young Ethelred, at this time about twelve years of age; and on the fourteenth day of April, being the Sunday after Easter-day, he anointed and crowned him at Kingston upon Thames†. But this ceremony he performed with such malevolence as plainly evinced the rancour of

* On the 18th of March, 978, say Flor. Wig. & Sax. Chron.

† As the antiquity of the coronation-oath is a subject that has employed the pens of several learned men, and seems not to have been rightly understood by our historians, who have made it more modern than it really is, it will not be amiss to gratify the curiosity of those who honour this history with their perusal, by presenting them with a transcript of the original oath administered by Dunstan to Ethelred, which is more ancient, as well as more authentic, than any which other historians have produced. The original Saxon runs thus: 'On ðære halgan thryneffe naman, ic threo thing behate cristennum folce, and me under theodum. An ærest that Godes cyrice, and eall Cristes folce, minra gewearde sothe sibbe healde, Oðer is that ic reafac and healle unrihte thing eallum hadum forbode. Thridde, that ic behate and bebeode on eallum domum riht. And mildheortnesse, that us eallum arseast and mildheort God thurh that his ecean miltsfe forgyfe se lyfath, and rixath.' The verbal translation of which runs thus: "In the name of the ever blessed Trinity, I promise three things to the Christian people and my subjects. First, that the church of God and Christian people within my dominions shall enjoy uninterrupted peace; that is, be free from any molestation. Secondly, that I will prevent theft, and every kind of injustice in all ranks of men. Thirdly, I engage to preserve and maintain justice and clemency in all judicial proceedings, that the kind, merciful God may, according to his eternal mercy, forgive us all our sins; who liveth and reigneth, &c." The charge which the archbishop added to this oath, containing in it such sentiments as may be of use on all future occasions of the like nature, I shall give it in the original, with an English translation, that the reader who understands Saxon may be gratified with a real curiosity, and he who does not understand that obsolete language, may partake with him in his pleasure. 'Se Cristena cyng ðe thas thing gehealdeth, he geearnath hym sylfum woroldliene weorthmynt, and him ece God ægther gemilcraþ; geon and werdum life ge eac on tham ecean the æfre ne ateorath. Gif he thonne that awægth that gode was behaten, thonne sceal hit syththan wyrðian swyðe sona on this theode, and ealle hit on ende gehwyrðath on that wyrð.

'butan heon his lif sœce ær hit gebete. That is, "The Christian king, who observes these things, shall acquire temporal honour, and render the Deity propitious to him, both in the present life, and in that eternal one which knows no end. But if he shall at any time break the promise he has made to God, the state of his kingdom shall immediately grow worse, and at last be involved in ruin; unless, in the future part of his life, he shall repent and amend his faults. My dearest lord, have an especial care of yourself. Frequently recollect, that you must lead and produce the flock at the judgment-seat of God, over which you have been created the shepherd in this life, and then you will be made to understand that you have the charge of that flock, which Christ has purchased with his own blood.

"It is the duty of an anointed king to judge no man unjustly; to protect the orphan and stranger; to restrain theft; to punish adultery; to dissolve and set aside incestuous marriages; to abolish sorcery; to extirpate those that are guilty of parricide and perjury; to feed the poor with alms; to advise with persons famous for their age, wisdom, and sobriety; and to place men of probity in the administration; inasmuch as the king is responsible for all the crimes they are guilty of, through his fault, at the day of judgment." Taken from Riuder's History of England, and by him from an ancient Saxon manuscript in the Cottonian Library; as likewise the manuscript code of constitutions in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, cap. 2. entitled, Be eorhlicum cyninge.

his heart, and in the sermon he made on this occasion, he, in a most unchristian manner, prophesied that his reign should be cursed with the misery and slaughter of his subjects, as a punishment for his having succeeded to the crown, in consequence of his mother's guilt, to which this innocent youth was so far from being accessory, that the grief he shewed on the death of his brother, called down upon him his mother's hatred and resentment. This insolence of Dunstan, which ought to have cost him his head, served only to increase his character as a saint and a prophet. Such was the blind superstition of those times, when artful and ambitious churchmen had found means to persuade the people that the surest way to get to heaven, was by laying aside their understandings.

The completion of the prophecies of such saints as Dunstan, is, by every man of sense, believed to be the effect of previously concerted schemes: besides, the state of the kingdom, and the natural weakness of the young monarch, might have given a man of meaner talents than Dunstan, strong reasons to foresee the calamities to which the nation must necessarily be exposed. Ethelred had the misfortune of coming too young to the throne, with those defects of the mind which the flattery of courtiers is but too apt to create in a young monarch, and, in particular, a love for ease and pleasure, which such as bask in the sunshine of royal favour, are always glad to encourage, as they can by that means more readily gain an ascendant over the mind of their sovereign: such being the disposition and inattention of the prince, no wonder that the administration was neglected, and every necessary precaution for the security of the kingdom totally overlooked. The Danes, who had for upwards of sixty years refrained from any attempts upon the English coast, owing to the vigorous measures pursued by the former kings during that period, now began to direct their rapacious views once more towards this land of plenty; secure of finding a favourable opportunity in the supineness of the reigning prince to renew their former acts of depredation, if not unmolested, at least without running the hazard that they might otherwise expect under the rule of a wiser and more active monarch. They were moreover encouraged to this by the state of affairs in England, where an universal degeneracy prevailed through the distraction of the times. The Welch, who had for some time lived in peaceable subjection, had lately taken arms under their martial prince Howel. The principal nobility of the kingdom were divided into factions, and each strove to augment his own authority at the expence of the public and of his neighbours. The national militia, the native safeguard of the country, was, in a manner, laid aside, and their places supplied by mercenary troops, who were generally Danes, that knew no other interest but that of plundering the people they were hired to protect: while such of their countrymen, who were settled in England, still retained their old hatred against the English government, and wished for nothing so much as a favourable opportunity of throwing off the yoke that had been imposed upon them, and most probably encouraged their brethren on the continent to embrace this favourable juncture to make a descent, while the government was weak and the kingdom defenceless.

Accordingly in the year 982, according to Heneden, those pirates arrived in seven vessels, and landing in Dorsetshire, ravaged the Isle of Portland, while another armament pillaged the town of Southampton and the neighbouring county, after which they sailed round to Cornwall, and once more made that country the scene of their bloody depredations, while, to increase the miseries of this wretched island, the city of London was, in this very year, burnt to the ground; but history has left us in the dark as to the accident which occasioned the conflagration.

The ensuing year 983, we learn from the Welch historians, that a rebellion broke out in South Wales, wherein Eucon, the gallant prince of that country, was slain, as he was endeavouring to reclaim the mutineers to their duty.

Amidst those confusions the nation sustained a capital loss in the death of Elfer, duke of Mercia, that noble opposer of the monkish arrogance and encroachments, whose name they have for that reason, with their usual spirit of Christian charity, handed down to us with infamy, representing him as having been struck with a lousy disease, of which he died: heaven having thus shewn its exemplary vengeance on a sworn foe to the church and her sons.

And now Ethelred, being justly incensed at the behaviour of the monkish clergy, resolved to make their leader feel the weight of his resentment, by which he proved beyond contradiction, that fanaticism or bigotry were not to be ranked in the number of his failings. The bishop of Rochester, having given him some cause of offence, he blocked him up in his own metropolitan city; but not being able to take it, laid waste all the lands belonging to the cathedral of St. Andrew's. Dunstan, who was daily giving proofs of his overgrown insolence, openly sided with the seditious prelate, and threatened Ethelred with the anger of St. Andrew, if he persisted in his hostilities against the church. But Ethelred, who, weak as he was, had however enough of understanding to laugh Dunstan and his saints to scorn, continued his proceedings, and even compelled the haughty archbishop to send him an hundred pounds; upon which he drew off his forces: but Dunstan, raging with the loss of so great a sum as that was in those times, and the insult offered to his person and authority, had the presumption to menace the king in the most treasonable manner; declaring, that, for the outrage he had offered to the church, the most dreadful calamities should speedily come upon him and his posterity, though he, Dunstan, might not live to see them. After this declaration, the reader will be no longer surprised at the accomplishment of this and other prophecies of the like nature, nor at a loss to account from what source the Danes received encouragement and support in their invasion of this unhappy country.

A. D. 988 the Danes made another descent, and burnt Watchet in Somersetshire. The next year they were opposed by an English thane, Goda, earl of Devon, who was killed in battle, and the Danes remained victors. This same year also died the famous Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, of whom we shall speak more fully in the history of the church. He was soon followed by his two particular friends and colleagues, Oswald, archbishop of York, and Ethelwold, bishop of Winchester. The deaths of these patrons of the monks monks put a final end to the quarrel between the secular and regular clergy, which was never heard of more.

The Danes, after pillaging the coasts of England for ten years successively, remitted their ravages for two years together, which respite gave the harassed natives some hopes that these barbarians had turned their views to some other quarter: but this flattering prospect of quiet was soon over-clouded; for, A. D. 991, Justin and Guthermund, two Danish chieftains, landed a numerous body of troops on the coast of Suffolk, and burnt the town of Ipswich to the ground. On the news of their descent, Brithnot, duke of East Anglia, marched his troops with all expedition, in hopes to fall on them unexpectedly; but he found them too well prepared for him; and, coming to a battle, the fate of the day went against him: he himself lost his life, and his defeat opened the adjacent country to the enemy, who exercised the most horrid ravages where-ever they came.

The inactive Ethelred, instead of putting forth all his power to raise an army to oppose the progress of the invader, had recourse to the dastardly expedient of giving them a sum of money* to get rid of them. This he did by the advice of Siric, who had been raised to the see of Canterbury in the room of the deceased Dunstan, and who, instead of rousing Ethelred to a sense of honour, fostered in him that indolence which proved the opprobrium of his own fame, and the destruction of his kingdom†: for although the Danes, glad of the money, which enabled them to continue their invasions with more success, seemed at first well satisfied; yet this cowardly expedient was so far from answering the purpose intended of ridding the country of those locusts, that it only served as a bait or allurement for others, who thought they had equal right to take advantage of the weakness of the English.

With this view another fleet of these freebooters appeared in the course of the ensuing year, 993, on the coast of East Anglia; but met with a warmer reception than they expected. Ethelred, on this occasion, acted with a spirit becoming a king of England: he summoned his great council of the nation: he laid before them the debilitated state of the marine, and of the whole defensive force of the kingdom in general; desiring they would come to such resolution thereupon, as should be most conducive to the honour of his crown, and the defence of their country. The result of their conference was, that a strong fleet should be fitted out with all possible expedition, and so disposed as to be ready to block up the invading Danes in any of the harbours where their ships should put in for the sake of making a descent. This was a truly wise and politic measure, and would, in all probability, have been attended with such consequences to the Danish navy, which was carelessly scattered up and down in different ports, presuming on the indolence of the English government, that those pirates would not have been in a condition to have made any future attacks on our coast: but this salutary scheme was frustrated by the treachery of Ælfrith, duke of Mercia, who was now recalled from a banishment into which he had been sent by Ethelred, on account of some suspicion of his fidelity; and yet, with an infatuation for which human reason cannot account, was now invested with the command of the fleet, having for his assistants a nobleman, named Thorod, and two bishops, Alfane and Elf-wig.

Ælfrith, who was too much injured to forgive, joyfully embraced this opportunity of being revenged, and secretly acquainted the Danes with every step which had been taken by the government for their destruction; upon which they gathered together their scattered ships as fast as they could, and stood out to sea to avoid the danger; but they could not be expeditious enough to prevent the English fleet from effecting some part of their design. The pagans were formed into one body, and the next day the English were to have given a general charge, when the perfidious Ælfrith went over to the Danes, and by his dissention saved the barbarians fleet at that time from total ruin. However, the London and East Anglian squadron came up with the flying enemy, when a bloody engagement began, in which many thousands of the Danes lost their lives, and one of their ships was taken, besides that in which the traitor Ælfrith commanded in person, who himself escaped with the utmost difficulty. Ethelred, in resentment of his treachery, put out the eyes of his son Ælfrith; yet afterwards, receiving him again into his service, gave him an opportunity of repeating his falsehood.

A. D. 993 the Danes returned again, with a formidable fleet, under Swein king of Denmark, and Anlaff‡ king of Norway; and having sacked and burnt Banborough, in Durham, they next sailed up the river Humber, took Lindsey, and ravaged the greatest part of Yorkshire. Ethelred assembled a body of forces in haste to check their progress, giving the command jointly to three noblemen, named Fræna, Godoin, and Frithegista, who, being of Danish extraction, were in all probability in confederacy with the enemy, as was in some measure verified by their conduct; for, as soon as they came in sight of the Danish army, they took to flight, and left the troops under their command to the mercy of the invaders, who cut most of them in pieces, and then continued to over-run the country without opposition.

After this Swein and Anlaff, joining their forces, sailed up the Thames, and landed near London. They made several vigorous assaults upon the city; but were always bravely repulsed by the besieged. This resistance irritated them so much, that they let loose all their brutal fury upon the circumjacent

* Ten thousand pounds.

† Malmesbury's reflection upon this inglorious measure, is truly worthy of an English pen: "It was," says he, "the advice of Syric, archbishop of Canterbury, that his countrymen should repel that with silver which they could not repel with iron." An infamous unmanly council! To purchase back by money, that liberty with which a gallant man, while alive, would never have parted.

‡ Some authors pretend that this Anlaff was the same with him spoken of in the reigns of Edmund and Ethred; but besides that, the one was king of Norway, which cannot be said of the other, the first Anlaff must have been exceeding old, since he was a general seventy years before this invasion. Historians are very dark and puzzling in relation to the different princes of this name. Some call this king of Norway, who accompanied Swein, by the name of Onlaff, others call him Olaus.

counties of Kent, Essex, and Suffex, whose inhabitants they treated with unparalleled barbarity: at length, having gotten together a great number of horses, upon which they mounted their men, they threatened to extend their ravages over the whole kingdom. In this deplorable situation of affairs, Ethelred summoned another meeting of his states to consider on the most effectual measures for inducing these tygers to remit their cruelties; when the same means were made use of as had been before on a like occasion. A message was sent to the Danes, offering them sixteen thousand pounds in ready money, and a yearly tribute, if they would put a stop to the incursions of their troops. To these proposals the Danes lent a ready ear, and a truce was concluded, when the two kings retired to Southampton, from whence Anlaff came to visit Ethelred, who persuaded him to be baptized. He had no sooner declared himself a Christian than he promised, upon oath, that he would never again enter England as an enemy, and he strictly observed his word.

The two kings then set sail, and the English enjoyed a respite from their depredations during the years 995 and 996. But in the year 997, we find the war renewed again, and Swein landing with a numerous army on the coasts of Devon and Cornwall, laying all waste, demolishing the houses, and putting all the inhabitants to the sword; then advancing as far as South Wales, they entered the Severn, where they committed the same ravages.

All this while the English, who by the long disuse of military discipline, were unexercised in arms, and had run into every kind of effeminacy, were dispirited to the last degree with the cruelties which these barbarians exercised upon those countries that were so unfortunate to lie in their way; and, instead of exerting that noble ardour for which their ancestors were so justly famous, and which was rather inflamed than damped by the prospect of danger, the now degenerated English, I say, were utterly incapable to make head against the bloody torrent that overflowed their country. So that the Danes, in 998, penetrated even into Kent, and sailing up the river Medway, proceeded as far as Rochester. Here indeed they were met by Ethelred, who had found means to get together a body of forces, with which he marched to oppose their projects; but being overpowered by numbers, the English were obliged at last to give way, and were entirely routed by the Danes. These barbarians, who had hitherto found the terror of their name sufficient to open whole countries to their ravages, were so irritated at the resistance they met with on this occasion from the Kentish people, that they set no limits to their brutal revenge, and committed such wanton acts of cruelty as nature shudders to repeat.

To add to the deplorable situation of Ethelred's affairs, a fleet which he had fitted out to engage the Danes at sea, remained inactive through a dissention which prevailed amongst the commanders. Thus the ill-fated English, either through their own misfortunes, or the treachery of their leaders, were every way worsted, while the Danes every day acquired new accessions of wealth and numbers, insomuch that the nation was on the verge of ruin, when, by a turn of affairs as fortunate as it was unexpected, the Danes were called over to the assistance of Richard II. duke of Normandy, whom the king of France threatened to dispossess of his dominions.

Ethelred took advantage of this respite to convoke an assembly of his states, when the question coming to be agitated in what manner the Danes were most effectually to be dealt with? It was determined that the former measures of purchasing their forbearance by tribute, was not only inadequate to the intended end, but at the same time served only as an encouragement to them to renew their incursions on the very next opportunity; it was therefore resolved by this assembly to have recourse to more vigorous efforts, and to carry on the war with spirit, both by sea and land. In consequence of these resolutions a strong fleet was ordered to be fitted out, and numerous levies were made throughout the island. But here Ethelred, as if he was fated to be the instrument of destruction to the kingdom he governed, no sooner saw himself at the head of a powerful land-army, than he seems to have neglected his naval force, the only natural and effectual means of relieving England from her calamities; and instead of going in person on board his fleet, or issuing such orders for stationing the ships as might appear most probable to secure the sea-coasts from farther insults, he turned his arms against Malcolm, who was prince of Cumberland, under Græme, king of Scotland, on pretence that he had favoured the Danes in their late incursions*. However, after plundering part of Cumberland, he was glad to strike up a peace with Malcolm; but whether the issue of this contest was favourable or otherwise to the king of England, historians do not tell us.

Ethelred, after concluding this peace, returned to London, the usual place of his residence; and thinking he had now a favourable opportunity to rid his kingdom of the Danes, and to prevent their returning for the future, he ordered his fleet round to West-Chester, where he proposed to join them with his land-army, and by one decisive blow put an end to the Danish power in this country. This plan, however, though it must be allowed to have been prudently and wisely concerted, and if properly executed, would in all probability have fully answered the salutary ends expected from it, was unhappily frustrated. The winter season was too far advanced, and the strong equinoctial storms, which are so well known upon our coasts, kept his ships wind-bound, so that the proposed junction of the naval and military forces could not take effect, and the remaining spring

* John Fordun, in his Scotch history, gives us the following account of the cause of this rupture: Ethelred having sent to demand of the prince of Cumberland, a subsidy towards defraying the expence of the war, and reimbursing the English government a part of the tribute they had been compelled to pay the Danes, the gallant Malcolm returned this spirited answer, "That he disdained to purchase that liberty with gold which he was ready to preserve with his sword; that the tenure by which he held his dominions was to assist the king of England in person, in all his wars, a condition he was ready to fulfil whenever called upon; but that it should never be said of him that he had contributed to buy off those chains which they still had in their power to break by a valiant resolution." Ethelred was so enraged at this answer, which he considered as a reflection on his own slothful and inglorious behaviour, that he immediately declared war against him on the pretext abovementioned.

and summer was wasted in fruitless ravages in the Isle of Anglesey, of which the Danes were then possessed.

A. D. 1001, the Danes having done their business in Normandy, where they had secured Richard in the possession of his dukedom, returned to England (which, notwithstanding the faint shew of resistance made during the last two years, they now found as defenceless as ever), vowing severe revenge for the disturbance given to their countrymen in their absence. They fulfilled their promise with the most bloody punctuality; no place was free from their ravages; they burnt whole towns to the ground, and drove such of the inhabitants as they did not put to the sword into the open fields, where these merciless invaders suffered them to perish for want of subsistence. They had now penetrated as far as Alton in Hampshire, when they were met by Ethelward at the head of the county-militia; but the Danes, by their superiority of numbers, gained the day, and the English were routed with the loss of many persons of the first distinction, and among the rest Ethelward himself, the king's high-sheriff.

After this victory the Danes, embarking again, sailed round to the coast of Devonshire, and landed near Exeter; here they were joined by one Paleg, with an English squadron under his command. This traitor had been sent by Ethelred's order, to give the Danes battle on their attempting to land; but by this piece of villainy blasted the only hopes the nation had of getting rid of these destroyers. After this, the Danes invested Exeter; but the inhabitants making a stout resistance, they raised the siege, and, in revenge, began to ravage all the adjacent country, till at length the inhabitants of Devonshire, and Somersetshire, unable longer to support the excessive cruelties these barbarians exercised upon them, took up arms, and engaged the enemy at Penne, in Somersetshire; but here the Danes proved again victorious: the English were routed with great slaughter, and two of Ethelred's officers, named Cola and Eadfig, were cut in pieces. After this the conquerors in revenge burnt Penne and Clifton to the ground, together with several other towns; and then, passing over to the Isle of Wight, they destroyed the town of Waltham, with a great many villages; and, availing themselves of some magazines they found there, they extended their irruptions over most part of Hampshire and Dorsetshire. In a word, by their merciless and successful ravages, they seemed to threaten an extinction of the English name and nation, which was indeed in a most miserable condition; for not only all the southern parts were over-run by the foreign Danes, but the northern counties were peopled by the same nation; so that the unhappy English knew not which they had most reason to fear, the avowed enmity of the one, or the secret treachery of the other, who in several instances had not only refused to fight against the foreigners, whom they looked upon as their countrymen, but had even at different times joined them, and assisted in destroying that country, which was now in a manner become their own, and which as such they ought to have defended to the utmost of their power.

In this extremity Ethelred gave himself up to fear and despondence, and, instead of endeavouring to oppose the enemy, summoned a council, A. D. 1002, and by their advice submitted once more to pay them a considerable sum, on condition they desisted from their hostilities. The sum to be paid the Danes for their forbearance, was fixed at twenty-four thousand pounds, which was immediately raised by a tax on the people, distinguished by the name of Dane Geld*; a tax which afterwards became exceeding burdensome to the nation, even for a long time after the Danes had quitted England. But the clergy and monks found means to slip their necks out of the collar.

The Danes, on receiving the money, withdrew their forces; but a great number of them chose to continue behind in England, and take up their habitation with such of their countrymen who were already settled here, and in time became excessive insolent and oppressive, living upon the labours of the English, whom they treated as a conquered people, and who were grown so abject and servile by their late misfortunes, that they chose to endure any insult rather than offend their new masters, and thereby provoke them to repeat their former inhuman ravages; and so great was the dread with which their very name inspired the dispirited English, that the latter on all occasions gave them the appellation of Lord Danes, which has since been altered into Lordain, and used as a term of reproach, to signify a purse-proud, idle man, who takes upon him a state that is in no-wise his due.

Ethelred, having found, by dear-bought experience, how little confidence was to be placed even on those who were the nearest about his person, or on a body of hireling troops that were always ready to betray the cause committed to their protection; whenever they could be gainers by deserting it, bethought himself of an expedient, which has been frequently made use of by our English kings, and which has generally proved in its consequences more fatal to the peace and honour of the nation than the evils which it has been intended to remove; I mean, a foreign alliance. Richard II. duke of Normandy, and Ethelred, had for some years been at variance; but their differences having been lately settled in an amicable manner, by the interposition of the pope, Ethelred thought he should find a powerful ally and protector in the Norman, whose ports, during the late invasions of the Danes, had been always open to those pirates, and by their situation, directly opposite to the English coast, served them as a convenient rendezvous, whenever they meditated any descent upon this island; but, by the intended alliance, he was in hopes to deprive the enemy of these advantages.

* That is, Dane's Money, or money for the Danes, and was the first land-tax known in England. It was raised by a tax of twelve pence laid on every hide of land. A hide of land is by some authors calculated to be as much as can be ploughed by one plough in a year. Bede fixes it at as much as can maintain one family; some are so particular as to say, that it contained one hundred acres; and others again assert, that the number of acres was uncertain. This tax was afterwards named Hidagium, and then used as a general name for all taxes laid upon land. It was released by Edward the Confessor, but levied again by William I. and II. after which it was laid aside by Henry I. and abolished entirely by king Stephen. It is suggested that this ancient tax might probably be a precedent for our land tax of three or four shillings in the pound, when first granted.

An ambassador was therefore dispatched from the English court to Richard, demanding his sister Emma in marriage for the British monarch. This lady was so remarkably beautiful, that she was called the Pearl of Normandy. Richard readily embraced the proposals made him by Ethelred, and Emma was accordingly sent over to England, where the nuptials were solemnized with great splendor; but all the mighty advantages which Ethelred had flattered himself with from that match, he soon rendered abortive, by a step which has reflected eternal infamy on his own character, and entailed misery upon his posterity.

And here I wish that historical truth would permit me to draw a veil over a scene of so much blood and treachery, that affords a mortifying instance of what the English ferocity, as it is called by foreigners, is capable of acting, when worked up into rage by a long continuance of oppression and provoking insults; but, as all writers are unanimous in the notoriety of the fact, it cannot be passed over in silence.

And here it will not be improper to take a review of the chief ministers and generals about Ethelred's person, and by whose advice he appears to have been actuated in most affairs of importance, being himself naturally weak, fearful, and irresolute. These were as follow:

Leoffig, an eolderman of whom we know little, but that he was employed by Ethelred to negotiate with the Danes, and that he was soon after banished the kingdom for the murder of one of the king's officers. The next was Huna, general of the army; a man of personal courage and activity, but of a revengeful, mean, and treacherous disposition. The last I shall mention was Edric Streno, afterwards duke of Mercia, who had married Edgitha, the king's daughter. This man seemed born for the ruin of his country, and deserved the execration of posterity: he was rich, proud, cruel, crafty, and insinuating: he had the art of winning the secrets of others from them, while he concealed his own, and had a head to contrive, and a tongue to persuade to whatever mischiefs his heart was inclined to perpetrate: he had constantly betrayed all the king's counsels to his enemies, and whenever Ethelred had gained any advantage over them, he never failed to prevent him, by some specious counsel, from improving it; and when it became absolutely necessary, threw off the mask, and made an open defection to them; having no other thing in view than how to enrich and aggrandize himself, be the means as they might: in a word, his whole life was a continued scene of treachery.

Such were the counsellors of Ethelred, who instigated him to the impolitic and barbarous step of putting all the Danes in his kingdom to death by a general massacre. Having roused his resentment by the most artful insinuations, and interested his fears by pretended conspiracies to deprive him of his life, they at last determined him to strike the blow. Accordingly he commanded letters to be privately sent to all his officers throughout his dominions, with an order inclosed, that upon the feast of St. Bricius, or St. Brice, (November 13, 1002) all the Danes in England were to be slain without distinction of age or sex, excepting those in East Anglia and Northumberland, who were too numerous to be mastered by the few English residing in those countries. These orders were obeyed with an exactness as barbarous as the dispositions that had dictated them; women and children were indiscriminately made the victims of this national butchery, which we are told by Huntingdon was but the work of one night; many of the Danes, who lived at London, fled for protection to a church in the city; but they were either dragged from thence, or massacred at the altars, to which they clung. The ruffian Edric distinguished himself in this scene of blood by an action for which his memory will ever be held in detestation and horror.

Upon the late negotiation, when Swein, king of Denmark, withdrew his forces from England, he had left his sister Gunilda as an hostage for his performance of the conditions agreed upon by the treaty. This lady had resided some time in England, had been married to count Paling, an English nobleman, had embraced the Christian faith, and looked upon herself as an Englishwoman. It was with the utmost grief and horror that she beheld the cruelties and depredations committed by her countrymen in this unfortunate land, and it was chiefly owing to her intercessions that her brother Swein had agreed to treat of peace with the English, whom he already looked upon as his conquered vassals, and their nation in the number of his dominions. Gunilda had resided, together with her children, under the eye of Edric, to whose care Ethelred had committed her on her becoming an hostage, and who now devoted this unfortunate princess to fall among the crowds of her countrymen; but, in the first place, he caused her husband and children to be put to death before her eyes, and then ordered that she herself should be run through the body with lances. It is more than probable that this act of savage cruelty in Edric was an effect of that treachery we have already taken notice of in his character, and that, to provoke Swein to another invasion, he took advantage of the popular fury against the Danes to perpetrate this inhuman murder upon his sister. As to Gunilda, she suffered with an exemplary heroism, only declaring, that the shedding her blood would bring infallible destruction upon the English nation.

The event answered the unhappy lady's prediction; for, notwithstanding the rigid execution of the order for the late massacre, some Danish young men found means to get aboard a vessel in the river; and setting sail, soon reached the coasts of Denmark, and informed Swein of the bloody tragedy that had been acted in England. This news, together with the ignominious murder of his sister, roused all his innate hatred to the English nation within the breast of the furious Dane, who bound himself with a fearful vow to take revenge on the English for their perfidy and barbarity. He was as good as his word; for landing with a numerous army in the spring of A. D. 1003, on the coast of Cornwall, he laid the country waste with a degree of fury that shewed this invasion to be intended not so much to acquire riches or dominion, as to satiate the raging thirst of revenge. The city of Exeter next fell into the enemy's hands, having been betrayed to them by Hugh the Norman, whom Emma had made governor, and who is suspected of having held a treasonable correspondence with Swein previous to his landing. Be that as it may, Exeter was taken, sacked, sacked, and plundered, and its fortifications razed to the ground. From hence the victorious Swein proceeded into Hants, intending to force his way into Wiltshire; but Ethelred, having gotten together an army out of these counties, sent it to oppose the progress of the Danes, and had given the command to Edric, duke of Mercia, whom, notwithstanding his former treachery, he had again taken into his favour. This impolitic step, like many others of the like nature, only served to make his affairs more desperate; for the remembrance of his exile, and the putting out of his son Ælfrith's eyes, which had been done by the command of Ethelred, as we have related in a former page, was still fresh in the duke's mind, and he was rejoiced at having an opportunity given him to revenge the injury he had suffered. Therefore, as soon as he came in sight of the enemy, he feigned himself suddenly sick; and, pretending that he was in no condition to lead on his forces at that time, he ordered them to retreat; but the dispositions he made for this purpose were so concerted as to throw the troops into a disorder, of which the Danes, taking the proper advantage, put them to rout. Swein, after this easy victory, marched to Wilton, and then to Old Sarum, both which towns he burnt to the ground; and then, returning to his fleet, sailed back to Denmark, where he passed the winter.

The ensuing spring, A. D. 1004, he made another descent on the territories of the East Angles, and reduced the city of Norwich to ashes; after which he prepared to march farther into the country. Ulfketel, who was at that time governor of East Anglia, was too well acquainted with the superior power of the invading army to attempt any resistance; and knowing also that money was a never-failing argument with these sons of rapine, he, with the advice of the principal noblemen of the country, agreed to pay the Danes a stipulated sum, on condition of being left at quiet; but the Barbarians, as usual, having got the money into their hands, no longer thought of performing their promises; and probably they might think that the late flagrant act of treachery and cruelty on the part of the English, in the massacre of their countrymen, authorized any breach of faith that interest might dictate. Accordingly they stole away in their ships to Thetford, a town then of great note, which underwent the same fate as Norwich had done. Ulfketel, incensed at this treachery, determined to use all his endeavours to be revenged on the authors, and with this view ordered a party to go and burn their ships in the harbour, while he himself with another army, which he had hastily raised, marched forward with an intention to fall upon them before they could recover their confusion. Had his orders been punctually obeyed, this had proved a decisive stroke, and the nation had, in all probability, been freed from any future apprehensions on the part of the Danes; but those who were entrusted with the command of the expedition wanting spirit to put the governor's commands into execution, the Danes had time to do their business. However, this small advantage was dearly bought; for Ulfketel, who had marched night and day in hopes that his orders had been followed, came up with them before they had regained their ships; and the Danes, finding that all possibility of a retreat was cut off, and presuming on their superior numbers, resolved to stand the charge, and a battle ensued, which was fought with such desperate fury, on the side of the English in particular, that the fate of the day more than once inclined in their favour, till the great superiority of numbers weighing down the balance, the English were at length compelled to retreat with some loss, but that of the Danes was much greater.

This check, the rudest they had for some time experienced, made the pirates more circumspect in their future operations, and seems to have determined them to desist for a while from further attempts; and towards the close of this year they returned home.

But as if Heaven was resolved to manifest its displeasure for the detestable piece of policy of which Ethelred and his subjects had been guilty, and which, however it may be glossed over by some too partial historians as an act of self-preservation and lawful retaliation, was, in strict truth, an infamous breach of faith, as well as a deed of shocking inhumanity; this unhappy land was afflicted the ensuing year with a terrible famine. "England, faith Florence, had never before experienced the like distress; numbers perished by this most dreadful scourge, and many of those, who had escaped the fury of the murdering Danes, perished for want."

No sooner had this destroying angel ended his commission, when the Danes appeared again upon our shores, threatening the total destruction of the land. Their fleet was first seen off Sandwich, in Kent, where they made a descent, and, as usual, marked their progress with fire and sword; but not all that Ethelred could do, who on this occasion had put himself at the head of an army, composed of the natives of Wessex and Mercia, could provoke them to a battle. Mindful of their late narrow escape, they continued their depredations at a distance from the English army; and whenever Ethelred was on the march towards them, they retired on board their ships, and stood out to sea. In this manner they baffled all the king's attempts to come up with them, and he saw his forces wearied out with fruitless marches and counter-marches during the autumn. Winter coming on, he was constrained to quit the field, and left the invaders at liberty to retire to the Isle of Wight with the great booty they had amassed in the course of their summer expedition. On Ethelred's return home he disbanded his troops, which, as they consisted of volunteers, who served at their own expence, were not to be kept together longer than the rod of danger was immediately hanging over them. This the Danes had probably foreseen; for no sooner was the royal army dispersed, which was about Christmas, A. D. 1006, than they, suddenly issuing from their retreat, came over into Hampshire, and began their ravages in that and the neighbouring counties. Secure of meeting with no opposition, they marched as far as Reading, in Berks, lighted all the way by the conflagrations of their own kindling, and advanced to Cuckamsby-hill, after having levelled Wallingford with the ground, and then returned to their fleet by another road. An army was suddenly raised at Kennet, in Wiltshire, to cut off their retreat; but this county being under the command of the traitor Edric, he found means means to give the Danes timely notice of the intended motions of the English army, which they carefully avoided, and regained their ships without molestation.

Ethelred was then keeping his Christmas in Shropshire, as being the most distant from the theatre of blood and desolation: but, roused at length by the repeated cries of his subjects, he endeavoured to raise an army to relieve them from their oppression; yet when he had done so, some means were found by the traitors about him to render it useless. He summoned councils, but they either broke up without coming to any resolution, or proposed such measures as evidently tended to increase the misery of the nation. In this extremity, the king resolved to bribe those whom he could not withstand; accordingly an offer was made to Swein of thirty thousand pounds*, in consideration of which he agreed to indulge the English with another temporary respite†.

Ethelred, to be prepared against their return, ordered ships to be built all over the kingdom, every three hundred and ten tides of land being to furnish one; so that a greater fleet was now fitted out than had ever been known in this nation: for the people, sensible of the advantages they were to derive from these regulations, cheerfully contributed their several quotas. All the year 1007, and great part of 1008, were taken up in these matters; and in 1009 this mighty armament, being completed, rendezvoused at Sandwich, and the command of it was given by the king to Bright-ric, brother to Edric Streon, and, like him, a proud, insolent, faithless, and ambitious man.

Such a fleet and such vigorous measures under a prince of greater authority, or more beloved by his people than Ethelred was, might have made him glorious, and his nation happy; but the choice he made of his officers, whether owing to his own inabilities and want of knowledge, or his not daring to thwart in their pretensions those whom he had raised to a dangerous degree of power, defeated all the ends proposed by fitting out so chargeable a navy.

Brightric, presuming upon his own and his brother's interest at court, preferred a false accusation against another of Ethelred's principal officers, named Wulfnoth, a person of distinguished worth and courage, and therefore the object of his hatred. Wulfnoth, though conscious of his own innocence, yet, knowing the villainy of Brightric, and the weakness of Ethelred, resolved upon a voluntary banishment, rather than stand the issue of a trial; but at the same time was determined, Parthian like, to gall his enemies, even in his flight, and wrought so effectually on the minds of twenty commanders of the English fleet, by the odious lights in which he represented Brightric, and the danger that every brave man was in from his great sway at court, that these officers followed him with their ships, and all of them turning pyrates, infested the southern coasts of England, where they did as much mischief as the Danes. Brightric, enraged at this defection, the blame of which was loudly ascribed to his overbearing temper, resolved to strike a blow that should at once cover him with glory, and glut his revenge against Wulfnoth. Full of this design, he put to sea with eighty sail, resolved to take his enemy either alive or dead; but Heaven, who never suffers perfidy to go unpunished, baffled all his views of glory and revenge, by a violent storm, which arising suddenly while he was in full chace of Wulfnoth and his squadron, stranded, wrecked, or sunk most of his ships; those that outlived the tempest fell into the hands of Wulfnoth. Thus ingloriously ended the last hopes of England, and thus did this mighty armament come to nothing, through the dissensions which prevailed among its commanders.

The Danes, who had been awed by the great naval preparations of the English from attempting an invasion, no sooner heard that they had thus played away the last stake they had for their liberties, than they put to sea, and, in the spring of 1009, landed with a large fleet at Sandwich, under the command of Turkul, while another squadron at the same time made a descent on the Isle of Thanet, headed by Haming and Anlaff. The three leaders joining their forces plundered the whole county of Kent, and would have laid the city of Canterbury in ashes, had not the inhabitants purchased their forbearance with a large sum of money.

Whilst the Danes were thus employed in the accustomed trade of pillaging, Ethelred drew together an army to make head against them, and as men who are blinded by avarice are always deaf to command, Ethelred had a fair opportunity of falling upon these robbers, while carelessly dispersed in parties for the sake of plunder, and, by one seasonable blow, have relieved his bleeding country, at least for a time, from all the miseries which it laboured under. But his untoward fate, which never abandoned him, made him in this instance rely on the advice of the arch-traitor, Edric, his constant attendant, who represented to him that it was better to let them pass with their booty unmolested to their ships, than hazard a battle that might prove fatal to his crown and life. The infatuated Ethelred, with whose own low fears this counsel but too aptly coincided, readily acquiesced; and thus the English lost that irretrievable opportunity. The Danes, having got safe to their ships, returned to the Isle of Thanet, where they took up their winter quarters, and from thence ravaged the adjacent countries, and made several attacks upon the city of London, though always without success, owing to the bravery of its citizens.

In the spring, A.D. 1010, we find them landing at Ipswich, where they surprised the brave Ulfketel, the only faithful general Ethelred had, who lay encamped there with his army, having under him in the command one Thurketyl Myranheafod (or the Ant-headed): this fellow proved an errant coward, or rather traitor; for the instant the Danes landed, and were on the march towards him, he set spurs to his horse, and betook himself to a shameful flight. This conduct in one of their leaders struck the English with such a panic, that, breaking their ranks, each man sought his own safety, and not all the efforts of the gallant Ulfketel and the rest of the officers could bring them to rally; the Danes falling upon them in this confusion, slaughtered them like sheep. Ethelstan, the king's son, Ulfketel, and several noble persons were slain, endeavouring to bring the runaways to a sense of their duty; and the whole country was left open to the fury of the victors, who, being now masters of East Anglia, found there a sufficient number of horses to mount their troops that hitherto had fought on foot, and by this advantage were enabled to extend their incursions at pleasure, which they did all over Essex, Huntingdon, Oxfordshire*, Buckingham, Bedford, and Hertfordshires; they afterwards penetrated into Northamptonshire, destroyed the town of Northampton by fire, and then bending their march through Wessex and Wiltshire, spread slaughter and devastation where-ever they passed, till winter put a short stop to their ravages.

The returning year, 1011, however, brought them back again, when they renewed their former havock in the same counties, while the pusillanimous Ethelred, instead of attempting to oppose their progress, kept himself close shut up in London, which city, and Canterbury, were the only places of note that remained in his power; and the latter soon after fell into the hands of the Danes, by the treachery of one Æalmar, a monk, who took an opportunity to let them in while the soldiers were busied in extinguishing the flames which had caught in several places in the city from the fire-balls that had been thrown into it by the enemy. On this occasion the archbishop Alphege was murdered† by the barbarians, who likewise slew nine out of every ten Augustine monks‡, whom they found in the place, and, after pillaging the city, they burned it to ashes.

The brutalities exercised by the Danes, when the city fell into their hands, exceed all conception. Simon of Durham tells us, that they threw some of the unhappy captives over the wall, roasted others alive, hung up others by their private parts, tore the infants from their mother's breasts, some of which they tossed on spears, with all the wantonness of barbarity, while others were laid under the wheels of carts, which were drawn over them; matrons and virgins were dragged naked through the streets, and prostituted with such circumstances as are shocking to nature. It is a melancholy instance of the depravity of the human heart, that the very wretch, who, by his perfidy, had been the cause of these complicated miseries to his countrymen, had a very short time before this event been indebted for his own life to the archbishop Alphege.

Ethelred, finding the nation reduced to this deplorable state, summoned a council of all the great men of his kingdom at London, A. D. 1012, in order to consult what was most proper to be done in the present emergency; when, after many different councils, no better expedient could be devised, but that of bribing the enemy with a sum of money sufficiently large to satisfy their avarice, and induce them to desist from further ravages; and by the advice of Edric it was agreed to pay them forty-eight thousand pounds||, which, as soon as they had received, their armies and fleet divided. Turkul, with forty-five sail, stayed at London, and submitted to Ethelred, the crew promising to defend him against all invaders, on condition he would furnish them only with provisions and cloathing during the time they remained in his service.

The perfidious Danes, however, did not suffer our unhappy countrymen to taste the sweets of peace for any length of time; for, in the spring of 1013, Swein came again with his fleet off Sandwich: however, he did not attempt to land there; but continuing his route, sailed for the Humber, and landed at Gainsborough. No sooner had he set foot on shore, than Uthred, earl of Northumberland, with the whole county under his command, voluntarily submitted to him. Their example was followed by all the country north of Watlingstreet. The progress of Swein, after this, seems to have been very rapid; and, as he always grew furious upon resistance, he bent the chief of his resentment against the inhabitants of Mercia, who, together with the Londoners, had held out with the greatest bravery. Having mounted his men on horses, which he obliged the inhabitants of those countries that had submitted, to furnish him with, he then marched into Oxford, and made himself master of that place. From thence he led his troops to Winchester, where the inhabitants threw open the gates to receive him at his first approach.

Flushed with success, he determined to proceed to London, not doubting but this place would prove as easy a conquest as those he had already subdued; but here he found his former good fortune somewhat fail him; for, in the first place, he lost a considerable number of his men in crossing the river Thames, and when he presented himself before the walls of London, he found the brave citizens determined to hold out to the last extremity. Animated by the presence of their king, they rushed upon death for liberty, thinking that they could never merit forgiveness, should they deliver up their sovereign, who had thrown himself into their arms for protection. On the other hand, the Danes, elate with former victories, and thinking that the taking of London would finish the conquest of England, made hope of glory and riches an incentive to courage; so that both sides fought with the greatest fury; but that of the English was crowned with victory, through the astonishing valour of the citizens. The Dane was obliged to raise the siege, and retire with the shattered remains of his army to Bath. In one of the sallies made by the besieged, Swein himself narrowly escaped falling into their hands.

* The city of Oxford being burnt that year by the Danes, all studies ceased there till the year 1133. Tho. Redburn.

† Tindal, in his notes upon Rapin, says, that he was killed at Greenwich, to which place (the station of their ships) the Danes had brought him prisoner. And that in the present church of Greenwich (that which is now called the Old Church) on the top of the partition wall, between the nave of the church and the chancel, is this inscription, "This church was erected and dedicated to the glory of God, and the memory of St. Alphege, archbishop of Canterbury, here slain by the Danes, because he would not ransom his life by an unreasonable sum of money." The Saxon annals relate, that Arnolth and Ælfhume, bishops of Lincoln and London, carried his body away the next morning, and buried it in St. Paul's cathedral.

‡ Florence of Worcester saith, the burghers were served in the same manner; so that only four monks and about eight hundred laymen were left alive.

|| The Saxon Chron. and Speed compute it only at eight thousand pounds, which must be a mistake.

The Danish foldiers were fo exasperated at this defeat, and at finding all their hopes of a vast booty baffled, that they redoubled their ravages all the way as they retreated. This fo intimidated the English, that Ethelmar, earl of Cornwall, with most of the West Saxon nobility, repaired to Swein at Bath, and gave him hostages for their fidelity. Swein, having now reduced all England, London excepted, to his obedience, or at least overawed it by his power, returned to his ships, having first assumed the title of king of England. However, as he could not rest satisfied whilst London held out against him, he resolved to attack it once more. But whilst he was making formidable preparations for this siege, the Londoners, sensible that they were in no condition to make a long resistance, and that the appearance of one would only serve to subject them to the merciless revenge of an irritated enemy, they determined to follow the example of the rest of the kingdom, and accordingly sent deputies to make their submission, offering hostages for their future pacific behaviour.

The unfortunate Ethelred, say our historians, betrayed by his dukes, deserted by all, and seeing little hopes of safety any where, and, dreading least he should be sold into the hands of his enemy, went first on board Turkull's fleet in his service, then lying at Greenwich, and afterwards passed over to the Isle of Wight. From hence he sent his queen Emma, with his two sons Edward and Alfred, into Normandy, in order to try the pulse of her brother Richard, duke of that country, and whether he was inclinable to grant him a secure asylum in case he should find it necessary to quit his kingdom entirely. The negotiations of Emma proved as successful as could be wished; and Richard, who was a prince of great magnanimity, invited Ethelred over in the most affectionate manner, with a full assurance of safety, and some hopes of succours. Accordingly he went over to Rouen, and left his kingdom to the mercy of the conqueror.

Speed relates that Ethelred, when he came to the Isle of Wight, called together the few men of any rank, who still followed his fortunes, and harangued them in the following speech, which we shall here transcribe for the entertainment of our readers, on account of its curiosity, without pretending to vouch for its being authentic. "If I myself was void of a paternal regard for the defence of the kingdom, or the administration of justice; or even if ye yourselves were defective in courage for the defence of your native country; I should have brooded over my calamities in silence, and given myself up a prey to dejection. But as this is not the case, I have formed a resolution to rush into the midst of the enemy, and sacrifice my life to my kingdom and my crown. I am certain you must esteem that death to be honourable which is purchased in defence of the liberties of our relations and posterity. Let us then, one and all, resolve to die in so noble a cause. I see that we are abandoned by God, and providence; and that our ruin is arrived to its crisis. We are not overcome by the swords, or courage of the enemy, but by the treason and perfidy of our friends. Our navy is betrayed into the hands of the Danes; our armies are weakened by the revolt of our officers; our designs betrayed to the adversary by our counsellors; who, instead of extricating us from our troubles, are continually persuading us to infamous treaties. I myself am disesteemed, and contemptuously termed Ethelred the Unready: your valour and loyalty is rendered ineffectual by the treachery of your leaders, and our poverty yearly aggravated by the payment of Danegelt, which God only knoweth how we are to redress, though it is our duty to make the trial. In vain do we purchase a peace with money, in vain do we oblige the Danes to confirm it by oaths. Regardless of God and man, they break through the most sacred sanctions, and pay not the least regard to equity, to the laws of war, or the laws of nations. So far are we from any prospect of an alteration in our circumstances to our advantage, that we have the greatest reason to fear the loss of our kingdom, and the utter extinction of the English name and reputation. Seeing therefore our enemies are not at a distance, and their swords are close to our throats; let us, by our wisdom and prudence, rescue ourselves from danger, or else courageously sheath our swords in the bowels of our enemies. Either of these expedients I shall adopt with the greatest readiness, in order to preserve the state, and snatch the nation from irrecoverable ruin." Our author informs us, "that this pathetic speech affected the audience, but filled them at the same time with distraction. However, they concluded that it would be in vain to hazard an engagement, which might be defeated by treachery; to surrender themselves to the enemy would be to anticipate their servitude and misery; and to flee before them their eternal ignominy and reproach*."

William of Malmesbury will have it, that the submission of the Londoners to Swein was entirely owing to this inglorious resolve in their king, of whose degeneracy they were ashamed, and that they would have held out to the last, though all England had yielded to the conqueror, had not Ethelred abandoned them. This is much more probable, and bears a greater conformity to the approved fidelity of the inhabitants of that capital, and the dastardly disposition of the prince, who had taken refuge within their walls, than the confused accounts we have of this matter from Simeon of Durham, and the annalists, who nevertheless do not contradict the fact.

But as the minds of the English are of all people the most susceptible of another's distress, however merited, this inglorious abdication was so far from bringing Ethelred into contempt, that it awakened in the hearts of his subjects every sentiment of pity and compassion for his fallen estate, which were in no wise lessened by the treatment they received from their new master Swein, who was every day burthening them with fresh impositions for the payment of the Danish troops who had assisted him in his conquests.

Our historians seem very much in the dark with regard to the personal story of this prince, who certainly was no king of England, notwithstanding that some authors have been fond of ranking him as such; for, besides his never having been crowned, there are no traces of any one act of civil authority exercised by him: but indeed his whole story, and that part which relates to his death in particular, is an absolute collection of legendary absurdities *. Some say he died a natural death, being choaked with rheum; others say he was poisoned. Whatever was the cause, it is certain that he died suddenly on the third of February, A. D. 1014, at Gainsborough in Lincolnshire, only six weeks after he had been acknowledged as sovereign of England, upon the abdication of Ethelred.

Immediately upon his death the Danes proclaimed his son Canute king of England: but the tide of popular affection began now to run very strong in favour of the self-exiled Ethelred; and it was resolved, in a general assembly of the leading men of the nation, to recall him, and place him once more on the throne: but they knew his disposition too well to do it without terms; accordingly ambassadors were deputed to acquaint him with the happy turn of affairs, and to make a tender of their allegiance and affection, provided he would amend his government, throw off that indolence which had proved the destruction of his kingdom, and rule with justice, equity, and moderation; all which Ethelred promised in the most solemn manner.

In consequence of these measures Canute was declared an outlaw; and Ethelred, returning soon after, was received by his own subjects with every demonstration of joy and fidelity, and in a short time found himself at the head of a brave and numerous army, with which he immediately marched towards Canute, then encamped at Gainsborough, who, finding himself in no condition to withstand the force Ethelred was bringing against him, determined to quit the kingdom; and accordingly hoisted sail to take possession of the crown of Denmark, now vacant by the death of his father Swein.

We cannot in this place forbear testifying our surprize, that none of our English historians of those times should have assigned reasons for this sudden going off of Canute, who had never been worsted, and had still many strong places in the kingdom in his hands; but, though our English history is silent on this head, the Danish accounts for his proceedings very clearly: for it informs us, that Canute had a younger brother, named Harold, who, having been made regent in the absence of his father Swein, seized upon the kingdom for himself. It was this that obliged Canute to leave England in so hasty a manner as seemed rather to proceed from his fears, than the effect of sound politics; which latter was however the case: for what prince of common prudence would have resolved to leave the kingdom of his ancestors in the hand of an usurper, for the sake of contesting a foreign crown in a country newly conquered, and whose inhabitants seemed determined to support their own prince, whom they had lately recalled at the expence of their lives and fortunes? Besides, should the event of war prove unfavourable to him, what hopes could he entertain of having succours from Denmark, whilst that kingdom was in the hands of his brother? The subsequent conduct of Canute plainly evinced that the step he had now taken proceeded from very different motives to those of fear, which have been generally laid to his charge; for no sooner had he settled his affairs in the North, than he returned with his victorious troops to England. But, to proceed with our history.

As soon as Ethelred found himself freed from his dreaded enemies the Danes, regardless of the promises he had made to his subjects on his readmission, he gave a loose to his arbitrary and avaricious temper, loaded them with the most burdensome taxes, and, in a word, governed in a manner the very reverse of what he had so solemnly vowed to do; and, as if he thought these public acts of infidelity and oppression were not sufficient to alienate the minds of his subjects from him again, he added one of a private nature that rendered him for ever detestable to all good and honest men in the nation, and revived all the former dissensions between him and his people.

There was at this time, A. D. 1015 †, at Ethelred's court, two noblemen, named Sigeforth and Morcar, who were of Danish extraction, and so strongly attached to the king, that their fidelity, which should have been their protection, determined the traitor Edric to compass their ruin. This wretch had still address or power enough to retain a strong hold in Ethelred's affections; and, having constant access to his person, he privately accused these noblemen of holding a correspondence with the enemies of their country, and having formed a design against the king's life, Ethelred, whose mind was susceptible of any impressions that artful villainy might endeavour to make on it, firmly believed the nefarious tale told him by his favourite; but, knowing how well these noblemen were beloved by the people, he was apprehensive that a public execution might be attended with fatal consequences to his own authority; and therefore intimated his wish, that they could be privately made away with. The vile Edric, ever ready when deeds of blood or treachery were on foot, took upon himself the conduct of this matter. Under a shew of respectful regard, he invited Sigeforth and Morcar to an entertainment at his own house, where, contrary to the laws of honour and hospitality, he had them murdered. Ethelred was no sooner satisfied of their death,

* Florence of Worcester relates the manner of his death as follows: Swein, while he was encamped at Gainsborough, called a general assembly of his great officers, to whom he declared his intention of sending out a party the next day to plunder and burn the adjacent monastery of Bradicesworth. Scarce had he uttered these words, when, on a sudden, he cried out with great vehemence, Help! help! fellow soldier! See! here is king Edmund coming to kill me! and so saying, he was instantly struck with a mortal blow by St. Edmund, and lay in great torment till the next morning, when he expired. But John of Tinmouth, in his Hist. aurea, makes St. Edmund's ghost to have stabbed him with a dagger as he sat in his chair. William of Malmesbury says, that St. Edmund appeared to him in his sleep, and smote him while he was in bed, for answering him rudely; but all agree his death to have been occasioned by a blow, which he received from St. Edmund. Such are the reports of the old historians. The truth seems to be this, that some of his great men, jealous of the vast accession of power Swein was about to acquire, by having the dominion of England added to that of his own kingdom, and fearing that they should no longer be able to maintain the same authority as they had heretofore done when he was only sovereign of the kingdom of Denmark, hired some ruffian to stab him privately, who afterwards escaping, the monks of St. Edmund's-Bury invented this legend to honour their saint, and deter others from daring to violate the place of their settlement.

† This year a prodigious inundation of the sea happened all along the coast, overflowing several cities and sweeping off great numbers of the inhabitants.

than he sent his son Edmund to seize their estates, and at the same time commanded Elgitha, the widow of Sigeforth, to be confined in the monastery of Malmesbury*.

The calm enjoyed by England, after the retreat of Canute, was of very short duration; for having recovered the throne from his brother Harold, he returned with redoubled force to England, and landed at Sandwich, the usual entering port to the Danish invaders. Afterwards, sailing round Kent, he landed his troops in the country of the West Saxons, and ravaged Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, and Somersetshire.

In the mean time, Edmund, Ethelred's son, levied a considerable body of troops in the North by his own interest, while Edric, at the head of another body in the South, acted as commander in chief under the king. When the two armies came in sight of the Danes, and every thing was prepared for coming to an engagement with the enemy, Edmund received advice that the villainous duke of Mercia had formed a plot for taking him off; which he no sooner heard than he drew off the body of troops he commanded to a place of safety. By this division the Dane was left master of the field. Edric, finding his treachery now discovered beyond a possibility of palliation, and that the eyes even of the infatuated Ethelred were at length opened to his baseness, determined to throw off the mask he could no longer wear with security, and openly to side with those to whom he had all along been a friend in secret, against every dictate of honour, gratitude, and fidelity. Accordingly, having found means to gain over forty of Ethelred's ships from their allegiance, he went on board them, and joined Canute's fleet. His defection was followed by that of the greatest part of the West Saxons, with whom he had a powerful interest, and who now declared for Canute, sending him hostages for their fidelity†.

Upon being thus powerfully reinforced, we find Canute, A. D. 1016, advancing towards the Thames with an hundred and sixty sail, headed by himself and Edric; and passing over into the Mercian dominions as far as Cricklade, in Wiltshire, and then turning into Warwickshire, he spread ruin and desolation where-ever he went. The generous soul of Edmund was penetrated with the distresses of his country, and he resolved once more to try the fortune of the field against these ruthless invaders. Not content with forming these noble and patriotic resolutions in his own breast, he left nothing untried to rouse the indolent and desponding spirit of his father Ethelred, who was at length persuaded, by the generous remonstrances of his son, to put himself at the head of his armies, and attempt a decisive blow, that might prove the means of retrieving his affairs.

No sooner were the king's intentions of taking the field in person made known to the people, than they strove who should be foremost in repairing to the royal standard; being also more especially moved thereto by hearing that Edmund, for whom they had the highest love and veneration, was to be his father's colleague in the command. In a word, a very great army was speedily raised, and the hour seemed now drawing nigh when the harassed English would once more recover their former ease and independency by driving the barbarous disturbers of their quiet headlong out of the kingdom; but, by a strange fatality, Ethelred again became the dupe of treachery and his own irresolution. The Danes had still emissaries about his person, who were incessantly taking advantage of his fears; and, on this occasion, they found means to persuade him that a plot was formed against his life and government. The credulous monarch gave into the snare; and notwithstanding all the remonstrances of his son Edmund, and the repeated asseverations of fidelity from his nobles and people, with their solemn declarations of standing by him to the last man, he most ingloriously and ungratefully deserted them in this critical juncture, and retiring with a shameful precipitation to London, there shut himself up. Upon this the Mercians refused to fight, when they were no longer to be headed by the king agreeable to his promise, and withdrew their forces. The gallant Edmund, seeing himself thus robbed of his glory in the very instant that it was within his grasp, and that the destruction of the Danes seemed inevitable, and perceiving it was not now in his power to stop the progress of the enemy, resolved to go and join Uthred, earl of Northumberland, who had levied some troops in the North, and they together ravaged those provinces that had declared for the Danes. Canute, alarmed at the danger which threatened his adherents in those parts, marched with all expedition to their relief, and advanced as far as York. Uthred, terrified at the approach of this formidable enemy, to whom he found himself greatly inferior, resolved to deprecate his fury by an act of submission, and sent hostages to answer for his obedience. But the Dane, who had experienced the valour and enterprising spirit of this nobleman, and was, moreover, distrustful of his sincerity, had him put to death, and bestowed his large possessions on one Eric, a Danish chieftain, who afterwards, by his haughty and turbulent behaviour, obliged Canute to drive him into exile.

Edmund, thus deserted on all sides, had no other place of refuge but London, whither he repaired with all speed, in hopes of prevailing on his father to take more vigorous measures. He arrived in a most critical juncture; for Ethelred was then dangerously ill of a disorder of which he shortly after died on Monday, April 23, A. D. 1016, in the fiftieth year of his age and the thirty-seventh of his reign‡, just as the victorious Canute was preparing to besiege London by land and water.

* To this confinement, however, she afterwards owed her elevated fortune; for Edmund, the king's eldest son, chancing to pass by the place where she was confined, had the curiosity to visit a lady, of whose beauty he had heard a very favourable report, and became so enamoured of her, that he married her without his father's consent.

† We are told by some historians, that about this time Turkul, who was now on the side of the Danes, defeated the English at a place called Scoraftan, and that the governor of Norway, making an inroad into another part of the kingdom, carried off great booty, and both those leaders returning to their ships joined Canute.

‡ He was interred in St. Paul's cathedral, where in Speed's time his bones were still remaining in the north wall of the chancel, deposited in a chest of grey marble, supported with four pillars covered with a coped stone of the same, near which was the monument of Sebba, king of the East Saxons.

This prince's character is variously drawn, according to the different prejudices of those who have undertaken the portrait. Some ascribing the reports of his indolence, inactivity, and inglorious conduct, to the false representations of the monks, to whom he was assuredly no friend, have painted him in all the affecting lights of a betrayed and injured monarch, whose misfortunes were more owing to the treachery of his friends than a want of personal bravery in himself; and that his greatest fault was that of being unfortunate: while others again will not admit of these palliative arguments; but tell us roundly, that he was debauched in his principles, weak in his intellects, irresolute in his conduct, and dastardly in his disposition. It is difficult at this distance of time to reconcile these jarring accounts; but, upon a fair retrospect into his reign, the intelligent reader will find, that his vices and weaknesses were accompanied with some virtues and talents, that in less troublesome times might have proved a blessing and ornament to the nation he governed. The extreme fondness he shewed for the villain Eric, admits of no palliation; for had that traitor had a timely dismissal, the ruin of the nation would in all probability have been protracted, if not prevented. It is equally true, that the massacre of the Danes threw an indelible stain upon his reign; but a prince of a stronger head and firmer virtue might have been imposed upon by the specious reasonings of traitorous counsellors, coinciding with his own natural timidity. On the other hand, it is certain that Ethelred gave proofs that he had the good of his people at heart, by enacting several excellent and just laws, by which the property of the subject was secured from all oppressive or illegal innovations. The favours which he shewed to married priests, in opposition to the monkish clergy, are strong indications of the regard he had for religion, and demonstrate that his zeal was actuated by prudence, and directed by knowledge. Upon the whole then, we may candidly infer, that if Ethelred was not the best, he was far from being the worst king that has swayed the English sceptre.

In his person he was fair, comely, and genteel, of a polite address, affable in his behaviour, and open in his disposition. His issue, according to Speed, was as follows:

By his first wife Elgiva, the daughter of an English duke named Thored, he had Edmund, who succeeded him on the throne; Athelstan, who died an infant; Egbert, who also died young; Edwy, who survived his father and all his brethren, and lived in the reign of Canute I. who, being apprehensive of being disturbed by Edwy and others of the English blood-royal, practised to have him murdered, which was accordingly treacherously accomplished in the year 1017. He had also three daughters, the first called Edgitha, married to an English count, who was slain in a battle against the Danes; Edgiva, who fell to the lot of that arch-traitor, Eadric Streon, duke of Mercia, and Elfgina, who was wife to Uthred, count of Northumberland. By Emma of Normandy, his second wife, he had two sons, Alfred and Edward, whom their mother sent into her own country immediately after their father's death; and a daughter called Goda, who first married Walter, count of Maine, and afterwards Eustace, count of Boulogne.

EDMUND II. surnamed IRONSIDE, A.D. 1016.

THE many proofs of abilities and courage which Edmund had given in the life-time of his father, had so conciliated all minds in his favour, that notwithstanding the fierce Dane was thundering at the gates of their capital, the nobility and chief citizens, who remained at London, assembled together, and with one voice proclaimed him king; their loyalty to the blood of Cerdic getting the better, on this occasion, of their apprehensions of Canute's power; and he was soon after crowned by Livignus, archbishop of Canterbury. But the rest of the bishops and clergy following the current of the times, on being summoned by Canute to Southampton, declared for him, and solemnly renounced the race of Ethelred, but not till they had previously obliged the Dane to give them his oath to govern uprightly and justly in all matters, both secular and religious. Mean while Edmund, marching into Wessex, received the oath of allegiance from the inhabitants of that and several other provinces; so that he found himself still in a condition to dispute the possession of the crown with his rival.

Canute, however, well apprised of the vast importance that the possession of London was to Edmund's affairs, determined to leave nothing undone to get that capital into his hands. With this view he sailed up the river as high as Greenwich, where, debarking his troops, he marched to London, and laid siege to it. Some authors tell us, that in order to distress the inhabitants more effectually, he cut a deep trench on the southern side of the river, by which he drained off a great part of the water; so that his ships lay in a manner dry, almost opposite to the city, by which means he cut off all supply of provisions to the besieged town, by the east, west, and south. Nevertheless, the citizens made the most vigorous resistance, and thereby gave Edmund time to come with a numerous army out of Wessex, to the relief of the city, which, when Canute heard, he pressed the siege with unremitting ardour, but always with loss to himself, through the inflexible bravery and perseverance of those within. At length, despairing of success, and apprehensive of being hemmed in between Edmund's army and the town, he raised the siege, and marched to meet that prince, in hopes of drawing him to an engagement before his army should be increased by the succours that were daily joining him in his march. But Edmund continuing his rout, and both armies meeting at a place called Gillingham in Somersetshire, a battle was there fought, which proved extremely bloody, and in which each party gave proofs of their consummate military knowledge and prowess; but at length victory declaring on the side of the English, Canute drew off his forces, and retired to Winchester, where he shut himself up till his army was recruited. From thence he issued his orders to another body of his Danes to lay siege to Salisbury.

This last victory having greatly increased the number of Edmund's forces, he set out about Midsummer to the relief of Salisbury; but Canute, who was by this time reinforced, followed him, and offered battle. Edmund, no less desirous than the Dane of ending their dispute by a decisive action, waited for the enemy at a place called Scearstan*, where both armies soon met. Canute, at the head of his Danes, had under him the traitor Edric Streon, with Ælmer and Ælgar, two noblemen who had come over to his party, and commanded the men of Wilts and Hampshire. He was also joined by great numbers of people from other parts of the kingdom, whom either their affection to the Danish race, their reverence for the clergy, or their aversion for the memory of Ethelred, had induced to take part in the war against his son and successor. On the other side, Edmund was followed by the inhabitants of Dorsetshire, Cornwall, Devon, and Somersetshire. On this occasion † the opposite princes were well matched in courage, conduct, and experience, and both armies were nearly equal in strength, though the Danes had manifestly the advantage in point of discipline. Both kings chose their ground to the best advantage, each harangued his men in that strain which was most likely to animate to dominion and conquest, as the reward of toils and labour, or encourage to the preservation of liberty, their laws, their children, and their country. The trumpets giving the signal, each side made a short but awful pause, meditating on the part they were to act, and considering that on the issue of that day depended freedom or slavery, glory and ignominy, and that they were now to fall by the swords, or triumph in the deaths of their nearest relations or dearest friends. But the shock of battle soon banishing all reflections, a desperate fight ensued, in which rank closing with rank, disputed every inch of the bloody field with more than human rage. The gallant Edmund seemed present in a thousand places, and to stake a thousand lives on one cast. All his troops equally witnessed his valour, and equally trembled for his safety. Such, indeed, was the conduct and courage that he displayed on this occasion, that the fate of the day must soon have succeeded to his wish, had he not had Canute to encounter as an enemy; but the Dane's experience and the veteran boldness of his troops, enured to slaughter, and trained up in the art of death, for that time balanced the victory, and the ardour of both sides outlasting the day, the combatants unwillingly retired; and rather to meditate new revenge than for the purposes of repose.

Next day the fight was renewed with double fury, and Edmund's valorous efforts, seconded by the intrepid prowess of his gallant Englishmen, had already charmed victory over to their standard, when the traitor Edric bethought him of a stratagem which damped the ardour of those glorious assertors of their liberty, and for a while threw the advantage on the side of the Danes. He cut off the head of one Osmar, who nearly resembled Edmund, and raising it on the point of a spear, called aloud to the astonished English, "Yield! and save your lives! See here! the head of your king." This contrivance had for a while the desired effect; and the irresolute pause which this heart-wounding sight occasioned, gave the broken Danes an opportunity of rallying, and returning to the onset. But no sooner did this news reach Edmund's ears, than, throwing up his beaver, he flew like lightning to shew himself to his amazed troops, who instantly felt their former courage re-animated, and prepared to make their enemies pay dearly for the deceit they had put upon them: however, the advantage the Danes gained by this stratagem, enabled them to maintain the combat till darkness once more put an end to the fight.

Edmund, not a whit discouraged with the change of fortune thus obtained by deception, and well-knowing that but for such a device victory must have declared entirely in his favour, was preparing to renew the battle with the returning light; but Canute, convinced of the strength of the enemy, chose not to venture a third engagement, but took the opportunity of the night to march off secretly, and join the rest of his forces, who now formed the blockade of the city of London. Edmund, knowing that Canute was by this junction become much superior to any force he could at that time lead against him, returned back into Wessex, in order to recruit his army, which had been greatly weakened by the late bloody conflict.

While he was thus employed, Edric, the infamous Edric, whose repeated acts of treachery had, one would imagine, destroyed all possibility of putting any future confidence in him, now made use of a feigned submission, accompanied with the most artful insinuations of being able from his knowledge of the Danish counsels to obliterate by his future services, the remembrance of his past perfidy, and sued to be once more restored to favour, which petition Edmund too generously granted; and for which he has been accused of unpardonable weakness by most historians: however, he might perhaps have been induced to take this wrong step from his knowledge of the great interest of this bad man, and a desire of having him in his own power. Be that as it may, Edric was reinstated in the good graces of Edmund, who, having now recruited his army, set out to relieve his capital, which was closely pressed by the Danes. Upon his approach the enemy raised the siege, and part of them retired on board their ships, while another part advanced up the river to Brentford, where they encamped. Edmund, determined to give them no respite, followed close at their heels, crossed the river in their sight, and fell upon them with such fury, that they were unable to sustain the attack, and, throwing down their arms, betook themselves to flight. Great as was the loss of the Danes on this occasion, the inconsiderate ardour of the English cost a number of their gallant troops their lives, who were drowned in the river as they were furiously pursuing the flying foe.

Edmund therefore was again compelled to return into Wessex to fill up his ranks; and Canute, bent upon reducing London at all events, took advantage of his absence to renew the siege of that place; but with the same bad success as heretofore, for the citizens still repelled him with great loss. Finding at length that all hopes of carrying the city were vain, he again decamped, and going on board his fleet sailed round to the coast of Suffolk, which he ravaged for some time with all the fury that his former disappointments could inspire; and then betaking himself again to his ships, he directed his course to the mouth of the Medway, and landing the horse, scoured the whole county of Kent, till Edmund, apprised of these depredations, crossed the Thames with a strong body of troops, and arriving in Kent by hasty marches, he came up with the Danish horse at Ottenford, drove them back with great slaughter into the Isle of Sheepey, and had it now in his power to have totally ruined the barbarians, had he not with a strange infatuation listened to the advice of Edric, who, under the most specious pretences, persuaded him to put a stop to the pursuit of the flying enemy, who by that means had an opportunity given them to get safe to their ships, and pass over into Essex, where they recruited their forces.

Warwick.

† The account of this battle is taken from Simeon of Durham.

It was not long however before Edmund overtook them again at Ashdown*, where their several parties being united, the Danes had a strong force in the field, and a bloody engagement ensued between the rival armies, wherein the advantage inclined visibly to the side of the English: but the fortunes of Edmund were again wrecked upon that rock, which had so often proved fatal to his father and himself; for Edric, treacherously giving way with the wing under his command, struck such a terror into the rest of the army, that the Danes, attacking the other wing with all their force, made a terrible slaughter of the betrayed English. Some prelates†, the brave Ulfketel, earl of East Anglia, the eoldermen Ælfrith and Godwin, and several others of the flower of Edmund's nobility, were left dead on the field. The king himself was obliged to retire, almost without attendants, to Gloucester, in order to make new levies, in which he succeeded, even beyond his most sanguine hopes: so sure is it that a monarch who shews he sets no value upon his own life, when it is to be risked for the good of his subjects, may ever depend upon their sacrificing theirs in the defence of his person and dignity.

Canute, who, after the last important victory, looked upon himself as invincible, lost no time in following Edmund, in order to prevent him from retrieving his affairs; but that prince, who had an inexhaustible resource in the loyalty and affections of his people, especially the Londoners, was already at the head of an army, sufficiently strong to face his enemy in the field. Canute was far on his way towards the place of the king's retirement, when he heard how suddenly and amply he had recruited his forces; it was therefore too late to recede, and he determined to stake all on this last effort. The two armies came in sight, and both kings stood opposite to each other for some time, without giving the signal for the onset, when a captain of the English army (Hovenden will have it to be Edric) stepped forward, and in a set speech represented the equality of the two kings with respect to personal courage, the vast effusion of blood which their quarrel had already caused, and the carnage which was that day likely to ensue; shewed at the same time the little probability there was of determining the war by pitched battles; and concluded with proposing that the two princes should decide the fate of the day, and their own pretensions, by single combat; and that whoever had the victory should be acknowledged as sovereign by both parties. This proposal met with universal approbation, and in an instant the air was rent with the general cry of "Let them either fight or agree." Both kings, being thus informed of the sense of their people, cheerfully submitted to the wished-for decision, and retired together to the Isle of Alney‡, while their troops remained drawn up on either side of the river, impatiently waiting the event. The combatants having broken their spears, each drew forth his sword, and they fought for some time with equal skill and valour: at length Canute, finding that he began to lose breath, and that Edmund had greatly the advantage of him in bodily strength, and the activity of youth, proposed a partition of the kingdom, which he enforced with many fair arguments of mutual and general benefit. The generous Edmund readily accepted the proffer, and the two princes embraced each other in the most cordial manner, while both armies sent up a shout of undissembled joy at so unexpected and so desirable a sight. Then Canute and Edmund made a mutual interchange of their cloaths and armour, in token of friendship; and the treaty was formally concluded in the presence of the nobles and principal men of both nations, the terms of which were, that Edmund should retain the city of London, all Wessex, East Anglia, and Essex, with all the country southward of the Thames, together with the title of king of England; and that the residue, containing all the northern parts, where the Danes had been formerly settled, was to be the portion of Canute ||.

Peace being thus made between the two contending chiefs, the Danes entered into a treaty with the Londoners, for leave to take up their winter-quarters in that city, on paying a certain sum. But the faithless Edric, who placed his only hopes of riches and honour in the destruction of his country, beheld this union of the two potentates with an evil eye, justly apprehending that Edmund, being now delivered from so troublesome a war, would have leisure to bring him to condign punishment for his manifold villainies and treasons. He therefore, with a diabolical prudence, resolved to prevent the ruin he foresaw; and having by great bribes prevailed on two ruffians to act whatever he should think proper to dictate to them, they, by his orders, took an opportunity to assassinate king Edmund, when alone in private, who thus fell a victim to the base artifices of the most

‡ An island in the river Severn, near Dearhurst; but some writers will have the theatre of this action to have been in an island of that name near Gloucester, between Overbridge and Malsmore.

|| The Saxon annals, the author of the Encomium Emmae, Florence of Worcester, and the MSS authors in the Cottonian library, agree, that a peace was made without an engagement between the two armies, but deny the duel between the two kings. William of Malmesbury confirms the challenge from Edmund to Canute; but adds, "that the latter refused it on account of the superior strength of Ironside, and therefore proposed the partition already mentioned, as the most equitable way of terminating the difference between them, which proposal being accepted by Edmund with some reluctance, a peace was immediately concluded, and the Danes suffered to retire on board their ships with all their plunder."

The Saxon annals tell us furthermore, that by this treaty the English were to reimburse to the Danes the expences of their naval armament.

abandoned of all miscreants, when he had not sat above a year on the throne*, which short space of time he had filled in such a manner as demonstrated him a person of strict justice, great benevolence, sublime generosity, intrepid courage, and invincible patience. In a word, he seemed to have been formed by nature to extend the glory of his kingdom, and the happiness of his people, though he did but just shew him to England, that it might the more bitterly lament his loss, without being profited by his virtues. With these amiable qualifications of the mind he possessed the gift of bodily strength to so great a degree, as from thence to have acquired the name of Ironside.

The execrable Edric was the first who carried the news of Edmund's death to Canute, sure of being bountifully rewarded for so agreeable a piece of advice; but the Dane, though in his heart he detested the traitor, dissembled his sentiments for that time, as he thought he might have further occasion for him, and contented himself with returning him this equivocal answer: "Well, for so good a turn, I will exalt thee above all the lords in England:" which he literally fulfilled in his execution, as will appear in the next reign.

With Edmund fell the glory of the Anglo-Saxons, and by his death the Danish race prevailed, and the Saxon monarchy became in a manner extinct, after it had lasted one hundred and ninety years from the first establishment by Egbert, four hundred and thirty-two from the first founding of the heptarchy, and five hundred and sixty-eight from the arrival of the Saxons under Hengist.

The remains of Edmund were deposited by those of his grand-father Edgar, at Glastonbury. By his wife Elgitha, the fair widow of earl Sigefert, who had been basely murdered by the contrivance of Edric, duke of Mercia, as we have shewn in the history of the preceding reign, he left two sons, Edmund and Edward, and a natural son of the name of Edwy, who was afterwards put to death by Canute's orders.

CANUTE the GREAT, A.D. 1017.

The first Danish king of England †.

IMmediately on receiving the news of Edmund's death, Canute convened a general assembly of the states of the nation at London, in order to secure the succession of the whole kingdom; when he made a speech to the assembly, the purport of which was, to desire to know of the nobles who had been witnesses to the treaty he had made with the deceased king, whether any articles had been agreed to in behalf of the king's brothers, who were then in Normandy? To which they answered in the negative. Secondly, whether any stipulation was made by the said treaty in favour of Edmund's children? Here the assembly were mute for a while, not knowing what answer to make to a question so evident in its tendency, and put by a person who had a powerful army at his command, in the very heart of the kingdom, which only waited his nod to be let loose upon all such who should seem refractory to his purpose. After some pause, they replied with a true time-serving finesse, "That if any such stipulation had been made, they were sensible that Edmund designed that Canute should be their guardian till they came of age." Canute, not contented with this mean evasion, and sensible of his superior power, compelled them to swear allegiance to him, and abjure the Cerdic race, being determined not to reign in right of another. He then assumed the crown, and divided the kingdom into four parts or governments, namely, Mercia, Northumberland, East Anglia, and Wessex. The first he gave to Edric Streon, the second to Eric, the third to Turkyl, and the fourth he reserved to himself.

As he was fully sensible that the people in general were strongly attached to the blood of Cerdic, his first aim was to ingratiate himself with his own subjects by every art of popularity, and to take the first opportunity of removing those who were the most likely and capable to disturb his government. With that view he publicly declared that he would make no difference betwixt Danes and English in his favour, or in the administration, and then published an edict, importing, that the old laws should be observed in every province, as in the times of the Saxons, save only those of the North, which were almost wholly peopled with Danes, who had been long governed by the laws of their original country. This semblance of justice and impartiality had the intended effect upon the minds of the undiscerning multitude, who were loud in their praises of a prince who manifested such an equitable disposition, and who seemed to have nothing in view but the welfare of his subjects.

Canute, having thus succeeded in the first part of his scheme, resolved to complete it in its full extent, by removing those bars to his ambition, Edward and Edmund, the sons of the late king. And here he was somewhat puzzled how to effect his design in such a manner as not to shake his authority in its infancy by a rash or impolitic step: he therefore resolved to send them abroad. Our historians tell us, that they were first sent to the king of the Swedes, with an intimation "that he would confer a great obligation on the English monarch, if he would deal with them in such manner as that they might not again return to their native country." This prince, though abhorrent of so inhuman a design, was yet fearful of disobliging so powerful a sovereign as Canute, whose patrimonial dominions lay so near to his own; and therefore, without giving them an asylum in his territories, sent them to Solomon, king of Hungary, who received them with all kindness, and even gave them an education suitable to their birth.

Edmund died in this court; but his brother Edward married Agatha, the queen of Hungary's sister, and daughter of Henry II. emperor of Germany, by whom he had Edgar Atheling, and Margaret, afterwards queen of Scotland.

* The death of Edmund is, by the Saxon Chronicle, placed in 1016; but various are the conjectures concerning the manner. Malmesbury and Brompton relate that two villains stabbed him with a sharp piece of iron in the fundament, as he was easing nature; others say, that he was stabbed by Edric's son, by his father's order, in the hinder parts, with a long sharp knife, which was left sticking in the wound.

† Some authors have been fond of ranking Swein, the father of this prince, as a king of England; but, besides his never having been crowned, it does not appear, from any authorities extant, that he ever exercised any act of civil authority; and therefore I have considered Canute as the first prince of the Danish race who swayed the English sceptre.

Edwy, however, the natural son of the late king, still remained in England, and the popularity of this young prince occasioned Canute no small uneasiness; he therefore consulted with Edric how he might best rid himself of this bane to his honour and repose. That traitor, ever ready to assist in any deeds of villainy and baseness, undertook to make away with the unfortunate prince by the means of one of his instruments named Ethelwald; but this man, not proving so hackneyed in the ways of wickedness as his employer, postponed the execution of his orders: so that Canute was obliged to have recourse to a sham plot, in order for a plausible excuse to banish Edwy from the kingdom, who, after wandering some time in exile, returned to England, where he died in an obscure part of the island.

But there still remained one more obstacle to Canute's repose, which it was not in his power to remove by any other means than policy. Alfred and Edward, the two sons of Ethelred, by Emma, were now grown up to men's estate, and resided with their uncle Richard II. duke of Normandy, and might one day, through the assistance of that prince, assert their title to the throne. In order to avert that danger, he artfully endeavoured to make an ally of Richard, by demanding in marriage his sister Emma, mother of the young princes, and offering his own sister Hestritha to the Norman. It was indifferent to Richard whether his nephews by Canute or Ethelred sat on the English throne; and, being in hopes that he might find a more useful ally in the former than he had ever experienced in the latter, without regard to the rules of justice or decorum, accepted the proposal, and easily prevailed with his sister Emma to give her consent also. Accordingly the double nuptials were celebrated with great splendor in the latter end of July, A. D. 1017; but to the unspeakable grief of the two young princes; who could never forgive their mother for espousing the sworn enemy of her first husband, and sacrificing their right by signing a marriage-contract which settled the succession of the crown on the children by that marriage.

Thus far every thing succeeded to the wish of the usurper; but he was a man of too much sagacity to think his dominion firmly established while such a wretch as Edric continued possessed of so great an influence in the kingdom as he then had. Canute wisely considered that he who had been false to his natural and lawful sovereign, would never be true to a foreigner who had seized the crown by force; he therefore resolved to take the first opportunity of sacrificing him to his security: nor was it long before the traitor furnished one against himself; for, having the impudence to upbraid Canute, in the public council-chamber, with the services he had done him, and which he pretended had not been sufficiently requited, the king, in a violent fury, commanded him to be instantly put to death, and his head fixed on the highest gate of the city, that the promise he made him on bringing him the news of Edmund's death might be literally fulfilled: he likewise ordered his three sons to be put to death at the same time; and, in order that nothing might be wanting to secure his authority, as also effectually to crush the power of the English nobility, from whom he apprehended an insurrection, Canute followed this stroke by the execution of Norman, son of duke Leofwine; Ethelward, son of duke Ædhelmer; Brightric, son of Alphage, earl of Devon; and others of Edric's most considerable friends and adherents: but, as he had a great affection and esteem for Norman's brother, Leofric, he spared him, and even bestowed on him his brother's government.

Being now free from controul, and having filled all the vacant offices with creatures of his own, A. D. 1018, he laid a tax of eighty-two thousand pounds* upon the kingdom, to pay off the arrears of his Danish fleet, the greatest part of which he sent back to their own country, all but forty ships, which were thought necessary for the defence of the kingdom. This tax, grievous as it was, the English patiently submitted to, as it was the means of freeing them from such disagreeable guests. This ready compliance had so good an effect on the king, that he determined henceforth to use every possible means of conciliating the affections of his new subjects, and attaching them to his interests. The more readily to secure this desirable purpose of popularity, he convened an assembly of the states of the nation at Oxford, in which he re-established the laws of the Saxon monarchs, particularly those of Edgar, and Edward the Elder; and at the same time an act was passed, by which the Danes and English were incorporated as one people. This politic step at once proved extremely pleasing to the English, who were no longer thrown to that submissive distance from their conqueror, to which they had hitherto been accustomed to submit; and also contributed not a little to strengthen his government, by putting it in his power to place his own countrymen in most of the posts of dignity and profit in the kingdom, by which he secured a certain majority in his favour, in case the English should at any time hereafter be tempted to raise commotions for the restoration of the lawful heirs to the crown, or in opposition to such measures as he might think proper to pursue.

Having thus settled the English affairs on such a footing as to have nothing to apprehend from a change of disposition in the people, he thought he might now safely attend to those which immediately related to his own country, now much distressed by a war that had lately broken out between the Danes and Vandals†. Accordingly, in the year 1019, he raised a considerable body of forces, one half of them, at least, English, in whom he thought he might now confide, and transported them over into Denmark, under the command of earl Godwin, with whom he prudently associated such others of the English nobles whom he thought most likely to prove troublesome in his absence. Every thing being now ready for the expedition, he embarked himself on board the fleet, and, after a favourable passage, landed in Denmark, when, after making a short halt to refresh his men after

* The city of London at that time paid for its single share of this tax, no less than five thousand five hundred pounds, (being one seventh of the whole) a convincing proof of the great wealth and credit of this capital, even in those early

† Polydore Virgil tells us, that these Vandals were the Norwegians, who, under the command of their king Olaf, had invaded Denmark.

the unavoidable fatigues that attend a sea-passage, he marched directly to meet the enemy, with whom he came up after several forced marches. When he first came in sight of them, the day was on the decline; so that he judged it most prudent to let his soldiers rest till the next morning 'ere he led them to the attack.

Earl Godwin, who earnestly desired an opportunity of signalizing himself, took advantage of the darkness of the night, and having selected a trusty body of his English, marched off with them privately, and, coming upon the foe by surprize, beat up their camp, and put them to a general rout: so that at break of day Canute was agreeably surprized by meeting with a victory before he knew of a battle. This brave action so endeared the English, and their gallant leader Godwin, to Canute, that he ever afterwards shewed them the most signal marks of distinction. The earl, in particular, he rewarded, by giving him his own sister Thyrsa in marriage; and, on his account, laid aside a design which he had formed of abolishing for ever the title and office of duke, which he had looked upon as too near approaching to royalty to be continued with safety.

The war in Denmark being thus happily terminated, Canute returned to England, A.D. 1020, and immediately on his return gave the English a remarkable proof of his regard to their nation; for finding that the great personages among whom he had divided the kingdom, had been guilty of several oppressive practices on the people during his absence, he summoned a mycel gemot, or great council, at Cirencester in Gloucestershire, wherein Ethelward, duke of East Anglia, was banished and outlawed; and Eric, duke of Northumberland, was ordered to quit the kingdom. This act of justice and impartiality won him all hearts; and he still further confirmed the empire he had gained, by pursuing every measure that he thought most conducive to the ease and happiness of his English subjects, and to efface from their minds the remembrance of the past barbarities of his countrymen.

To this ingratiating conduct he added another procedure, which, from the disposition of the times, he knew could not fail of rivetting him in the affections of the people. He feigned a sincere contrition for the great quantity of blood which had been shed through his means in the course of his attempts upon the English crown, and in particular for the death of Edmund, of whom on all occasions he affected to speak as of a person for whom he had the highest regard and veneration. From those well acted principles of remorse, he built and endowed a church at Ashdown, where he had fought a great battle with Edmund; and also at other places, where any slaughter had been made of the English, founded chantries to pray for their souls, built several monasteries, and one in particular at Bury in Suffolk, in honour of St. Edmund, whom he knew to be particularly revered by the English.

The next year, A.D. 1021, he held a parliament, (for so we may now call the assembly of the states which were convened by order of the sovereign, and composed of the nobles and other principal men of the kingdom), in which he banished Turkyl, who had been concerned in the murder of archbishop Alphege; by which seeming act of justice he greatly pleased the English, who held the deceased prelate in high esteem.

The following spring, A.D. 1022, Canute went on board his fleet, and made a voyage to the Isle of Wight; but as this expedition seems not to have been attended with any consequences worthy the commemoration of history, it is most probable that he undertook this cruise only with an intent to keep his sailors in exercise against occasion might offer of using them in affairs of importance.

Canute now began to enjoy, unmolested, the sweets of peace, while he exerted all his endeavours to make justice flourish, and to render his subjects happy. But this tranquility was but of a few years continuance; for, in 1025, he found himself under the necessity of making a second voyage to Denmark, on account of an invasion of the Swedes, who, seeing him so fully occupied in his new acquired kingdom, thought this a favourable opportunity of wresting from him his paternal dominions, and annexing them to the Swedish crown. The army which Canute took over with him, in order to repel the invaders, was composed of English and Danes. Soon after their landing, they were encountered by Wulf and Higlaflf, two Swedish generals, who defeated them with great slaughter, and compelled Canute to return the same year to England.

The years 1026 and 1027 seem to have passed without any military transactions; but A.D. 1028, Canute entered upon another war, which made him ample amends for the rude treatment he had met with in his late expedition. Understanding that Olaf, who then sat on the throne of Norway, was a religious and pacific prince, and on that account had fallen into contempt among his subjects, who thought it an intolerable grievance to be restrained from the piracies to which they had been accustomed; Canute resolved to embrace this favourable opportunity of setting up a claim to the crown of Norway; and, with this view, found means of privately forming a party among the principal nobles of that kingdom. This design succeeding to his wish, and having advice that every thing was ripe for a revolt on the side of the malcontents, on the first appearance of a powerful force to support their insurrection, he set sail for Denmark with a considerable body of English troops, and from thence made a sudden inroad into Norway. Olaf, surprized by this unexpected invasion, and finding that there was no dependance to be placed on his subjects, who basely deserted him, and repaired in crowds to the enemy's camp, consulted his own safety, by flight, and retired into Sweden, and from thence took refuge in Russia. Upon his retreat, Canute seized upon the crown of Norway; and, having received or extorted the allegiance of the Norwegians, he returned to England. Two years afterwards the exiled Olaf, making an attempt to recover his dominions, was perfidiously slain by his own subjects: so that Canute now remained in possession of the kingdom of Norway, without any competitor.

Thus crowned with success, and honoured with the title of king of England, Denmark, and Norway, he might have expected to have ended his days in peace and glory: but no sooner was he returned from his expedition into Norway, than he found a dangerous conspiracy on the point of breaking out against his person and government, by the machinations of one Hacum, a Danish earl, who who had married his niece Gunilda, without his consent; but the plot being timely discovered, Hacum was banished, and others of the conspirators put to death, which effectually put a stop to any apprehensions from that quarter, A. D. 1029.

But no sooner was this storm blown over, than Canute found himself menaced with another infinitely more dangerous, and that threatened nothing less than the loss of the kingdom of England.

The dukedom of Normandy had devolved to Robert, the son of Richard II. A. D. 1030. This prince taking into commiseration the misfortunes and wrongs of his cousins Alfred and Edward, the sons of Ethelred, who still resided in that country, he sent ambassadors to Canute to demand, in a peremptory manner, the inheritance of those princes, which he unjustly withheld from them. The haughty Canute was ill-formed to brook a message couched in such lordly terms, and dismissed the envoys without any satisfactory answer; upon which Robert prepared to support his demands, in behalf of the exiled princes, by a powerful invasion of England, and actually put to sea with that view; but meeting with a violent storm, he was obliged to put into Guernsey, and the weather still continuing very tempestuous, and his ships being in a crazy condition, he was, fore against his will, compelled to return to France, and the enterprize miscarried. Nevertheless, not discouraged by this bad success, he sent a part of his fleet, which was best able to bear the sea, in order to scour the English coasts, and block up their harbours, while he himself was employed in levying a numerous army, both of horse and foot, which he proposed to transport in other vessels, and, having landed his forces, to attack Canute in the very heart of his dominions.

And now, for the first time, the lofty Dane found it necessary to temporise. He knew that his title was founded only in blood, and that however peaceable the English might live under his rule, which he endeavoured to make as light to them as possible; yet they were in their hearts strongly biased in favour of the blood of Cerdic, and waited only for a seasonable opportunity to manifest their latent affections, and bring about a revolution in favour of the descendants of their antient kings. Upon maturely weighing these considerations, he thought it more eligible to have recourse to the means of negotiations, than to stake all upon the hazard of a battle, in which he might be deserted by the greater part of his subjects. He therefore set on foot a treaty with the court of Normandy, by which he made an offer of resigning half his kingdom to the young princes; but he found means to throw such artful delays into the course of the negotiation, that Robert was obliged to set out for Jerusalem upon a pilgrimage, to which he had bound himself in a fit of devotion, and to postpone his intended expedition till his return; and leaving his son William, then an infant of seven years of age, afterwards the conqueror of England, in the hands of guardians, and himself dying upon his journey, Canute was thereby delivered of his fears from that quarter.

The year 1031 is noted only for the excessive liberalities of Canute to the church; and, in order to establish in the minds of the people a stronger opinion of his zeal and piety, he resolved upon a pilgrimage to Rome to obtain a full pardon for all his sins. In his journey he purchased of several princes, through whose territories he passed, an exemption from toll for all English merchants and pilgrims; and obtained from the pope (John XIX.) several privileges for the English school at Rome, with a promise of redress in the point of those excessive sums which were exacted from the metropolitans of England on their receiving the pall, and which had been complained of as an intolerable grievance. On his return home by the way of Denmark, he sent Livignus, abbot of Tavistock, the companion of his travels, with a letter to the English nobility, which letter, as it contains the sentiments of an English king, though somewhat debased by the fopperies of superstition, which was the reigning foible of those times, and, for its subject matter, merits to be written in letters of gold; I have therefore subjoined a translation of the whole, except the uninteresting parts, presuming that the generality of our readers will be agreeably entertained with the perusal of so curious a piece.

"Canute, king of all England, Denmark, and Norway, with part of Sweden, wisheth health to Ælnoth the metropolitan, and Alfrick of York; and to all bishops, primates, and to all the English nation, both nobles and commoners. Know ye that I lately undertook a journey to Rome, to pray for the remission of my sins; for the welfare of my kingdom, and that of the people subject to my government. This is a journey I had long vowed to make; but I still, till lately, was prevented by the exigencies of my kingdom and other causes. Now I humbly thank Almighty God, who has, in this life, granted me, according to my desire, leave, personally to venerate and adore the holy apostles, Peter and Paul, with whatever is holy or sacred, either within or without the walls of Rome. This I was the more inclined to effect, because I had learned, from wise men, that St. Peter had received from the Lord great power of loosing and tying, and that he was the key-keeper of heaven; therefore I thought it extremely convenient particularly to bespeak his patronage with God. Now be it known to you, that there was present with pope John and the emperor Conrade, a

* Among other benefactions he gave the port of Sandwich, with all its issues and profits, to Christ's church in Canterbury. He likewise founded a monastery of Benedictines in Norfolk, which from its situation was called St. Bennet's in Holme (Holme, in the Saxon language, signifying a rising hill or gentle ascent). Leland, who saw this town and monastery, gives us a description of it, which claims our notice. "The city, for its situation, exceeds any that the sun ever saw; it seems, as it were, to hang upon a gentle descent, and is washed on the east side with a little river. Its monastery is not less noble, whether we consider it with respect to its endowment, its extent, or its unparalleled magnificence. One might even take the monastery itself for a city, it has so many gates, some of which are brass, is adorned with so many towers, and has likewise a church, which cannot be exceeded in grandeur, or magnificence. To this we may add three more churches, which are contiguous, and are as it were appendages to this, which are likewise admirable for their beauty and architecture." Canute enriched the monastery, with very considerable presents, brought in the monks with their abbot, granted it the whole town, as well as other estates for its maintenance, and offered his crown to the martyr. The pope gave it large immunities, exempting it from the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese. Besides the offerings that were brought to Edmund's tomb, its revenues amounted to one thousand five hundred and sixty pounds yearly." Gibson's CAMDEN.

great assembly of nobles at the festival of Easter, who all of them received me with great honour, and made me particular presents. The emperor, especially, made me a great many presents of gold and silver plate, as well as of robes and apparel. I then conferred with the emperor, and my lord the pope, and the other princes, who were present, with regard to the hardships of my people, both English and Danes; demanding that they might be upon more easy terms; that they might be more secure in their persons when upon their journey to Rome, not meeting with so many obstacles, and being plagued with paying so many tolls upon the road. This was granted by the emperor and king Rodolph, and by all the other princes, who issued out orders that all my subjects, both merchants, and they who went to Rome on religious accounts, should be free from all molestations of tolls and impositions, both in their going and returning. I then complained before my lord the pope, and informed him, that I could not but take it very much amiss that my archbishops should be so much harassed, and pay so great sums of money, whenever they went to demand their palls at Rome. Upon which the pope made a decree, that the like should not be done in time to come. Every thing which I demanded for the advantage of my people from the pope, the emperor, king Rodolph, and the other princes, through whose territories I passed, was most cheerfully granted, and confirmed even under the sanction of an oath, in the presence and under the testimony of four archbishops, twenty bishops, and a great many of the temporal nobility. I resolved, therefore, to pay my thanks to God, having thus succeeded in every thing I purposed. Now be it therefore known to you all, that I purpose to devote myself, in every respect, to God; to reform my life; to govern with justice and piety the people committed to my care; to distribute impartial justice; and if any part of my past conduct hath been inconsistent with the rules of justice, through the folly or inadvertency of youth, to amend the same, through the assistance of God. I therefore adjure and command all my counsellors, to whom I have entrusted the management of public affairs, upon no manner of account, either from the dread of my power or their affections for any one in power, be who he will, that they consent to any injustice, nor suffer my people to be harassed. I likewise command all my deputies, and the governors of my people, as they value my friendship, or their own welfare, that they do injustice to no man, either rich or poor; but that every one, whether noble or ignoble, whether wealthy or needy, have free access to impartial justice, from which they are neither to deviate through royal favour, through their partiality for the powerful, nor for the sake of amassing money for me, nor for any other motive whatsoever; because there can be no manner of necessity for exacting money for me by unjust means.

“ Therefore I am willing you should know, that returning the same way I went, I am now upon my road to Denmark, with the view of reconciling all differences between that nation and those who, if it had been in their power, would have deprived me both of my life and kingdom. But this they could not effect, because God confounded their devices by his grace, which preserved our royalty and honour, and brought to nothing all the forces of our enemies. Therefore, having settled peace with all our neighbours, and after ordering and composing our government in the East, so that we may have nothing to dread from war, or the enmity of our foes, I design to come to England as soon as I can have a convenient convoy of shipping this summer.

“ Now we have sent this letter before, that all our people may rejoice at our welfare; for you yourselves are sensible that I never spared either my person or my pains, and that I never will spare them to promote the necessary felicity of my subjects.

“ He then concludes with strict injunctions, that, before his return, all the dues to the church shall be paid, of whatsoever kind; threatening, that if any are unpaid, he will, when he returns to England, severely, and without favour to any one, punish the offenders.”

William of Malmesbury, in whom this letter is extant, adds, that Canute's conduct, after his arrival in England, perfectly corresponded with the professions in his letter; for he gave orders that all the Saxon laws should be inviolably observed, forbade markets, fairs, and all secular assemblies on Sunday, and enjoined all Christians to come thrice a year to receive the eucharist.

By these methods he gained the hearts of the English; and, being secure at home, had leisure to carry his arms into other parts, as his interest or his honour seemed to demand. Accordingly we find him soon after his return, namely, A. D. 1033, undertaking a military expedition against the Scots, on the following occasion.

Duncan, grandson to Malcolm II. king of Scotland, and heir-apparent to that kingdom, held the county of Cumberland in fief of the English crown. Canute had repeatedly summoned him to come and do him homage for those territories, which Duncan had as often refused, alledging that Canute had no right to make such a demand upon him, inasmuch as his homage was due only to the English born kings of England. This answer was highly resented by Canute, who, soon after his return from his pilgrimage to Rome, set out with a powerful army to chastise the Scottish prince, and reduce Cumberland to his obedience. Malcolm, siding with his grandson, brought his forces into the field, and prepared to give the English battle; and a bloody engagement was on the point of beginning, when the prelates and nobles of both armies interposed in order to prevent the effusion of blood; and an accommodation was brought about between the two kings, when it was agreed that Duncan, and the heirs of the future kings of Scotland, for the time being, should hold Cumberland, according to the original tenure, and do homage to Canute and his successors, kings of England, for that fief.

Thus ended this quarrel, which, in its beginning, threatened great desolation and bloodshed to both kingdoms; and Canute, having now nothing to disturb his tranquility, from this time laid aside all thoughts of warlike affairs, and gave himself up entirely to acts of devotion. From this time also he took the surname of Great, on account of the many noble conquests he had obtained: but this title seems to have been less due to his military achievements and successes, than to the many virtues he manifested during the pacific parts of his administration.

administration. Never did king deserve so contradictory a character as this, the end of whose life was altogether different from the beginning; and we can hardly discover in him the same person who, to gain a crown to which he had no title, had trampled under foot every law, divine and human, and who had poured forth oceans of blood in libations to his ambition; when we behold him the latter part of his reign living an example of humility, modesty, justice, and true piety, rendering himself beloved by his subjects, and universally esteemed by foreigners. In a word, we cannot consider the reign of this king, without concluding, with Tyrrel, that it had been happy for this kingdom, if Canute had never ascended its throne, or had sat on it much longer*; for he had not held the English sceptre full nineteen years, when he resigned his breath at Shaftesbury in Dorsetshire, on the twelfth of November, 1035, and was buried in the old monastery at Winchester.

He left two sons by his first wife Elfwina, daughter of Ælfhelm, earl of Northampton, who were named Swein and Harold. And by Emma, his second wife (the widow of Ethelred) he had a son named Hardi Canute, or, as he is commonly called, Hardicnute, and a daughter named Gunhilda. Swein was placed by his father on the throne of Norway, which he had conquered in the manner already related in this history. Harold succeeded him as king of England; and Hardicnute ascended the throne of Denmark. His daughter Gunhilda was married to the emperor Henry III. †

HAROLD I. surnamed HAREFOOT ‡, A. D. 1036.

The second Danish king of England.

CANUTE, the year preceding his death, had given the crown of Denmark to his son Hardicnute, and had placed his son Swein on the throne of Norway; but as the succession to the English sceptre was not left undetermined, the kingdom, upon the death of the late possessor, was divided into three factions; one of which espoused the cause of Harold, and consisted of the Danes and Londoners, whose interests, long intercourse, and vicinity of situation, had knit them, as it were, into one body. Another party sided with Hardicnute; these were chiefly the West Saxons, who were influenced by their regard to the rights of primogeniture, and that privilege which they thought their due of being treated upon the same footing with a people, whose sovereignty was to depend upon the laws of regular succession, unrestrained by a servile fear of, or more servile dependance on, the last will or commands of any monarch. The last faction was that of the house of Cerdic, who, standing in the light of an abjured and proscribed party, did not dare to avow their wishes or their designs in a public manner. With these joined the queen-dowager Emma, who, after having satisfied the dictates of ambition, in being twice queen of England, listened now to those of nature and justice, and seemed to long to restore to her children, by Ethelred, those rights which her vanity had urged her to sign away from them by her marriage-contract with Canute, already recited. Several nobles, as distinguished for their military and civil talents as for their illustrious birth, were equally desirous of throwing off a foreign yoke, and once more hailing the lawful successors to the sword-contested throne of their ancestors. But the great spring of all political movements rested in the famous earl Godwin, or Goodwin, a man who had all the vices of Catiline, without his immorality and imprudence; all the ambition of Cæsar, without those virtues which made it praiseworthy; and all the dissimulation of Tiberius, without that winning address which made it pass current with even the discerning part of mankind. He stood foremost in the rank of Canute's favourites, on account of the eminent service he had rendered him in his Norway expedition; and that prince had, at his decease, left him executor to his personal fortune, which he had bequeathed to his wife Emma.

The contest for the succession was carried on with so much animosity by the two prevailing parties, that the nation saw itself on the verge of a civil war, insomuch that the English, smarting with the past experience of calamities from disputed succession, were alarmed to that degree, that, according to Ingulphus, who lived in those days, the most cautious among them retired with their effects to fenny and inaccessible places, till the dispute should be finally decided, which, at length, was

* An instance of his behaviour in private life has been handed down to us by Huntingdon and Florilegus, and at once shews him to have possessed a large fund of good sense, and a strong abhorrence of flattery. One day as he was taking his recreation on the sea shore, at Southampton, accompanied by a train of courtiers, who were incensing him with the most fulsome flattery, placing him on a level with the greatest heroes of antiquity, and extolling his power as something more than human, he ordered a chair to be brought and placed on the beach while the tide was coming in, and sitting down, he, with a majestic air, thus addressed himself to the sea. "Thou sea art a part of my dominions, and the land whereon I sit is also mine. I charge thee not to presume to approach any farther, nor dare to wet the feet of me who am thy sovereign." But the sea, as Huntingdon expresses it, came rolling on as before, and, regardless of his admonition, not only wetted the skirts of his robes, but also dashed his thighs. Upon which, rising up suddenly, and turning about with a disdainful look to his followers, he bid them learn from the example before their eyes, that the title of Lord and Master belonged only to him whose voice the land and sea obey: and taking off his crown, which he would never after wear, he ordered it to be placed on the head of the great crucifix at Winchester.

† Being a lady of remarkable beauty, her husband grew jealous of her, and she being accused of adultery, a duel ensued, which was the usual method of trial in these ages. The accuser being a person of gigantic size, and extraordinary strength, no person was bold enough to undertake the vindication of Gunhilda's innocence; till her page, who was but a stripling, in comparison of his antagonist, appeared in the list, and offered to engage her accuser. In the combat the youth having the good fortune to cut the sinews of his antagonist's legs with one blow, followed his advantage with so much vigour, that he felled him to the ground with another, and then cut his head off, which he presented to his lady. After Gunhilda's honour had thus been vindicated by the valour of her English page, she thought it a proper time to show her resentment for the affront her husband had passed upon her by his credulity, and having renounced his bed, notwithstanding his entreaties to the contrary, turned nun at Bruges in Flanders. After her death, she was buried in the collegiate church of Donation, and her monument, in Speed's time, was then to be seen near the north door of that sacred edifice.

‡ Because, saith Knighton, his foot was all over hairy; or, as others affirm, because he was remarkably light and swift of foot. Brompton says he had this surname from refusing to ride on horseback, and chusing always to walk on foot, which, says he, was unbecoming his royal state.

done in an amicable manner; for a general assembly being convened at Oxford, it was there agreed to make a partition of the kingdom, between Harold and Hardicnute, by which the former was to have the countries northwards of the Thames; and the rest of England was allotted to the latter. Queen Emma was to keep her court at Winchester, to be regent of all Wessex, and Godwin was to act under her as governor or lord-lieutenant of that province.

Notwithstanding this agreement, which amounted to an election, as king, in favour of Harold, Ælnoth, archbishop of Canterbury, who was in the number of those who favoured the pretensions of Hardicnute*, continued firm to the cause he had espoused, and refused to deliver the royal robes to Harold, or to perform the ceremony of his coronation, which Harold so much resented, that he ever after took all opportunities of vexing and persecuting the whole body of the clergy. Be that as it may, he was no sooner fixed on the throne than he sent and seized all his father's treasure which had been deposited at Winchester, and which, of right, belonged to his step-mother Emma.

With this money he found means to win over earl Godwin to his interest, adding, at the same time, the powerful incentive of ambition, by promising him to marry his daughter, and declare her issue heirs to the crown of England: baits too tempting to be withstood by a man of Godwin's principles. This nobleman accordingly dropt, on a sudden, all his zeal for Hardicnute's interests, and espoused that of his brother and rival Harold; and, taking advantage of the absence of the former, who was then settling his affairs in Denmark, he persuaded the West Saxons that he did not think the sovereignty of their kingdom worth his attention; and, by these and other artful measures, got them to join in declaring Harold king of the whole island.

† Emma, finding herself deprived, by this sudden revolution, of her regency, and her favourite son Hardicnute of the crown of Wessex, soon perceived that all hopes of holding a share in the government were entirely at an end as to him, and therefore she turned her thoughts towards the bringing in one of her sons, by Ethelred, and placing him on the throne, not doubting but she should be powerfully assisted in this design by the English, who secretly wished to see, at their head, a prince of the race of their antient kings; but, knowing earl Godwin's great power and influence, and how much he favoured the cause of Harold, she resolved to have recourse to cunning and dissimulation. With this view she pretended not to be in the least concerned at the displacing of Hardicnute, and applied herself wholly to works of piety and devotion; but here she had to deal with a person, in Godwin, who was not so easily to be deceived. That sagacious and refined politician, who had experienced the greatness of her talents, was suspicious of this feigned indifference in a matter which he was sensible from his knowledge of her ambitious temper and her love she bore to her son Hardicnute, could not have failed of deeply affecting her: he therefore imparted his doubts to the king, insinuating, at the same time, that the crown was not safe on his head, so long as the children of Emma were living to dispute it with him.

Harold readily assented to the truth of this observation. It was agreed between them that something must be done to destroy those interests which stood in competition with their own; and nothing so probable occurred, as getting the two exiled princes into their power. Godwin took upon himself the execution of this design; and accordingly he forged a letter in the name of their mother, earnestly inviting the two princes over into England, and gently chiding them for the indifference they seemed to shew in the recovery of their right, which encreased the power of the usurper, and would render their restoration hereafter more difficult. This stratagem answered the purposes of those who contrived it; for the young princes, imposed on by the spurious invitation, readily came into the proposal made them; and Alfred, the most active of the two, embarked, with a few Normans on board some ships, and came over to England. Godwin was ready to meet him at his landing, and the unsuspecting youth, thinking him still in his mother's interest, received him with the most tender caresses, which were returned by the treacherous earl, with a seeming warmth of sincerity: but no sooner had he the unhappy victim of his ambition fully in his power, than he caused him to be seized in the night time, and put to death, with the greatest part of his followers.

This murder perpetrated ‡, Harold and Godwin next consulted how they might effectually secure themselves from the resentment of Edward, the surviving son of Ethelred, who would not fail to stir heaven and earth to revenge the cruel treatment of his brother. They knew that the mother of the deceased prince was both artful and ambitious, greatly beloved by the English, and consequently might have it in her power to revenge the death of one of her sons, and assist the survivor in the recovery of his right. To free themselves therefore from all these apprehensions, and to prevent her from raising any disturbances in the kingdom, they took care to have her accused of an intention to do it, and she was ordered into exile by way of security, A. D. 1037. The queen-mother, finding herself thus persecuted, retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who generously took her under his protection, and assigned her Bruges for her abode and subsistence; the nonage of the Norman duke, with the dissensions that generally attend a minority, rendering it unsafe for her to reside in her native dominions.

Harold, finding himself thus freed from the apprehension of any competitor, resolved to provide against any future machinations that might be set

* Who supported those pretensions by alledging that his competitor Harold had been obtruded upon Canute as his son, by the artifice of Emma, who had recourse to a false labour (not being with child) in order to secure the affection of her husband, and had passed Harold, who was the son of a shoemaker, upon Canute for his own. However, Speed treats this as a false report, raised only to serve the present purpose.

‡ Which, according to Speed, was attended with circumstances of barbarity, almost too shocking to mention. According to him, they ripped up the young prince's belly, and drew out his bowels, one end of which being fastened to a post, they pricked him with sharp poniards, to make him run round till all his bowels were wound upon it.

on foot against his person or government, by raising a numerous fleet to guard the kingdom from all invasions. For this purpose he imposed a tax upon the nation, which proved very unpopular, and gave rise to much discontent; and that was, for every port to fit out sixteen galleys, and, in order to maintain them, the nation was assessed at the rate of eight marks for every rower, and twelve more for every master.

A. D. 1038, the Welch broke out into open rebellion, under the command of Griffith Llewellyn, who, coming to a battle with the English and Danes, at Cross-ford upon the Severn, gained a complete victory over them, and, flushed with his success, led his army to Lhanpadarn-vawr in Cardiganshire, which he totally destroyed; and then marching into South Wales, he entirely reduced that country, and forced Howel ap Edwin, its king, to save himself by a precipitate flight; but soon after, another powerful army being sent against the Welch, routed them. And this insurrection being thus happily quelled, Harold, to prevent future disturbances in those parts, passed a law, by which every Welshman, who passed Offa's Dyke without permission, was to lose his right hand*.

A. D. 1039 was the last of Harold's life, whose acts of tyranny and cruelty had, by this time, rendered him detested by the majority of his people; and he had certainly fallen a victim to their resentment, had he not met with powerful friends in earl Godwin, Leofric earl of Mercia, and other noblemen of great fortune and interest, who found their account in supporting him on the throne. The English, in vain, cast their eyes on Edward, the surviving son of Ethelred, who was then in Normandy; for that court, on account of its own distractions, was unable to give him any assistance; and earl Godwin had so powerful a party in England, that any attempts made by the natives alone must have proved abortive, or have ended only in their own destruction. So that this unfortunate prince seemed to be in a manner out of question, with regard to the succession, more especially as the right of primogeniture was, by most men of candour and dispassionate consideration, looked upon as belonging to Edward, the son of Edmund, then an exile in the Hungarian court; but his distance from the kingdom, and the general estimation in which the other Edward was held by the populace, seemed to remove him farther from the hopes of filling the throne of England, than even the son of Ethelred.

However this might be, Hardicnute at this time, either roused from his lethargy, or having completely settled his affairs in Denmark, and perhaps being solicited by the malecontents to bestir himself in order to assert his own property in the succession, which had been settled by an act of the states, came from Denmark with a fleet of sixty sail, to Flanders, on pretext of paying a visit to his mother Emma, but in reality with a view to recover his rights. The precaution which his brother Harold had taken in fitting out a fleet for the safeguard of the coasts, made him diffident of entering upon any enterprize of that nature for the present; and he resolved to remain quiet, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity, and he did not wait long before those expectations were answered; for he was, as yet, upon his visit to his mother, when he received the pleasing tidings of Harold's death, which happened on the eighteenth of May, 1040. Upon this, he embarked on board his fleet, and prepared to pass over into England, either to receive the crown in a peaceable manner, or with the assistance of the faction, who favoured him, to dispute it by force of arms against any competitor.

CANUTE II. or HARDICNUTE.

The Third Danish King of England, A. D. 1040.

THE English, apprised of Hardicnute's intentions, and dreading to see their country subjected to those evils of a civil war which they had already, but too sorely, experienced, resolved to prevent his having recourse to any hostile measures to recover the crown by inviting him over to take possession of it.

Hardicnute, joyfully accepting of this spontaneous invitation, landed at Sandwich the thirteenth of June, and on his arrival was received with the most extravagant demonstrations of joy: even earl Godwin, who had so warmly headed the faction in favour of his brother, now was the first of the nobles who did him homage; and, by his artful address, and persuasive eloquence, not only made his peace with the new king, but was also admitted to a high place in his favour.

The English, ever fond of novelty, and equally inconstant in their affections and dislikes, promised themselves a long series of happiness in the reign of a prince, whose character had been represented by his adherents as truly amiable: but they soon found themselves miserably deceived in the idea they had pre-conceived of his gentle administration; for his very first action after his coronation, sufficiently evinced him to be a person of violent passions, and terrible in his resentments. Impatient to give his mother a proof of the detestation in which he held his brother Harold, and to revenge the murder of Alfred, her darling son, as also to convince the English how much he disapproved his predecessor's conduct, he ordered the body of the deceased king to be dug up, the head to be cut off, and the body afterwards to be cast into the Thames. This order was issued to Alfric, archbishop of York, earl Godwin, and Trouhl, the common executioner†, and was obeyed with the most cruel punctuality; nay some authors affirm, that on this occasion Godwin, in order to ingratiate himself with the reigning prince, committed many acts of wanton and contemptuous cruelty on the dead body of the monarch whose cause he had so warmly espoused when living. Be that as it may, it was afterwards found by some fishermen floating on the water, and by them delivered to the Danes, who interred it in a burial place their nation then had in London‡. Brumpton adds, that Hardicnute, being informed of this, caused it to be dug up a second time, and once more cast into the river; but being again found, it was taken up and buried in Westminster.

Hardicnute's next civil transaction was the imposing a heavy tax on the kingdom for the payment of the fleet which had brought him from Denmark. This appeared the more intolerable, as the nation was at that time threatened with a famine. The ensuing year, A. D. 1041, he levied another far greater, consisting of two impositions, the one amounting to no less than twenty-nine thousand and twenty-nine pounds, and the other to eleven thousand and forty-eight pounds. This exasperated the people to such a degree, that they rose at Worcester, and murdered Peader and Torstan, two of Hardicnute's officers employed in collecting it; an outrage which he punished severely, by sending his soldiers into the country of the rioters, with strict orders to lay it waste with fire and sword, which harsh command was executed with the most rigorous exactness. On the twelfth of November their ravages began, and continued till the evening of the sixteenth. The inhabitants, foreseeing the fate which must attend their waiting for the arrival of these messengers of blood and desolation, seized upon and fortified a little island in the Severn, called Beveridge, resolving there to sell their lives as dear as possible, or to purchase their freedom; accordingly, when the king's troops, after having punctually obeyed their inglorious orders, prepared to attack this handful of resolute men, they met with so warm a reception, that after several unsuccessful attempts to drive them out of their fastnesses, the generals were glad to retire and leave them in the possession of their asylum, and at liberty to return to their desolated city, which they rebuilt, and, in a short time, restored with double lustre.

About this period, Hardicnute sent an invitation to his brother Edward to come over from Normandy, and, on his arrival in England, treated him with the greatest hospitality. His sister Gunhilda* also was, at this time, sent to consummate her nuptials with the emperor Henry III. to whom she was betrothed; and the marriage was performed with so much magnificence, and with such memorable profusion, that it got even into the songs of the bards of those days, and was transmitted in lays, which were still extant at the time when Matthew of Westminster wrote, who records this circumstance.

On the arrival of Edward in England, and the frequent intercourse between him and his mother Emma, whose influence in the kingdom was considerable, the interest of the Normans began to prevail mightily at court, and Livingus, bishop of Worcester, the same priest who had carried Canute's letter to the assembly of the English states, was accused, together with the famous earl Godwin, by Alfric, archbishop of York, and others, as concerned in the murder of prince Alfred, the king's uterine brother; and the accusers having clearly proved their charge, the prelate was deprived of his see, which was bestowed upon the informer: however, the deposed bishop, being well acquainted with Hardicnute's great avarice, found means to intercede so effectually with him, by a present of a considerable sum of money, that he was soon afterwards restored to his benefice. The same expedient was likewise put in practice, and with the same success, by earl Godwin, who would undoubtedly have fallen a victim to the public resentment, had he not saved his life by his singular address in the arts of corruption; arts which have more than once eluded the blow from the uplifted arm of justice, and covered the most infamous deeds with the specious veil of wronged innocence. On this occasion he softened the pious wrath of his sovereign, by presenting the king with a galley most magnificently equipped, having a gilded stern, and furnished with all conveniences, both for war and pleasure, and manned with eighty choice soldiers, every one of which wore upon each arm a bracelet of gold, weighing sixteen ounces, with an helmet and corslet, all richly gilt, as were also the hilts of their swords, having a Danish battle-ax adorned with silver and gold hanging at his left shoulder, with a shield on his left arm, the bosses and nails of which were also gilded: in his right hand he had a lance, in the Anglo-Saxon tongue called Halegar†. By means of this noble present, the earl was allowed to acquit himself by oath of having had no farther share in the death of Alfred, than what he had been obliged to do in obedience to the commands of Harold, his then sovereign.

However great Hardicnute's filial piety might have been, it is past contradiction that he had, on all occasions, shewed a very blameable partiality for the Danes, who were settled in England; inso-much, that we are told by the writers of those times, that whenever an Englishman met a Dane on the road, or in the streets, he was compelled to bow himself to the ground, and remain in that submissive position till the latter had passed him. This cruel partiality, and the grievous taxes with which he saddled the nation, brought upon him the hatred of his people; and the immoderate and even beastly luxury in which he indulged himself, rendered him the object of their ridicule and contempt. However, he did not long enjoy that crown of which he seemed to be every way unworthy; for he ignobly and suddenly finished his life and reign at Lambeth, in a debauch, while he was celebrating the nuptials of a Danish nobleman, named Tuvey Prudean, with Githa, the daughter of Osgood Clappa; and with so little ceremony did the English treat his memory, that they observed the day on which he died, for some time, as a holiday, calling it Hog-Wednesday, which they spent in dancing and merriment, and drawing cords across the way to stop persons till they obtained their passage by giving them drink or money to purchase it‡.

The character of this prince may be summed up in a very few words. With some virtues that did not exceed the common standard, he had many vices that deprived him of every manly excellence, and degraded him almost below the brutes.

He died on the eighth of June, A. D. 1042, in the third year of his reign, and was buried at New Winchester.

EDWARD, surnamed the CONFESSOR, A. D. 1042.

HARDICNUTE dying without issue, Edward, the son of Ethelred II. by Emma, princess of Normandy, was then the only person in England that had any just pretensions to the crown: besides, the English were now cured of their fondness for foreigners, who had loaded them with insupportable taxes, and made it their business not so much to govern as to plunder the nation; and the many oppressions they had suffered under the Danes, especially the two last of that race, determined them to take ample revenge, and either to put them to the sword, or drive them out of the kingdom: which latter purpose they put in execution immediately upon hearing of Hardicnute's death; so that the very name of Dane seems to have been lost in England from this period*. This expulsion of the old tyrants of this country seems not a little to have facilitated the quiet accession of Edward to the throne of his ancestors; for earl Godwin, who had by this time engrossed such power and influence in the kingdom as no subject had ever possessed, thought this a favourable opportunity to ingratiate himself with the English, by using his interest in behalf of a descendant from the blood of Cerdic. He knew that his own title to the crown could only be Danish, which was alone sufficient in the present disposition of the times to make any attempt towards gaining the sovereignty miscarry; and therefore resolved to bring his family in by another race. With this view he used all his rhetoric to dissuade Edward from a design he had conceived of retiring into Normandy with his mother Emma, being fearful of trusting himself in the power of Godwin, who was notoriously known to have been the betrayer of his family, and the murderer of his brother. The earl on this occasion treated the prince with such marks of tenderness, and made such solemn protestations of the sincerity of his intentions, that he removed his fears. He represented to him that his design of quitting the kingdom was unworthy his great birth; he put him in mind of his royal descent from both sides, telling him, that as he was now arrived at the age of maturity, he doubted not but that the natural sweetness of his disposition would prove the means of healing the yet bleeding wounds of his country from foreign oppressions; and that, at all events, it was far more eligible to live a king in his own country, than to wander a miserable exile in strange climates. This soothing harangue he closed with an assurance of exerting all his influence to place the crown on his head, provided he would agree to the following terms, namely, to take his daughter to wife and maintain him and his sons in the posts they enjoyed.

Edward gladly embraced these proposals, and roused, by the earl's discourse, to some degree of ambition, as also being conscious of his great power, he gave himself wholly up to his direction, and left him to concert such measures as he should judge most proper.

Godwin having thus far succeeded in his favourite point, he, by his authority of regent of the kingdom, convoked an assembly of the states at Gillenham, for the election of a king, and with an eloquence peculiar to himself, expatiated upon the miseries which a race of foreigners had intailed upon the nation. When he found he had worked the minds of his hearers into the desired disposition, he suddenly presented Edward to them (whom he had previously introduced incog. into the assembly), and raising him from his seat, and uncovering his face, which was wrapt up in his hood, "Behold, cried he aloud, your king! This is prince Edward, the son of king Ethelred and queen Emma, and to him I pay my allegiance." This ceremony, which was something between an election and recognition, struck the assembly with surprize; but they knew it was in vain to dispute with earl Godwin and his friends, who were more than a match for any faction that could be raised to oppose their designs: not but that there was a considerable party who were for recalling out of Hungary prince Edward, the son of Edmund Ironside, who was one degree nearer to the throne than his uncle. However, after a short pause, it was agreed to elect Edward for their sovereign.

Previous to our proceeding in the history of this prince's reign, we judge it necessary to give the reader a full account of the powerful connections and influence of earl Godwin, as that

* This is one of the most difficult passages in the English history. On which ever side we view it, it still appears altogether unaccountable. The Danes alone, in a manner, were in possession of all the Eastern and Northern counties; and in Mercia, that is, in the heart of the kingdom, they were as numerous as the English. Four kings of their nation had reigned successively, who, far from humbling them, had no doubt shown them great favour, and given them the preference. And yet, without any thing extraordinary happening, except the death of Hardicnute, a prince of little merit and reputation, they will have it that the English were suddenly become superior. But this is not all, 'tis affirmed, that this superiority was so great as to enable them to expel the Danes out of the kingdom. How is it possible to believe, that the Danes should suffer themselves to be thus treated, without making the least resistance? for it does not appear that there was any war or commotion in the kingdom upon this occasion. Pontanus, the Danish historian, makes the matter still worse; he tells us, that all the Danes in England were massacred in one night, by the treachery of Harold, the son of Godwin, who ordered all the Danish soldiers to march out of their garrisons, under pretence of solemnizing the funeral of the late king. But this account is altogether improbable; for, in the first place, Harold, who was then very young, had no hand in the government, and consequently could give no such orders to the Danish officers. In the next place, how came it to pass, that all the English historians, Brompton only excepted, who says but very little of the matter, should agree to pass over in silence so remarkable an event? How was it possible for them to write their histories without ever making the least allusion to it. If it is objected, they did this, as ashamed of their nation for so barbarous an action, What is the reason they acted not in the same manner with regard to the massacre in the reign of Ethelred? These are difficulties that are not easily to be got over. It seems at first, as if there was a plausible way of accounting for them, which is, to charge the historians, as well English as Danish, of not having told the whole truth, or of having aggravated what they relate. But by taking this course we run into still greater difficulties. It is most certain, that ever since the beginning of the reign of Edward the Confessor, the Danes have been so far from making any figure in England, that they are not mentioned in history any more than if they had never been known there, though just before they were masters of the whole kingdom. But whence should proceed so sudden a fall, or rather, how should they all vanish in a moment, if neither expelled nor massacred? History acquaints us not that war was made against them, that their strong holds were taken from them, that they were brought under new laws: but all on a sudden, these powerful and formidable Danes are reduced to nothing, in the reign of a prince the most unwarlike that had ever sat on the throne. These are historical difficulties, the solution whereof must be left to others. Rap. Hist. Engl.

nobleman will be found to bear so distinguished a share in the events we are about to relate.

This nobleman then, though by his father's side he had neither the blood of a gentleman nor a king in his veins, had pretensions as formidable as his power. The first time that he appeared with any degree of eclat, was in the reign of Canute the Great, when that monarch entrusted him with the command of the English troops in his war against the Vandals*. As a reward for the signal services he did in that expedition, Canute made him earl of Kent, Suffex, and Surry, and gave him in marriage Thyra, sister to earl Ulpho, his own brother-in-law. Godwin had, by this lady, a son, who died young, being killed by a fall from his horse. He afterwards married Githa, sister to Swein, who was king of Denmark after Hardicnute: by her he had seven sons, Harold, Toftin, Swein, Ulnoth, Gyrth, Elfgar, Lewin, and a daughter named Editha. His great credit with Canute, the superiority of his genius, his noble alliances, his titles of earl of Kent, and duke of Wessex, and his post of high treasurer conferred on him by king Harold; and lastly, the high places of trust and honour, enjoyed by his sons, the eldest of whom, Swein, was earl of the counties of Hereford, Gloucester, Oxford, Berks, and Suffex; and Harold, another, earl of Essex and East Anglia, had raised him to that height, that it was difficult for a subject to attain to a more exalted power; and indeed, the title of king excepted, he possessed every other requisite of regal authority; for the better half of the kingdom was actually in his hands and those of his family: so that, as we have before observed, he was more than a match for any party that could be raised in opposition to him. But to return to Edward.

A great scarcity which prevailed at the time that Edward was elected, and which was accompanied by a prodigious mortality among the cattle, caused the ceremony of his coronation to be postponed for that year; but the following, A.D. 1043, it was performed with great solemnity at Winchester.

Edward has been represented to us an example of piety and goodness, and as such has been canonized; but how far his actions tally with such a character, we leave our readers to judge, when we shall acquaint them that this saint-like king began his reign with the most inhuman treatment that son could shew to a mother; for immediately after his coronation, he sent certain of his officers to take an exact account of the lands that queen Emma held from the crown, all of which he seized into his own hands, together with her ready money, jewels, and whatever else she possessed of value. It is pretended by some authors, who have indulged themselves in extolling the imaginary virtues of this prince, that his motive for this undutiful behaviour, was resentment for the marriage which his mother had contracted with Canute, and by which she had given away the rights of her children, by Ethelred, to the crown of England. But the real cause seems to have existed in that narrowness of soul, and avaritious disposition, of which Edward gave more than one proof during the course of his administration. But this treatment of Emma was tender in comparison of what she afterwards suffered; for this unnatural son ordered her to be tried for a criminal correspondence with Alwin bishop of Winchester. Robert, the Norman, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, was her accuser; and, as he could not prove his allegations by evidence, he insisted upon her proving her innocence by undergoing the fiery ordeal†. She accordingly walked blindfold over nine burning plowshares, without being hurt, to the astonishment of a multitude of spectators. Thus say Brompton, Camden, and Dorset; but if it be recollected that neither the Saxon annals, Eadmer, nor William of Malmesbury, have mentioned this circumstance, we may fairly conclude, that the whole story is a fiction, trumped up by the Norman writers, the inveterate enemies of Godwin's family: and that the queen was fairly acquitted for want of the charge against her being properly supported.

In this same year, 1043, England was threatened with a formidable invasion from the North. Swein, king of Norway, the son of Canute the Great, now began to make preparations, with the assistance of his father's friends, to assert his claim to the throne of England. On this occasion, earl Godwin, ever

† Somner, in his Glossary, derives this word from or, a privative, and deal, that is, distinction; as much as to say, an impartial judgment, without favour or distinction. The trial by ordeal was two-fold, the one by fire, the other by water. The trial by fire was performed two ways; the person accused held in his hand a red-hot piece of iron of one, two, or three pounds weight, according to his crime, or according to the evidence against him; or else he was made to walk barefoot and blindfold, over nine red-hot plow-shares placed at a stated distance: if he had the good luck to come off unhurt, he was declared innocent; but in case he was burnt, he was pronounced guilty. Persons of quality, only, were tried by fire-ordeal. Trial by water-ordeal was made either by cold or by scalding-water. Peasants and slaves were put upon this trial. In the trial by cold water, the party suspected had his hands and feet tied together, and so thrown into a pond or river: if he floated he was held innocent; but if he sunk he was declared guilty. When scalding-water was the test, the person accused was to plunge his arm into it as far as the wrist, and sometimes up to the elbow. These trials were made with great solemnity, and were always managed by the clergy. The person accused was obliged to swear his innocence, and sometimes, especially if in orders, to receive the sacrament. After the charge was legally brought in, the person impeached was to spend three days in fasting and prayer. At the day of trial, which in the fire-ordeal was made in the church, the priest in his habit took up the iron which lay before the altar, and repeating the hymn of the Three Children, put it into the fire: then using some forms of benediction over the fire and iron, he sprinkled the iron with holy water, and made the sign of the cross in the name of the Trinity: which done, the party accused passed through the test. The ceremony of the scalding-water-ordeal was much the same. But when the trial was by cold water, the three days fast and other circumstances being premised, the person suspected drank a draught of holy water, to which the priest added an imprecation in case he was guilty: then the water into which he was to be thrown, had a sort of exorcising form of prayer said over it. All these ways of trial continued long after the conquest. The first public discountenance from the state was in the third year of Henry III. The custom among the country people of trying witches by throwing them into the water with their thumbs and toes tied together, is, perhaps, a reliet of the old water-ordeal. But the whole of this pretended purgation appears to be an impious delusion of the senses of mankind, to swell the bags of mercenary priests; for to them the party was committed to be held in custody, and on them alone depended life or death. In this case no price, at the expence either of property or of virtue, was thought too dear by most of the accused for deliverance. But if the unhappy culprits had nothing to offer, they were sure to suffer. On the contrary, if they could bid up to the priest's demand, either of lust or avarice, they were saved by a preparation of oil, then a secret with the clergy, but now common with every fire-swallowing mountebank that travels the country.

attentive to the welfare of that cause which he thought it his interest to espouse, left nothing undone to provide against the suspected visit; he put all the strong holds in the kingdom in a posture of defence, and by his advice the king himself went on board a fleet of five and thirty sail at Sandwich, with which it was proposed to give the enemy battle, in case they should appear off the coast, and to prevent their effecting a landing. But Magnus, king of Norway, having about this time invaded the dominions of Swein, that prince was obliged to drop his enterprize against England, in order to attend to the defence of his own territories*.

A. D. 1044, Edward, pursuant to his promise made to Godwin, married the fair Editha, that nobleman's daughter, the young lady being now come to years of puberty. Ingulphus, the historian, who lived at those times, and was honoured even with some degree of her confidence, has represented her as the most amiable of her sex, both in person and disposition; yet, not all the profusion of her charms, nor the graces of her mind, could awaken, in the insensible Edward, one amorous desire; for, either through a fastidious, or natural impotence, or from family aversion, he suffered this virgin-rose to remain untouched. However, the barrenness of his bed proved the occasion of his canonization: for it was pretended that he had made a vow of chastity; a rash vow surely for a married man, and highly absurd for a king who stood in need of an heir to his dominions. But by this vow, real or pretended, he forged new chains for his unhappy country.

The following year, Swein the eldest son of earl Godwin, presuming upon the great power and interest of his family, attempted the chastity of the abbess of Leominster in Herefordshire. This crime drew upon him the wrath of the devout Edward, and of all his clergy, who prosecuted the young man with such severity, that, notwithstanding he offered to make atonement for this crime of unguarded youth, by marrying the injured lady, he was sentenced to be banished to Bruges in Flanders; his father wisely forbearing to use his interest in behalf even of his own son, who had violated the laws of his country. This prudent conduct served not a little to fix Godwin in the favourable opinions of the people, who, struck with this exterior of religious submission, never troubled themselves to look into the political springs that gave it movement. His son Swein, finding himself thus persecuted by his king and country, now meditated a severe revenge; and, retiring into Denmark, he got together eight ships stoutly manned, with which he committed great depredations on the English coasts in the year 1046, inso-much that it was judged prudent by Edward's council to come to an accommodation with him, to which Swein, despairing of being able to withstand the forces that Edward might bring against him for any considerable time, and being moreover desirous of living peaceably as a subject, rather than to lead the restless life of a pirate, readily consented; and the king promised to restore him to his former honours and possession; but his brother Harold, either prompted by interest, or dreading the aspiring temper of Swein, privately opposed the reconciliation, and persuaded Edward to break off the conferences: upon which Swein quitted the kingdom, and retired again into Flanders.

About this time also, Swein, king of Denmark, being unable to make head against Magnus, king of Norway, who had invaded his dominions, sent to Edward for succours: and a council was held in presence of the king and the principal nobles, to deliberate upon his request; when Godwin, in a pathetic speech, set forth the necessity of assisting this unfortunate prince, both from the motives of charity, and those of the honour of the state; and the assembly was on the point of aiding him with a fleet of fifty sail, when Leofric, earl of Mercia, and Siward, earl palatine of Northumberland, two noblemen of great eminence, who foresaw, that if this measure took place, the command of the fleet would devolve upon Godwin, or one of his sons, whose power they beheld with an evil eye, strongly opposed the earl's council; and their great credit counterpoising his on this occasion, his project came to nothing. However, Swein, though thus left to himself, soon after recovered his kingdom by the death of Magnus, when he took a severe revenge for the slight and unkindness shewn him by the English, by ravaging the coasts of Wales in such a manner, that the inhabitants were obliged to quit their habitations, and retire into the Uplands for security. He afterwards cruized upon the coasts of Essex, pillaging the country, and spreading terror and consternation wheresoever he passed, until Edward sent a strong body of forces under the earls Godwin, Leofric, and Siward, who repulsed him to his ships with great slaughter.

The next year, A. D. 1047, another fleet of Danish freebooters, joined by the rebellious Swein, with his squadron of eight ships, cruelly infested the English coasts, upon which Godwin employed Aldred, bishop of Worcester, to use his endeavours to prevail on the king to grant his son Swein a full pardon, which, after some entreaties, Edward consented to, not out of any regard to the earl or his family, whom he mortally hated, notwithstanding his having placed the crown on his head, but being rather compelled thereto from the defenceless state of his kingdom, which was destitute of a proper naval force to curb the insolence of the invaders. Count Beorn, son of Ulpho, by Estritha, sister to Canute the Great, was the person pitched upon to carry Swein the news of the king's intentions, and that he might obtain his readmission at court, upon certain conditions. But Swein, distrusting the count's sincerity, and apprehensive that this might only be a snare to betray him into the hands of justice, inveigled Beorn on board his own ship, carried him round to Axminster in Devonshire, where he murdered him, and cast his body into the sea. This infamous breach of the

* Simeon of Durham and Hovenden tell us, that this invasion of England was threatened by Magnus himself; but notwithstanding the lateness of this period, the history of the northern nations at this time is so confused, that nothing certain can be concluded. Ailred, in vita S. Edwardi, also ascribes this expedition to Magnus; and adds, that the failure of it was owing to the extraordinary piety of Edward, which engaged a peculiar interposition of providence in his favour; Magnus being drowned by a false step he made as he was going on board his own ship.

laws of honour and hospitality, retarded the accommodation for a while; but, at length, the king, fearful of incurring the displeasure of earl Godwin and his powerful party, consented to pardon the traitor, a weakness which we could hardly forgive in a king, did we not know that a fresh fleet from Denmark, more powerful than either of the former, and joined also by Swein, was on the point of coming over to England to renew their ravages; and therefore we cannot be surprized that Edward used this expedient to weaken their power.

But no part of Edward's conduct gave so much distaste to the great men of his kingdom (who inspired it on some occasions into others), than the glaring partiality he shewed towards the Normans, whom he invited over in shoals to his court, loading them with favours, and turning the whole stream of his bounty toward them, as a reward he thought due for the kindness they had shewn him when an exile in their country; a laudable instance of gratitude, had it been confined within proper bounds. Edward, however, set none to his fondness for the Normans; but both himself and his court adopted their manners, dress, and even language. The nobility, forgetting the antient Saxon tongue spoken by their forefathers, conversed now only in French. Nay, this foreign dialect was introduced even into the courts of justice, where all the law, deeds, and instruments, were in the Norman form and language, as if they were ashamed of their own manners and customs.

These innovations greatly alarmed the sensible part of the nation, who could not, without great heart-burnings, behold themselves, as it were, cast aside to make room for these new comers, who engrossed every place of trust and profit, more especially when they saw the castles and strong holds of the kingdom taken from its natives, and entrusted to the care of Normans; and the vacant see of Canterbury filled with one Rodbert, a monk, of Jumieges, who had been first elected bishop of London. Earl Godwin, who, notwithstanding his great ambition, which indeed he stopped at no means to gratify, had still the honour and welfare of the English nation at heart, finding the king's ear possessed by foreigners, was apprehensive that his master might be led to take such steps as were inconsistent with the good of the kingdom, and the natural right the English had to his favour; and, as he knew Rodbert* to be a person of great cunning, and master of every art which could render him insinuating and agreeable, he exerted all his endeavours to remove the prelate from the place he held in the king's esteem, but in vain; for the cunning priest had such an effectual hold of the king's mind, that Godwin quickly found his interest with his master was declining, and was not at a loss to guess the cause. In a word, these two courtiers hated each other with the utmost rancour, and each, in secret, plotted the destruction of his adversary, when an event fell out which had well-nigh ended in the ruin of the earl, and even threatened the destruction of the kingdom, by the most deplorable of all scourges, a civil war.

A. D. 1048, say the Saxon annals, but according to most other authors, A. D. 1051, Eustace †, earl of Boulogne, who had married Goda, the king's sister, came over to England on a visit, and, after having remained some days at Edward's court, who received him with every possible mark of honour and affection, set out for Dover on his return to his dominions. A servant, whom he had dispatched before him to provide lodgings in that city, happening to have a quarrel with some of the townsmen, he struck one of them, upon which a fray ensued, in which the domestic lost his life. The earl, arriving at the instant of the murder, without staying to enquire into the provocation given, ordered his attendants to fall upon the townsmen, and revenge their fellow-servant's death; but the inhabitants, flying to arms, repelled the assailants with great loss: upon which the earl, in a violent fury, posted back to London, and represented the affair which had happened, as a gross insult upon his dignity and character. The king, who was glad of every occasion to please the Normans, and mortify the pride of Godwin, whom he looked upon as a dangerous subject, on account of his great popularity and power, promised Eustace to take a severe revenge upon the insolent rioters; and forthwith issued his orders to earl Godwin, in whose government the insult had been committed, to march with a body of troops, and to lay waste their country with fire and sword. This sentence sufficiently shews Edward to have been equally void of the principles of common justice, and ignorant of the laws of England, which, by his coronation-oath, he had sworn to maintain inviolable, in thus proceeding to judgment, without taking the merits of the cause under a legal consideration, or allowing the delinquents a fair hearing.

Godwin, instead of complying with the above-mentioned orders, repaired to court, and took the liberty to remonstrate to the king with all that honest warmth which truth ever inspires, that it would be an unprecedented act, and such as would stamp ignominy upon his reign and character, to put Englishmen to death unheard or unconvicted. This patriotic freedom proved highly offensive to the ears of Edward, which had been accustomed to the silver sounds of smooth-tongued flattery, and the complaisant addresses of his Norman sycophants. The king repeated his orders in a peremptory manner. But Godwin, firm to his purpose, still delayed putting them in execution, and chose rather to brave the dangers that might await his disobedience than deprive the innocent of their lives, or sacrifice the liberties of his countrymen to the pert insolence of foreigners, or the arbitrary commands of a weak and ill-advised prince. He looked upon this as a fair opportunity for establishing his own popularity, for exerting that patriotism he had ever professed; and for ridding the kingdom of the Normans, who, like an

* Carte represents this prelate as remarkable for his capacity, fidelity, and integrity; and that Godwin's aim in opposing him was only to maintain his own power at court, by removing from the king's person every one in whom he could put a confidence. But it is evident that Carte has here followed William of Malmesbury, who was himself a monk and a heterogeneous mass, choaked the current of mutual love and confidence that should ever flow freely between a king and his natural subjects. But to proceed.

The refusal of earl Godwin, and the freedom of his remonstrances, begat in the king's mind an implacable hatred to him, his family, and party, which the courtiers did not fail to improve by every malicious suggestion; however, Edward would have found it very difficult to satisfy his resentment but for an accidental cause, which furnished him with as plausible an handle as he could possibly wish.

The Welsh having, about this time, erected a fort upon part of the estate of Swein, Godwin's eldest son, it furnished a good pretext for the earl and his family to draw together a body of forces, to defend themselves, in case the king should proceed to extremities against the former, for his disobedience of his commands. Edward, however, was not so blind but that he could discern the real motives of this armament, and therefore thought it most advisable to be beforehand with this restless subject: accordingly he called an assembly at Gloucester, to consult on matters of importance, relative to the affairs of the kingdom, where deputies appeared from the Welsh, complaining against earl Godwin and his sons, for having entered their territories in an hostile manner. Hereupon Edward sent to summon Godwin and his sons to appear at the council, having previously engaged Leofric and Siward, earls of Mercia and Northumberland, in his interest, by whose presence and authority he hoped to be a match for the opposite party. Godwin, on receiving this summons, was not a little puzzled how to act; he could not, consistently with his own character, refuse to attend, nor could he with safety comply. At length, however, he determined not to obey the summons, though he was well assured that this appearance of contempt would subject him to all the weight of the royal indignation; but then, on the other hand, he considered that the easiness of the king's nature made him the dupe of his enemies, and, though he bore him the respect due to a king, he could not approve of the measures of the administration.

Being thus determined, he sent deputies to the assembly, setting forth his reasons for not appearing to this summons. He represented, "that the machination of his enemies, and those of the kingdom, made it not safe for him to trust himself in their power: he declared the Welsh to have been the first aggressors, by infringing the laws subsisting between the two nations, and invading the territories of the English: he painted in the most lively colours the injuries the native subjects of this land had suffered from the encroachments of the Normans, who had engrossed the royal favour wholly to themselves: and that he had thought it his duty to raise forces, in order to chastise the insolence of the Welsh, and rescue his prince out of the hands of foreigners." This spirited remonstrance concluded with a demand, which, though clothed in the pleasing garb of the warmest patriotism, had undoubtedly its source in an unwarrantable ambition and thirst of revenge: it was this, "that the persons of count Eustace and his retinue, who had murdered so many of the king's liege subjects, should be delivered into his custody, as earl and governor of Kent, where they had committed those outrages, and there to be tried by the laws of England."

The whole assembly were struck dumb at this bold message, and the high demands of the refractory earl. As for the king, he burnt with eagerness to chastise this audacious subject for his contumacy, and, in the first emotions of his wrath, gave orders for raising forces all over his dominions; and the nation was now on the point of being plunged in civil war, had not some noblemen, and in particular the earls Leofric and Siward, anxious for the peace and welfare of their country, and wisely considering, that however dangerous Godwin's views might be, his defence was at least good and constitutional, laboured to calm the sharp resentment of the king, to persuade him to decline coming to extremities, and to refer the affair to a general council. Happily their generous efforts met with the desired success; for Edward, who inherited none of the martial ardour of his ancestors, was quickly charmed with the voice of peace: he listened with pleasure to the advice that coincided with his natural disposition, and summoned a great council at London. Thus did these true friends to their country, by a timely interposition, disappoint all the arbitrary views of a weak and obstinate prince, and all the dangerous designs of an over-powerful subject.

Godwin and his sons now kept themselves quiet within their governments; and the king, having levied a strong army in Mercia and the north, for the security of his person, marched to London, where all the nobility of England repaired to be present at the opening of the assembly. Godwin and his sons followed in a short time, attended by a numerous body of West Saxons, who took up their quarters in Southwark. At the opening of the council, earl Swein was declared an outlaw, and Godwin and his other son Harold commanded, upon their allegiance, to appear, attended only by twelve persons, at the assembly, and give an account of their conduct. In reply to this summons the two earls declared their readiness to appear in the manner required, provided they might have hostages for their security. This request, which, considering the disposition and power of their enemies, was nothing but just, was rejected with indignation, and the king issued orders for the apprehending the persons of Godwin and his son. These orders, however, had no effect, the adherents of the two noblemen continuing firm to their interest. A second citation was thereupon issued; but the earl remaining obstinate, the assembly proceeded against him for contumacy, and passed an order for his departing the kingdom in five days, together with his five sons, on pain of being treated as traitors to their country.

Here we have a confirmation of that truth which all history and observation teaches, that no domestic faction, however specious in its pretexts, or powerful in its connections, will be able to shake the throne of a king of England, so long as he has the sanction of the laws to his proceedings; and that the people of England, though they may be a while led astray by the artifices or insinuations of ambitious or selfish men, will never be prevailed upon to act against their parliament: and though they may pity the weakness, or repine at the partiality, of their deluded sovereign, they will, in their cooler moments of reflection, be very cautious how they lend their hand to pluck down the barrier between the king and subject, in which their peace, their properties, their liberties, and all that they hold dear or sacred, are indivisibly blended. Let this, therefore, be a lesson to those, if any such there are, or may be, who now, or in future times, shall suffer their own resentments, or private views, to get so far the better of their reason, or the duty they owe to their country and themselves, as to stir up the flames of sedition, or make them forget the respect every subject owes to his prince; let such, I say, learn from earl Godwin's story, how frail a basis their hopes are built upon. Godwin had more power than any subject ever known in England, with as great abilities and as popular a cause; but the moment that the difference came to be between him and the parliament, he found his followers prove like a broken reed, that pierced the hand it was meant to support; and he was obliged to abandon all his mighty possessions, all his claims to dominion over the hearts of his fellow-subjects, and to leave all his friends to the mercy of the crown, and seek security for himself in an ignoble flight.

On the other hand, kings may from hence perceive that they do not live for themselves alone, but are, in some measure, accountable to the people over whom they reign, for their minutest actions; and that however great may be the real or supposed merits of those persons whom they single out as objects of royal favour and munificence, those merits, or a private propensity, ought never to be admitted in competition with that parental regard and preference due even to the meanest of their subjects, who have a like claim to their attention and favour with the greatest or most powerful.

But to return from this digression: No sooner was the sentence of banishment passed upon the earl publicly known, than it struck a panic to the heart of his party: his adherents lessened daily, his army deserted him; and he, who was so lately surrounded by thousands, ready to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in his cause, now found himself obliged, for want of support, to comply with his sentence. Having, therefore, shipped all his treasure on board a small squadron, at Bosenharn, in Suffex, he sailed, in company with his three sons, Gyrth, Swein, and Tosti, to Flanders, where he met with an hospitable reception from earl Baldwin, whose daughter Judith, Tosti (one of Godwin's sons) had married. His other sons, Harold and Leofwin, getting on board a ship at Bristol, took refuge in Ireland.

Thus far Edward's resentment was proper and constitutional; but he afterwards fell upon a most unmanly method of wreaking his revenge; for no sooner had he got rid of Godwin and his sons, than he shut up his queen, Godwin's daughter, in the nunnery of Whorwell, together with his own mother Emma, after having stripped them both of every thing valuable. Thus did this king, so celebrated for his meekness, and canonized for a saint, shew to all the world, that he was an utter stranger even to the common relentings of humanity*. Nor did Edward stop here; for he bestowed all the possessions of the exiled earl in Devonshire, Somersetshire, and Dorsetshire, upon Odda, a Norman nobleman, whom he likewise appointed warden of the Welsh marches. Harold's estates were at the same time given to Elfgar, son to the great Leofric earl of Mercia †.

The commotions in the English government encouraged the Irish to attempt an invasion of the kingdom, and being joined by the Welsh, they entered the Severn with a fleet of six and thirty ships, and committed great depredations on the adjacent country. Afterwards, passing the river Wye, they burnt the city of Dunham, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. Upon hearing of these excesses, Aldred, bishop of Worcester, assembled a body of men in haste, and thought to come privately upon the enemy, and put them to rout; but the Welsh prince Griffith having notice of his design, marched to meet him, forced him to a battle, and gained a complete victory.

A. D. 1051, Edward, in order to render himself popular, abolished the tax of Danegelt, which the English had long murmured at, as oppressive and illegal. Nor did his kindness to the people end here, for he ordered an account to be taken of all the surplus money remaining in his treasury from this tax, and caused it to be restored to the several proprietors from whom it had been collected.

About this time William duke of Normandy came into England, upon a visit to his cousin Edward, who, mindful of the hospitality and protection he had met with in the duke's court, received him with all possible marks of esteem and gratitude; and at his departure for his own dominions, loaded him with several noble presents, and the two princes parted with mutual expressions of the highest satisfaction. This visit, however, proved fatal to England in its consequences, for William afterwards made it an handle to lay claim to the crown, to which he pretended Edward had, during his stay here, made him heir: a claim that overthrew the English constitution. But here we may observe, that the most authentic historians are wholly silent in regard to Edward's making William a promise of the succession during his stay; and the very circumstances of the times were such as render it highly improbable he should. Even the Norman writers seem convinced of this, by making the right of William to consist in a will made by Edward, in which he appointed him his successor; a pretence as frivolous and groundless as the former, seeing that no such will was ever produced. On the whole, we may conclude, that William had no other right to the succession but that of a conqueror; and this will more plainly appear when we come to the history of his reign.

Soon after the duke's departure, A. D. 1052, died Emma, the king's mother, whose character seems to have been treated with too great rigour by most of our historians, since no positive fact has ever been produced to prove her to have been either an unworthy queen, or a bad woman.

* The reason he assigned for this act of brutality towards his wife, was such as must shock the ear of every tender husband, and excite the greatest detestation in the humane breast. According to Malmesbury, it was this: "He was resolved that she alone should not enjoy peace and plenty, while her father and brothers were abandoned to difficulties and distress."

† No lady of the age was more celebrated for her beauty and virtue than this nobleman's wife, Godina, of whom it is reported, that, in order to redeem the inhabitants of Coventry from the severe taxes which had been imposed upon them by her husband, she undertook to ride naked through the city; and having first forbidden the inhabitants to look at her during her procession, she mounted her horse, and rode through the town with no other covering but her long hair. One person having the curiosity to peep at her as she passed, was instantly struck dead with lightning: and in memory of this event, the citizens of Coventry still exhibit a statue on the very spot, in the attitude of peeping.

All this while Godwin and his sons were making the best use of their time during their exile; they tried all their friends, they procured supplies of ships, men, and money, and having at length gotten together a stout fleet, they resolved to revenge on Edward the ungrateful treatment they had received from him, and, if possible, compel him to restore them to their honours and possessions. Their workings, however, could not be kept so secret but that Edward got notice of them; and, sensible that it behoved him to be well upon his guard against the attempts of such an enterprising and incensed foe as Godwin, he gave orders to his two admirals, the earls Rodolph* and Odda, to repair on board his fleet, and cruise off the coast of Kent, to prevent any attempt of a descent. This was a very necessary precaution; and, had it been properly managed, would, in all probability, have defeated, for that time, the designs of the exiled earl. Scarce was the fleet met together at Sandwich, the place appointed for its rendezvous, when intelligence was brought, that Godwin, who had sailed from Bruges, was lying off Romney, in Kent, upon which the admirals immediately weighed anchor to go in pursuit of him, while a numerous body of forces was at the same time stationed along the coast, to be ready to oppose any descent that the enemy might attempt to make; but Godwin having intelligence of their motions, and knowing that he was by no means a match for the king's fleet, retired to Pevensey, in Sussex, whither the two admirals directed their course in order to force him to a battle; but a storm suddenly arising, they were obliged to return back into harbour; and Godwin, taking advantage of a fair wind and good weather that succeeded the tempest, got safe back to Flanders; from whence he sent to his son Harold in Ireland, to bring him a fresh reinforcement. There seems to have been some carelessness or bad conduct on the side of the king's admirals in suffering Godwin thus to escape them; and this appears the more probable, as we find them both broke at their return, and the navy laid up. Godwin no sooner heard of this, than he resolved to make the most of so fortunate a circumstance; and putting to sea immediately, he landed in the Isle of Wight, where he extorted large sums from the inhabitants; and afterwards sailing to Portland, he made a descent there, and laid a considerable part of the country under contribution. After this, returning back to the Isle of Wight, he was there joined by his son Harold, with a fleet of nine ships from Ireland. Their fleet being thus united, they steered their course along the coast of Sussex; and being reinforced on the way by soldiers from the country, and ships from the cinque-ports, they at length entered the Thames, and advanced towards London, without meeting any opposition; for although Edward, upon the first news of their junction, had taken the alarm, and sent orders to his admirals to make all possible dispatch with what ships they could get, to guard the mouth of the river, yet the sailors, either from not being properly paid, or from a dislike to their commanders, deserted to the earl in shoals, insomuch that the ships intended to oppose his progress, were left without hands sufficient to work them. However, the earl did not make such dispatch but that Edward had time to assemble his principal nobles, who all bringing in their quotas of troops, formed an army sufficiently numerous to defend the capital from any hostile attempts of a much stronger force than Godwin had brought with him.

That politic nobleman being informed that the king was prepared to give him a warm reception, thought it best to dissemble his real sentiments, and put on the garb of humility and submission, though with the sword of rebellion unsheathed in his hands; and accordingly sent a supplicating message to the king, in his own name and those of his sons, requesting that they might be restored to their former honours, of which they had been unjustly deprived, through the malice of their enemies; and promising the most loyal and pacific behaviour. But Edward, surrounded by his Norman counsellors, rejected the proposed accommodation in the most injurious terms, and even threatened the lives of those who had been charged with the earl's message. This unseasonable obstinacy had very nigh proved fatal to Edward's affairs; for notwithstanding that his army was determined to sacrifice their lives to a man, in defence of their sovereign, against any who should attack his person or authority, yet they could not bear the thoughts of embruing their hands in the blood of their own countrymen and relations, when it might be avoided by gentle measures. As for the earl's party, when they heard the contempt with which Edward had treated the submissive proposals made to him, they were with difficulty restrained from proceeding directly to acts of hostility; but Stigand, bishop of Winchester, and others of the principal nobles, in a manner compelled Edward to consent to a truce; and a negociation being set on foot for that purpose, an accommodation was effected on the following terms: that Godwin, his wife, and sons, should be restored to their respective ranks, power, and possessions: that the queen-consort (Godwin's daughter) should be reinstated in her former dignity; and that all Edward's foreign counsellors should be expelled the kingdom. The Normans were soon sensible they were to expect no quarter after this treaty, and, therefore, those who knew themselves most obnoxious, retired into their own country in time, and among the rest Rodbert, archbishop of Canterbury; but so riotous and outrageous was their behaviour, while making their way out of the kingdom, as sufficiently evinced the truth of the accusations which Godwin and his party had so repeatedly brought against them.

Soon after, a great council was convened, in which Godwin was brought to a formal trial for the supposed murder of Alfred, the king's brother; Edward having made it an absolute preliminary in the treaty of accommodation, that Godwin should submit to this trial, to which the earl had willingly consented, and given hostages for his appearance to Edward, who sent them over to William duke of Normandy, to be kept in his custody.

Accordingly, the day of trial being come, the earl was acquitted, on paying a fine to the king, and doing him homage and fealty anew, and reinstated in his fortunes and power with double lustre†. His family and sons were restored to their possessions,

* This nobleman was nephew to the king, being son to Goda, sister of Edward, and the earl of Maine.

† The account which Guthrie gives of this trial, from Brompton, is so curious in itself, and sets the affair in so different possessions, all but Swein, who, out of remorse for the murder of Beorn, undertook a pilgrimage barefoot to Jerusalem, to purge him of that crime, and on his return died by the way. Stigand, bishop of Winchester, a fast friend of Godwin, was promoted to the see of Canterbury, in the room of Rodbert the Norman, who was in this same council declared an exile and an outlaw, as were also many others of the Normans, who had been in the highest favour about court.

The Norman writers have, almost to a man, aspersed the memory of Godwin with the most odious epithets of imperious and tyrannical, ascribing the driving of their countrymen out of the kingdom to the implacable hatred and ambition of the earl, who could not bear, say they, that any but himself should have access to the throne, being determined to keep his sovereign in a painful dependence upon him and his creatures: but the modern reader will clearly perceive that these are only the expressions of flattering writers after the Norman conquest, who were resolved to pay their court to William even at the expence of truth; and that in procuring the banishment of these foreigners, Godwin acted in direct consistency with the former part of his conduct and that love he had always professed for the English, whom he knew to be supplanted in the royal favour by the Normans. Be this as it will, the earl did not long enjoy this renewal of his power and authority, for this very year, 1053, the court being at Windsor, or, according to others, at Winchester, where Edward was celebrating the festival of Easter. the earl, who was sitting at the same table with the king, was suddenly struck with so violent a disorder that he fell from his seat, and being taken up by his three sons, Harold, Tofti, and Gyrth, was by them carried into the king's apartment; but growing worse and worse, he died on the fifth day afterwards. But we find this great man's death ascribed to the effect of divine vengeance by the Norman monks, among whom the abbot of Beverley* is the foremost; but as he is an author who has a greater character for being florid than exact, and as Eadmer, Hemingford, and the Saxon Chronicles do not mention his death as considered in an uncommon light, we may safely conclude the monkish accounts to be founded in calumny, and inspired by malice. Stowe, from a manuscript in his possession, informs us, more probably, that his death, though sudden, was not attended with such violent circumstances as have been falsely related, since ferent a light from all our modern English historians, that the reader will certainly not be displeased at finding it in a note, together with the just reasonings of the above-cited author on the proceedings at this trial, which is one of the most famous facts in the Anglo-Saxon history.

"We are told, then, that the king having convened an assembly of his states, as soon as Godwin appeared in it, accused him of his brother's death in the following terms: "Thou traitor, Godwin, I impeach thee of my brother Alfred's murder, whom you yourself slew." Godwin's reply was, "Most gracious sovereign, with all due respect to your majesty's peace and dominion, I never did betray nor kill your brother; and I put myself upon trial as to this impeachment before your court." The king then spoke to this effect: "My well beloved lords, earls, and barons, here assembled, and who have heard my impeachment, and earl Godwin's answer, I will that you award judgment, and do strict justice upon this impeachment." Upon this a strong debate happened in the assembly, and variety of sentiments were urged. It was said in Godwin's vindication, that at the time of the murder (for so Brompton's words are to be understood) the earl was no subject of the king, and that he had not with his own hands committed the murder. But those of the opposite party urged the earl's late rebellion as a proof of guilt, and were desirous of making use of the one charge as the most proper way to punish him for the other. I can by no means be of opinion here with some authors, who contend, from the words of Brompton, that no allegiance was due to the kings of England by birth, nor until a man had actually performed homage, or sworn fealty to the king. This seems to be contrary to the strongest evidence of our history and constitution. But, be this as it will, it was very warmly urged by Godwin's enemies, that no earl, baron, or other subject of the king, could by law wage battle against him in his appeal; but ought, upon the whole matter, to submit himself to the king's mercy, and offer him reasonable amends.

"This opinion seems to have carried it; for we are told, that when the question was put, Leofric, as being the most respected in the assembly, delivered his sentiments in the following manner:

"Earl Godwin, said he, must be admitted, next to the king, to be the person of the highest quality in England, and he cannot deny that he had a hand in advising the murder of prince Alfred, his majesty's brother: my opinion therefore is, that he himself, his sons, and twelve of us earls, who are all of us his friends and kinsmen, shall humbly come before the king, each laden with as much gold and silver as he can carry between his arms, and offer the same for his offence, and most humbly supplicate his pardon, beseeching him to lay aside all ill-will, rancour, and malice against the said earl, and peaceably restore him to his lands, after taking his homage and fealty." This award, which was probably before concerted between all parties, took place; the procession instantly set out, and Edward accepted, with seeming acquiescence, of the atonement.

"Many are the remarks which historians have made on this event. What is of real importance to us, is to remark the great authority of a meeting of the states in those days, and that it extended to causes which lay personally between the king and his subjects; that commutation in cases of murder was even at this time admitted, though of the highest nature; that Godwin was tried by his peers, but that the king in his own realm, had no peer. This last maxim is implied by an expression of the historian, which, if not considered properly, may be wrested to very bad purposes; for, in giving an account of the debates upon this question, it is said, "that no earl, baron, nor any subject of the king, can by law wage battle against him in his appeal." But this is far, as has been generally ignorantly or perversely urged, from taking away the lawfulness of all civil resistance. By the term battle here cited, is only meant the single combat, by which every man in those days had it in his power to convict his adversary, and clear himself: and it was then undoubtedly a maxim in the government, that the king of England had no peer, and therefore was not obliged to answer any challenge of that kind. This passage has I know, never been considered in this light; but to consider it in any other, is giving up the principles of civil liberty, the common sense of our ancestors, and the genius of this constitution." Guth. Hist. Engl. vol. i. p. 303, 304.

By this account it appears, that earl Godwin was so far from being acquitted of the murder of Alfred, as Smollett, Carte, Rapin, and Rider have it, that he was found guilty by his peers, by his nearest relations, and by his own tacit acknowledgement, and that he saved his life only by commuting for his crime.

* This writer relates the manner of his death as follows: As Godwin was sitting at table with the king, the cup-bearer in his hurry made a trip with one foot, but recovered himself with the other. Several who were present making themselves merry on this incident, observed that one foot came luckily to the assistance of the other; and the earl, to increase their mirth, added, "So brother should assist brother, when either stands in need." Edward, turning to the earl as soon as the words were out of his mouth, replied, "So might my brother have helped me, if Godwin had not interposed." The earl being surprised and abashed with this sudden retort, was very much dejected, and with a countenance that discovered deep sorrow, addressed the king to the following effect: "I know your majesty is persuaded that I am the author of his death, and that you still give credit to those who asperse me, as a traitor both to him and to yourself; but God, who knows the secrets of hearts, shall judge: if I am guiltless, I beg that he would suffer me to swallow this morsel unhurt; but if it should stick by the way, you need no further proof of my guilt." Having said this, he endeavoured to get the morsel down, but it stuck in the passage, and by his continued efforts to swallow it, stopped up the avenues of life, and choked him.

he adds, "that it was the sorrow of the nation, who bewailed him as a father and a support."

Thus fell the greatest subject England ever saw, and one of the greatest men she ever produced, had his virtues been equal to his abilities; but he was of an ambitious and turbulent spirit, and not over-conscientious when the interests of himself or family were in view. However, his great love for his country, and his aversion to foreigners, have occasioned his character to be handed down to us with blacker circumstances than it appears to have deserved. The death of a nobleman of such extensive power might have occasioned a change in the administration, productive of danger; but the earl's influence descended almost entire to his family. His eldest son, Harold, succeeded to all his titles, possessions, and authority, unimpaired, and at the same time held the office of steward of the household*, with the governments of Kent, Suffex, and the West Saxons; but was obliged to resign his own government of Essex to Elfgar, the son of earl Leofric. Harold as yet lay under no imputation of any of those crimes of which his father had been accused; besides, he was more humane, polite, and insinuating; and, on all occasions, behaved with so much respect to Edward, that he soon got into his good graces: not but that Edward put on a face rather foreign to his heart, for though he might not bear so great a hatred to Harold as he had done to his father, yet he was to the full as jealous of him; and indeed with great reason, for Harold, whose abilities were no ways inferior to those of Godwin, had, by the additional charms of his obliging and courteous behaviour, firmly gained over to his interest both the nobles and the people; whereas the natural haughtiness and reserve of Godwin's disposition had often times lost him many friends. In a word, Harold, though he seemed to obey the king in the most submissive manner, commanded him; whereas Godwin, though he endeavoured to command the king, was obliged to obey him.

The year 1054 is noted for the quarrel that Edward had with Macbeth king of Scotland, who had murdered his lawful sovereign, Duncan, by whom he had been loaded with favours, and had usurped the crown. The bloody tyrant, not content with this, now wanted to destroy that prince's son, Malcolm Canmore, who possessed Cumberland as eldest son and heir-apparent of the king of Scotland. Malcolm hereupon repaired to the English court, to supplicate Edward for assistance; and, notwithstanding the aversion which nature had implanted in the mind of the latter to every thing that had the appearance of war, he thought his honour was too deeply concerned in the support of the injured prince, to refuse him the required aid; and at the same time was not displeased to have an opportunity of shewing his kindness, where it would appear so conspicuous. He therefore sent him back with an army of ten thousand men, headed by that gallant and warlike nobleman Siward earl of Northumberland; who being joined by Macduff, the thane of Fife, a nobleman not more distinguished by his rank and his virtues than for his loyalty to the blood of Fergus, they marched against the usurper, who gave them battle †, and was defeated after a most bloody contest, in which great numbers perished on both sides. Macbeth, after this action, retired to the Highlands, where he was deserted by his subjects, and at last taken and slain. Upon his death, Malcolm, the rightful heir to the crown, ascended the throne of his ancestors without further opposition.

About this time, we are told, that Rice, the brother, or son, of Griffith, prince of South Wales, having taken up arms against the English, entered their territories in an hostile manner, and committed several depredations, was routed by the king's forces, and himself taken prisoner, and sent up to Edward, who ordered him to be put to death, agreeable to a standing law at that time, which made it a capital offence for a Welshman to pass Offa's Dyke without licence.

The next year (A. D. 1055), after his successful expedition against the Scottish usurper, died earl Siward, of a bloody flux. Finding his end approaching, he ordered his armour-bearer to put him on his complete suit of armour; then causing himself to be supported on his feet, and taking his sword in his hand, "Thus (said he) should every soldier die." So saying, he breathed his last in the arms of those who supported him ‡.

Waltheof, his only surviving son, being too young to rule the Northumbrian territories, the government of that extensive province was entrusted to the care of Tosti, brother to Harold, who thereby acquired a very great accession of power and interest in the kingdom; and in the ensuing year a transaction happened, which strengthened it still more.

Elfgar, son to the great and wise nobleman Leofric, earl of Mercia (the only survivor of that powerful triumvirate which had restored and supported the blood of Cerdic on the throne), was accused, before an assembly of the states, of treasonable practices; but the particulars of this charge have not been handed down to us ||. One or two of our favourite modern historians have, indeed, upon the credit of Ingulphus, Malmesbury, and other Norman writers, roundly asserted, that this accusation was brought about by the underhand practices of Harold, who bore Elfgar an ill-will on account of having been obliged to cede to him the government of Essex: but Harold's subsequent conduct in respect to this discontented lord, sufficiently evinces the malice or ignorance of those writers, who indiscriminately bespatter the names and characters of all such who shewed themselves strenuous assertors of the liberty and independence of the people of England, which was swallowed up

* Major aulæ regie, or, as termed in France, Maire du palais.

† Archbishop Spotiswood tells us, that Macbeth, upon receiving advice of the strong army marching against him, was seized with great dread; and the arrival of the murdered king's son and the beloved Macduff was no sooner known among the common soldiers, than they deserted in great numbers, so that the tyrant seeing himself abandoned, and not knowing what to do, shut himself up at first in the castle of Dunfinane, a fort that he had lately built. The loyal army marching thither, no sooner came in sight, than Macbeth, struck with a fresh panic, abandoned the fort, and thought to have saved himself on horseback; but being pursued by some of Malcolm's friends, he was taken and killed.

‡ This heroic behaviour is of a piece with the noble manner in which he took the news of his son Osbern's death, who was slain in the battle against Macbeth. Hearing that he was killed, "Whereabouts are his wounds?" demanded he; being answered that they were all before, "Haste then, and bring him to me (he said), that I may give him a soldier's burial, as he hath deserved."

in the success of the Norman usurper. But to return: Elfgar being prosecuted for practices against the state, was, through the prevailing faction of his enemies, found guilty in the assembly of the states, and sentenced to banishment: a sentence which filled the mind of every unprejudiced Englishman with sorrow and resentment.

In this extremity Elfgar availed himself of a maxim, which unhappily has been adopted by too many great men, which is, that exile absolves from allegiance. Full of this false sentiment, he passed over into Ireland, where he soon got together eighteen ships, and landing in Wales, made a tender to Griffith, prince of that country, and together they concerted a plan for invading the English territories. Nor were they long before they put it into execution, for in the spring of the next year, 1056, they marched into Herefordshire, laying the whole country waste as they proceeded. Rodolph of Maine, the king's nephew, being acquainted with their inroad, got together a body of men in haste, and went to give them battle; but for want of either courage or abilities, he lost the day, and taking to flight with a company of French and Normans, who had followed him into the field, he left the brave English exposed to the fury of the enemy, who mowed down whole ranks, till tired with slaughter they were constrained to sheathe their swords. Immediately after this easy victory, they marched to the city of Hereford, which they entered, killed seven canons who guarded the door of the church, and burnt the monastery of St. Ethelbert together with the city, and put most of the inhabitants to the sword; after which they retired with a great booty.

Edward, immediately upon the news of these outrages, ordered earl Harold to take the field against the invaders, and, if possible, reduce them to obedience. That nobleman accordingly set out upon his march, and did not stop till he had penetrated as far as Snowdon, in Caermarthenshire, in South Wales, but found it impracticable to force the enemy to a battle, or to make any further progress with his army. This state of inaction gave both parties time to reflect on their true interests; they soon grew weary of the war, and Harold, who was of an open generous disposition, and mindful of the obligations he had lain under to Elfgar, readily closed with that nobleman's first proposal of peace, and even made use of all his interest to obtain a pardon for him, and got him at length restored to his estate and honours: a noble instance of generosity, which at that time gained Harold the esteem of all his contemporaries, and is a sufficient contradiction to the report of his having privately endeavoured to ruin the son of Leofric.

There is some reason to believe that Griffith, prince of Wales, was not included in this pacification; for the next year, 1057, we find him renewing his hostilities again, and become so formidable, that Edward, by the advice of old earl Leofric and Harold, granted him a safe and honourable peace.

On the third of August, A.D. 1057, that wise and good nobleman, Leofric earl of Mercia, celebrated for his probity, justice, and piety, irreproachable in all his conduct, ever faithful to his king, and universally beloved and esteemed by all degrees of people, departed this life, and left the nation in deep sorrow for so great a loss. He was succeeded in his government of Mercia by his son Elfgar.

About this time, Edward finding himself growing infirm with age; that the great men, upon whose fidelity and counsels he could best depend, were daily dropping off; and, above all, dreading lest a descendant of the hated family of Godwin should mount the throne after his death, resolved to defeat all such views; and in order, at the same time, to procure an active friend for himself, sent Aldred, bishop of Worcester, his favourite, to Hungary, for his nephew Edward, son of Edmund Ironside, then about forty years old, who came over accordingly, with his son Edgar Atheling*. The arrival of this prince, the son of a king whose memory was so dear to the nation, awakened in the English all their love and veneration to the race of Cerdic, and therefore, without hesitation, they acknowledged him as heir-apparent to the crown; their esteem for Harold giving place to their affection for the royal family.

As to Harold, notwithstanding that the arrival of this prince bid fair to disconcert all those schemes by which he proposed to secure the crown of England to himself after the death of the Confessor, yet he did not dare to manifest the least resentment at this measure of the king's, which was both prudent and well-timed, as such a behaviour might have forfeited his credit with the people, and given Edward a plausible pretext for pushing his ruin. However, he was soon eased of half his pain, and the joy of the English quickly damped, by the death of Edward the Outlaw, which happened a few days after his arrival at London. Edgar Atheling, the only son of the deceased prince, and the last male of the Saxon royal line, was young, unexperienced, inactive, weak, and in all respects unable to bear the weight of a crown, as well as unfit to struggle for it with so powerful a competitor as Harold; and even had Edward declared him his heir upon the death of his father, Harold had the fairest chance of governing as regent during the minority, in case the king did not long survive, which his years and infirm state of health seemed to render doubtful.

A. D. 1058, earl Harold took his famous and fatal voyage to Normandy. Our historians are greatly divided, not only with regard to the views, but to the manner and circumstances of this voyage; some ascribing it to mere casualty, others saying it was undertaken from a premeditated design. William of Malmesbury tells us, that Harold being at his house in Bosenharn, in Suffex, near the sea-side, he, for his recreation, with some of his retinue, took a fishing-boat, in order to row up and down at a small distance from the land; but running out a little farther to sea than they were aware, a storm suddenly rose and forced them across the channel to the French coast, where (glad to be safe at any rate) they landed in the territories of the earl of Ponthieu. The inhabitants of that coast, according to their custom, and that barbarous practice which, to the shame of humanity, still subsists in many parts of our own sea-coasts, to make a prey of the distressed and shipwrecked, fell upon them, and, being many and well armed, soon compelled earl Harold and his followers, who were not provided with weapons, to surrender themselves; when they were all cast into prison and loaded with chains, on pretence that they were come over as spies.

In this situation of affairs, Harold cast about within himself what was best to be done, when, after some deliberation, he hired a messenger to go to duke William, and acquaint him, "that he (Harold) had been sent over by the king of England, formally to confirm certain matters of deep import to the duke, which he had hitherto only received by distant hints from envoys of inferior note; but that he was kept prisoner by the command of Guy earl of Ponthieu, and thereby prevented from discharging his embassy; representing, at the same time, that William's honour and character were concerned in not suffering such a breach of the laws of hospitality, and so great an insult on his own authority as sovereign of the country, to go unpunished;" and concluded with appealing to him for justice, saying, "that if it was required of him, to purchase his liberty, and that of his followers, with money, he was ready to pay the same to duke William; but never would submit to do it to a person inferior to himself, as was earl Guy." Hereupon duke William instantly gave orders for setting Harold at liberty, who repaired to the duke's court; where being honourably received, and by the duke invited to accompany him on an expedition he was then about to make into Brittany, he so far ingratiated himself into the Norman's favour, by his wit, courage, and insinuating address, that the latter shewed him every distinguishing mark of friendship; and Harold, not to be behindhand with so generous a patron and protector, promised him by oath, that in case king Edward died, he would deliver up to him the castle of Dover, which was then under his command, and use all his influence to procure him the crown of England. Duke William, confiding in the earl's protestations, and to endear himself and cause the more to his care, betrothed to him his daughter, then too young for marriage; and the affair of the succession being thus concluded between them, Harold was sent home, loaded with rich presents.

This is the account given by William of Malmesbury*, and the most authentic of our old English historians. Smollett†, who follows Rapin and the authority of Brompton (who, as he is single in many things, so he is in this), says that this voyage was voluntary, and undertaken in order to release his brother Ulnoth and his nephew Hacune, who had been delivered as hostages for his father Godwin's good behaviour, and sent into Normandy‡; and that while he was at William's court, that prince gave him to understand that he had designs upon the English crown, and that a private contract had been made between Edward and him, when he was last in England: the earl, who had never suspected any collusion between the king and the duke, and being at that time in the power of the latter, thought it most adviseable to dissemble his own sentiments and views, promised to contribute his interest in behalf of William, demanded his daughter in marriage as a proof of his attachment, and confirmed his promises by an oath in the presence of the states of Normandy. Wace§, William Pict-venfis§, and Carte¶ tell us, that Harold was sent ambassador, to carry the account to William, that Edward had appointed him his successor. Amidst this contrariety of sentiments the reader might be perplexed to fix his choice, if, as Tyrrel justly observes, "it was not easily to be perceived, that the two last accounts were forged by the later monks; and that they would not have been omitted by William of Malmesbury if he had known any of them, or thought them to have been true."

Much about the time of Harold's setting out on this voyage, Elfgar, the son of earl Leofric, who succeeded to all his father's great possessions, fell again under the king's displeasure, and was banished the kingdom the year after his father's decease. Under these circumstances he had again recourse to his former friend and ally Griffith, who lent him a considerable body of forces; and having also found means to procure a large fleet from the Norwegians, he appeared on the Kentish coasts, in a condition to effect a formidable invasion; the dread of which, together with earl Harold's absence, the only general Edward thought capable of opposing so powerful an enemy, induced that faint-hearted prince to comply with the proposals of Elfgar, whose attainder he took off, and once more restored him to his estate and government, on condition that he should send home all his forces at his own expence. Elfgar did not long survive this extorted restoration, but dying, left all his great possessions to his sons Morcar and Edwin.

Edward, having thus got rid of this dangerous subject, resolved to take vengeance on those who had abetted and assisted him in his late insult on the royal prerogative, turned his arms against Griffith prince of Wales; and Harold being now returned†, that nobleman was sent with a strong body of horse, with orders, if possible, to surprize him: but Griffith being informed of the earl's design, fled with precipitation, and abandoned the ships which he had just fitted out in order to renew his invasions; these fell into Harold's hands, who, after having seen them all burnt, returned to England. In a very short space of time, however, Edward again sent a formidable army to invade the Welsh territories, both by sea and land. In this expedition Harold acted as admiral of the naval forces, while his brother Tosti commanded as general of the army which was to make the attack by land. This powerful invasion so terrified the Welsh, that, losing all sentiments of honour and loyalty in their fears, they basely gave up the cause of their prince and country, and made their peace with Harold on the infamous conditions of delivering Griffith into his hand; which was accordingly done, and that unfortunate prince underwent the same fate with his brother Rice††, being put to death, and his head sent to the king at Gloucester. Edward's vengeance being satiated with the fall of this powerful enemy, granted that kingdom to Blethyn and Rithwallen, the two surviving brothers of Griffith, who ruled in conjunction, after having taken the oath of allegiance and tribute to Harold, in behalf of the king*.

Though Tosti, the brother of Harold, had acquired great honour by his military skill and prowess, in the conduct of this expedition, and had thereby rendered himself very popular, yet that ambition and restless disposition which seems to have been the characteristic of the Godwin family, prompted him, on several occasions, to behave so tyrannically and oppressively to the Northumbrians, who were immediately under his government, that, unable longer to support their miseries with patience, they had recourse to arms, preferring the prospect of death to certain want and slavery.

Having, at the same time a quarrel with one Gospatrick, a man of great interest in Northumberland, he found means to get him murdered, and afterwards endeavoured to charge the odium of his death upon his sister Editha. Not content with this, he, under the specious mask of friendship, got into his power two of Gospatrick's friends, Gammel and Wlf the son of Dulfín, whom he inhumanly put to death in his own palace. These complicated acts of perfidy and bloodshed put the finishing hand to what his pride and insolence had begun; and three or four of the principal noblemen† of the country, at the head of four hundred men, seized upon the city of York, made themselves masters of all Tosti's treasures, which were there deposited, put to death two hundred of his friends and followers, and then sent a deputation to Morcar, son of the deceased earl Elfgar, inviting him to take upon him the government of the Northumbrians, who were now determined to throw off all subjection to a person who had rendered himself so odious to them, by his male-administration. In this they were joined by the inhabitants of Nottingham, Derby, and Lincolnshire. Hereupon Tosti appealed to the king, under whom he immediately held his government; and a conference was appointed to be held at Northampton, while earl Harold was ordered to march with a strong body of men, in hopes of over-awing the malecontents: but when the conference came to be opened, these people, who were warmed with the noble spirit of liberty, and not actuated by principles of ambition or rebellion, represented their motives for taking up arms, and their resolution not to lay them down till they had procured redress, in such persuasive terms, that Harold, perceiving their resentment against his brother to be entirely owing to his own bad conduct, gave a noble instance of his moderation and justice by drawing off his forces, and consenting to their election of Morcar in his room; and making a report to the king much in favour of the complainants. Tosti, finding himself thus deserted by his brother, proceeded to such acts of revenge and cruelty against those of the Northumbrians who were yet in his power, that Edward found himself under the necessity of banishing him the kingdom; whereupon he retired to earl Baldwin, in Flanders, whose daughter Judith he had married.

About this time, Malcolm king of the Scots, taking advantage of the disturbances in Northumberland, invaded that country, which he ravaged in a merciless manner, directly contrary to the faith of the treaty subsisting between him and the English, who had so lately assisted him in recovering his crown out of the hands of the usurper Macbeth; unless we are to suppose that Tosti's ambition had led him to be the aggressor, by first committing outrages upon the Scotch territories, which lay contiguous to his own, and which, indeed, does not seem improbable, when we consider the general tenour of this turbulent man's conduct, boundless in his avarice and rapaciousness, and unrestrained by any good quality to keep him from running into the most enormous excesses to gratify his passions and resentment, which fell upon all the world without distinction‡.

The disgrace of Tosti was a great addition to the interest of Harold, who not only became the idol of the people from this last instance of integrity, but also reinforced his credit by his alliance with Morcar earl of Northumberland, and Edwin earl of Mercia, whose sister Elgitha he married; so that these two counties, together with his own earldom of Wessex, being secured in his family, his influence and power extended over the whole kingdom.

While Harold, thus daily growing in power and influence, was busied in every act that he thought most likely to secure him the succession after Edward's death (for as to his compact with William of Normandy, as that had been forced from him by the exigency of his situation, he no longer thought of performing it), that priest-ridden prince was wholly taken up in consecrating the cathedral of Westminster||: and that this ceremony might be performed in the most solemn manner, he convoked a general assembly of the states at London, towards the close of the year 1065, in order to confirm his charter of endowment of the said foundation.

At this council were present the queen Editha, with all the lords both spiritual and temporal. The charter, after the recital of the pope's bull, contains this clause: "The king, for the expiation of his own vow, and also for the souls of the kings his predecessors, as well as successors, had granted to that place (viz. Westminster) all manner of liberty, as far as earthly power could reach, and that for the love of God, by whose mercy he was placed in the royal throne; and now by the counsel and decree of the archbishops, bishops, earls, and other of his great men, and for the be-

* It appears from several historians, that these two brothers of Griffith had served under Harold against him, and thereby got possession of the throne of Wales, upon his death, on the terms abovementioned.

† The names of these noblemen were Gammelbearne (i. e. the son of Gammel), Dimestan the son of Ægelnoth, and Glaincorn the son of Eardulph.

‡ Among other instances of the brutal temper of Tosti, the following in particular proves him to have been a monster of barbarity: he had always hated his brother Harold, but the conduct of that nobleman in this last affair had exasperated him to such a degree, that he seized some of his domestics, whom he ordered to be cut in pieces, salted, barrellled, and sent as a present to their master. Flor. Wigorn. Chron. Sax.

|| Edward had made a vow (agreeable to the spirit of those times) to go on a pilgrimage to Rome; but as he afterwards found it inconvenient, as well as disagreeable to his subjects, to leave the kingdom, or, what was still more likely, was fearful of leaving behind him such a subject as Harold, who might take advantage of his absence to supplant him in his throne, he therefore obtained a dispensation from the pope, absolving him from this obligation: but he thought he could not employ the money he had raised for his journey, to a better purpose than that of building the monastery and cathedral of Westminster, which he erected in the place where an old church had stood, that was founded by Sebert, king of the East Saxons, or rather converted into a Christian church, from a temple in which the old Saxons had worshipped Apollo.

nefit and advantage of the said church, and all those that should belong to it, he had granted these privileges following, not only in present but for future times." Then follows an exemption from all episcopal jurisdiction; as also another clause, whereby he grants it "the privilege of sanctuary, so that any one, of whatsoever condition he be, for whatsoever cause, that shall fly unto that holy place, or the precincts thereof, shall be free, and shall obtain full liberty." And at last concludes thus: "I have commanded this charter to be written and sealed, and have also signed it with my hand with the sign of the cross; and have ordered fit witnesses to subscribe it, for its greater corroboration." Then immediately follows the king's subscription, in these words, "Ego Edwardus, Deo largiente, Anglorum rex, signum venerandæ crucis impressi." Then follows the subscription of queen Editha, with those of the two archbishops, seven of the bishops, and as many of the abbots; after which come on the subscriptions of the laity, viz. of Raynald the chancellor, and of the earls Harold and Edwin, who write themselves dukes; and six thanes, besides others of inferior order.

Then follows a third charter of the same nature with the former, containing Edward's letter to pope Nicholas, with the bull of the latter, reciting the privileges granted to the church, the subscriptions being much in the same order as the former, only one Osbold and another of the king's chaplains subscribe before the lay nobility; and, besides the thanes, several subscribe under the denomination of milites.

This was the last act of Edward's life, for he was taken very ill before the breaking up of the council. This illness was probably occasioned by the great fatigue he had undergone in the prosecution of this affair; for we find that he was seized with a violent fever, attended with ravings. However, his disorder, dangerous as it was, could not call off his thoughts from his favourite object. Finding the time of his dissolution approaching, his principal care was to finish the ceremony on account whereof the assembly had been convened, and growing a little better after his first attack, he ordered every thing to be got ready for the consecration of the church, at which he assisted, with all the great men of his kingdom, both spiritual and temporal: but his malady increasing, the next day he was forced to take to his bed, from whence he never more arose with life, but expired on Thursday, January 5, the eve of the Epiphany, A. D. 1066, in the twenty-fourth year of his reign. His body was, by his own appointment, buried in his newly-consecrated church of St. Peter, Westminster.

Thus died Edward, surnamed the Confessor, on account of his reputed holiness: how far he merited that title will best appear from the history of his actions. The monks, indeed, ever fast friends to all those who connive at or encourage their indolent and rapacious disposition, and who reaped great advantages from this king's liberal bigotry, have not been satisfied with extolling those few virtues which he really possessed, to the skies, but have even canonized his very faults, and endeavoured to impose them on the world as so many proofs of his piety; witness Ailred, his historian, or rather panegyrist, who with great solemnity assures us, that he married Editha, the daughter of earl Godwin, purely to exercise his virtue by continual temptation. But his treatment of that lady, as soon as ever he was in a condition to exert his power over her, sufficiently shews what credit ought to be given to this legend. Nevertheless, for this and other his reputed virtues, he was canonized by pope Alexander III. about two hundred years after his death, by the name of Edward the Confessor. Pope Innocent IV. afterwards granted a bull to fix the anniversary and order the solemnity of the festival, which was on the fifth of January, the day of his decease.

Amongst other supernatural qualifications, which entitled him to a rank among the saints, was the special privilege which he is said to have received from heaven, of curing by touch the scrophulous malady from him called the king's evil; a privilege which some affirm to have descended upon the kings of England his successors. How far this gift was real or imaginary, I leave to the reflection of every person of enlightened understanding, who need not be told that surprising effects have been produced by the effluvia of bodies of a certain constitution upon the human frame, without any supernatural intervention; I shall, therefore, only observe, that it was not peculiar to the kings of England, since the kings of France have claimed the same privilege ever since the time of Clovis, the first Christian prince of that kingdom.

No unprejudiced person can forbear smiling when he finds our countryman Carte labouring so seriously to establish the truth of this legendary fable by numerous quotations, and arguments no less ingenious than sophistical: however, as some of our readers may be desirous of hearing all that is to be said on both sides of the subject, we have therefore ventured to transcribe his sentiments, such as we find them in p. 358. vol. i. of his History of England: the words printed in Italic may serve as indices to point out what this author immediately drives at.

"It was to the hereditary right in the royal line (says Mr. Carte) that people, in Malmesbury's days, ascribed the supernatural virtue of our kings in curing scirrhus tumours, called the king's evil; though this author is willing to impute it to the singular piety of Edward, there is no proof of any of our kings touching for that distemper more ancient than this king, of whom Ailred, as well as Malmesbury, observes that he cured a young married woman, reduced by it to a deplorable condition, by stroking the place affected with his hand, upon which she grew sensibly better, the tumour dispersed, the scar wore off, and in a week's time the cure was perfected. There are no accounts of the four first kings of Norman or foreign race ever attempting to cure that complaint; but that Henry II. both touched those afflicted with it, and cured them, is attested by Peter Blesensis, who had been his chaplain. Bradwardin, archbishop of Canterbury under Richard II. the lord Fortescue, and other grave authors, give the like testimony in behalf of the cure of, as well as practice by that prince's successors; besides a great number of evidences that might be drawn from records, many of which are printed by Tucker, having been communicated to him by the late Garter, the learned Mr. Anstis. There is a particular religious office used at the time of touching, not disagreeable to the simplicity of the Saxon times; in the ceremonial whereof, the king, at the reading of the first gospel, gently draws both his hands over the sore, much after the manner used by Edward. All our English kings have continued to use this rite to this day [our author asserts this in the year 1747.] And the French, from the time of St. Louis, if not of Philip Auguste, have imitated them in it, with the like salutary effect. Some of the French writers ascribe this gift of healing to their kings' devotion towards the relics of St. Marculph, in the church of Corbigny, in Champagne, to which the kings of France, immediately after their coronation at Rheims, used to go in solemn procession: and it must be owned there was formerly a veneration paid to this saint in England. It was in memory of him that a room in the palace of Westminster, frequently mentioned in the Rolls of Parliament at the time of its assembling, was called the Chamber of St. Marculph; being probably the place where our kings used to touch for the evil; it is now called the Painted Chamber. And though the name of that saint has been long forgot in this nation, yet the sanative virtue of our kings still continues. Nor is it confined to them alone; for though Fortescue (at the time of whose writing there had been no sovereign hereditary queen crowned in this realm) imagined it was not communicated to queens, because they were not anointed in the hands; the contrary hath been since proved by abundant experience. Tucker relates a remarkable instance, in the cure of a Roman catholic; who being put into prison, perhaps for recusancy, and terribly afflicted with the king's evil, was, after he had been there for a tedious time at vast expence to physicians, without the least relief, touched by queen Elizabeth, and perfectly cured. This gave him occasion to say, he was now convinced by undoubted experience, that the pope's excommunication of that queen signified nothing, since she still continued blessed with so miraculous a quality." In order to obviate an objection which might be made to this prolix account, our author adds, in a note, "that the cure cannot be imputed to the strength of imagination, is evident from the numbers of children that have been so cured. Dr. Heylin, an eye-witness of such cures, says, "I have seen some children brought before the king (Charles I.) by the hanging-sleeves, some hanging on their mothers' breasts, and others in the arms of their nurses, all cured without the help of a serviceable imagination."

There are some few anecdotes of Edward's private life handed down to us, as instances of his affability and good-nature, amongst which are the two following, that have been invariably related by all the writers of his history.

One day, as he was reposing himself on his bed, with the curtains drawn round, a page of his chamber came into the room, in order to do some menial offices, not knowing the king was there; and a coffer being left open, in which was money to a considerable amount, the youth, thinking himself secure from all detection, filled his pockets with the specie, and retired; Edward, who saw him all the while through the curtains, not giving him the least disturbance. In a very few moments the thief returned again, and fell to work as before; when the king, displeased at this repetition of his boldness, called out to him, "You young rogue, you had best be contented with what you have gotten, for should lord Hugolin* come and catch you, he will not only cause you to be soundly whipped, but also take away the booty you have already made." The boy, half dead with fear, instantly disappeared, and Hugolin coming in presently after, and finding that some of the bags were missing, flew into a violent passion, and uttered threats of the severest punishment on the felon, if he could discover him: but Edward, with great good-nature, endeavoured to pacify him, "For the poor knave (said he) who has the money, wants it more than we do."

As another instance of his placability and patience under injury, we are told, that being one day a hunting (a diversion of which he was particularly fond) and having the chace in full view, a country fellow crossed the road, and so affrighted the king's horse that he had well near thrown his rider, and utterly spoiled the sport; but Edward recovering himself, rode up to the rustic in seeming great wrath as if he was going to beat him, and saying, "By the Mother of God, I would be even with you if I could," left him.

Against these two trivial instances of mildness and placability of temper, we need only bring his treatment of his own wife and mother, and the deadly antipathy he shewed on all occasions to the family of Godwin, to whom he was indebted for his existence as a king.

As to his remission of the tax of Danegelt, which has been so much cried up as an instance of his equity and the paternal love he bore his subjects, we have but to look into Ingulphus to be fully satisfied concerning the cause of this popular concession. According to that writer, "Edward going into the treasury where this tax had been deposited, saw the devil dancing and skipping upon the bags of money (though, by the bye, no one could see the fiend but himself), this sight had such an effect upon the monarch, that he ordered all the money to be restored to the right owners, and the tax to be abolished." Now is it not evident to every sensible person, that Edward's imagination, which was strong in proportion as his intellects were weak, had been worked up to this height by the execrations of his subjects against the payment of Danegelt; and his fears co-operating with the superstitious turn of his mind, raised up this phantom to his idea?

In a word, we may, without incurring the censure of malevolence or partiality, but only from a fair retrospect of the actions of that prince's life, sum up his character in these few words: he was a bad husband, a bad son, an indolent king, a faithless friend, an inexorable enemy, a dupe to foreigners, and a sponge to the monks, who, for that and no other reasons, have honoured him with the title of a saint and a confessor.

As a legislator he stands in a more favourable point of light; for he made, or digested several excellent laws, which have been looked upon by all succeeding kings as the standard of their conduct and administration, and made one of the articles of the coronation-oath. These will be found in their proper place, at the end of the period under consideration.

* This is the same person whom we find thus described by Fleet: "Hugolinus nobilis, principalis sancti regis Edwardi cubicularius, semper Deo devotus, & predicto regi inter omnes hujus Romani proceres miles fidelissimus.—Hugolen, chief minister and chamberlain to St. Edward the king, a servant entirely devoted to God and his prince, and the most faithful knight among all the nobility of the court."

As to Edward's person, we have it thus described by a very old author†: "He was of a fair and ruddy complexion; well-shaped and handsome in his person; rather tall in stature, and, in his latter years, venerable for his long white beard. The dignity of his person added majesty to the royal robes, instead of receiving it from them; and were worn by him only for state, and not out of a love of grandeur. In his diet, no man was more abstemious: in his dress, no man more plain."

Edward was the last king of the race of Egbert, though not the last Saxon king, as some have affirmed, since his successor was of that nation. Had it not been for his absurd and preposterous vow of chastity, he must, in all probability, have left an heir to his crown and dominions, and thereby have prevented a revolution which reduced the English to the most abject state of slavery.

H A R O L D II. A. D. 1066.

EDWARD had been so taken up in the latter years of his life with the religious mummeries of the dedication of St. Peter's, Westminster, that he had neglected to nominate his successor: indeed, had the great men of the state paid any regard to equity, or the right of lineal descent, there could be no room for debate to know on whom the crown naturally devolved at Edward's decease: Edgar Atheling was the only surviving prince of the family of the ancient kings, and consequently the only one who had a just claim to the crown. However, Harold had taken his measures so well, that it was impossible for any but himself to be chosen. As to Edgar, he was a boy, and, as has been before observed, unable to contend with Harold, who was already, in effect, master of the kingdom. The English clergy were almost to a man on his side, and there was not left any nobleman of power and weight sufficient to take Edgar under his protection besides Edwin and Morcar, and they were too much linked in with Harold to be depended upon for opposing his measures. William of Normandy, who founded his title on a pretended will of Edward, was of a country to which the English had an implacable aversion, and they were ready to submit to any ruler, rather than fall under a foreign yoke.

Harold made the most of these circumstances for his own advantage; and to take away all opportunity of forming a contrary party or cabal, he caused the funeral obsequies of the deceased Edward to be performed the very next morning after his death, it being a custom in those days to defer the coronation of a new prince till his predecessor was interred. That business at an end, the assembly was convened for the choice of a person to fill the vacant throne, when the generality of suffrages went in favour of Harold, who was accordingly declared king, and anointed by Aldred, archbishop of York, Stigand of Canterbury being at that time indisposed. This hurry, so unusual in the beginning of reigns, shews Harold to have looked upon his right as very disputable. There is so strange a disagreement among the authors who have written the history of this period, concerning the manner in which Harold ascended the throne, that, in order to satisfy the curious reader, we shall add their different opinions in a note, to prevent him the trouble of turning over a number of books, some of them not easily to be met with, leaving him to his own reflection, without presuming to bias it by any opinion of our own*.

Harold having thus usurped the throne, under the appearance of a legal election, applied himself to gain the affections of the people by measures the very reverse of those he had formerly used; for as before his accession, and while in pursuit of a crown to which he had no title, he had stuck at nothing to gratify his ambition and thirst of power, he now put on all the appearance of humility, and to such a degree did he carry his dissimulation, that he affected on all occasions to treat the young Edgar Atheling with the greatest marks of respect and kindness, hinting at the same time that he took possession of the sovereign power merely for the sake of the infant prince, whose nonage rendered him unfit for the weight of government, and that he might possibly shift the diadem from his own brow to place it upon his, when years had ripened him into maturity for wearing it. He spared nothing to give him the most liberal education, as a person who was one day to rule over others; he loaded him with gifts and honours, and particularly cherished those whom he knew to be favourers of that prince's cause. By these and the like politic steps, and by seizing every opportunity of easing the people of their burthens, and righting them in all their just complaints, he established such a dominion over their minds, that he reigned the king of their choice, and bade defiance to any cabals that could be raised against his power and authority.

I am well aware that we may find a different character of him in Knyghton, and other Norman historians, who represent his administration as highly oppressive and tyrannical, and such as rendered him infinitely odious to the nation; but as we have no authorities to uphold this censure but those of interested and suspected writers, we cannot give them the degree of credit they seem to require.

The wise precautions Harold took to secure himself in the good opinion of his subjects appear to have been dictated by a politic foresight; for he was not only threatened with a descent by William duke of Normandy, to whom he had forfeited his promise, but was likewise exposed to the machinations of his own brother Tosti, who hated him mortally, and, either out of old resentments, or envy at his new dignity, or perhaps because on his acqui-† Gervasius Dorobornensis.

* Eadmer and Hoveden tell us, that Harold was nominated by Edward for his successor; and being, for that reason, elected by all the chief men of the kingdom, was the same day anointed.

Henry de Silgrave (an author who wrote in the time of Edward I. and whose history is now in manuscript in the Cottonian collection) relates, that Harold came to Edward, as he was lying on his death-bed, desiring him to appoint a successor: that he replied, he had already nominated duke William for his heir: but the earl and his friends still persisting in this request, the king, turning his face to the wall, replied, "When I am dead, let the English make either the duke, or the earl, king."

Malmesbury, who inclines to the Norman party, asserts, that Harold, finding a great disagreement among the nobles about the succession, seized the crown, placed it on his own head, and intimidated the assembly so, as to extort an oath of allegiance from them.

Huntingdon, without mentioning any thing of the election, informs us, that several of the English were inclined to favour the pretensions of Edgar Atheling.

And Ingulph, a cotemporary writer, who speaks with great caution, tells us, that Harold, wickedly forgetting the oath he had formerly made to duke William, intruded himself into the throne, and was solemnly crowned by Aldred, archbishop of York.

sition of the crown he had not given him the government of the West Saxons and their father's patrimonial estate, which he had claimed, left no means untried to disturb his government. Tosti was at this time in the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, father to his wife Judith, and to Matilda or Maud, duchess of Normandy; and presuming upon this affinity, as also being sensible of the pretensions which William had set up to the crown of England, went over to Rouen, on a visit to the duke, in order to persuade him to invade the territories of his brother Harold. William wanted very little incitement to the attempt; he had already resolved in his own mind to make the most powerful alliances he could against the usurper Harold, and for this purpose he had entered into a new league with the Norwegians, the ancient friends of the Normans, and had engaged Harold Harfager, the king of that country, to fall upon the Northumbrian territories, while he himself should make a descent upon the southern parts.

Things were in this train when Tosti arrived, and that discontented brother's presence served only to hasten the preparations which had been before concerted. However, till all the requisites for striking the important blow were ready, William prudently resolved to make Tosti his forlorn hope, and instrument of trying how the affections of the English stood in respect to their new king: he therefore furnished him with sixty sail of ships and a body of forces, with which he made a descent upon the isle of Wight, where he levied considerable contributions; and then retiring to his ships, he put to sea again, and scoured all the coast till he came to Sandwich.

Harold, upon the first advice of his brother's invasion, fitted out a strong squadron, and raised a large body of horse, in order to march against him in person, and punish his audaciousness; but Tosti, having been apprised of his motions, drew off with his fleet northwards, pillaging the coasts all the way he went: till at length Edwin, earl of Mercia, and Morcar, who had succeeded Tosti in the government of Northumberland, getting together a body of troops in haste, encountered the invader, and drove him, with a great slaughter of his men, back to his ships, several of which they burned, and the enterprising exile was obliged to fly for refuge into Scotland, with twelve of his ships, all that he had remaining of the fleet he had first brought with him. Here he endeavoured to engage Malcolm, king of Scots, in his interest; but that prince being then embroiled in a civil war with the descendants of Macbeth, could not be prevailed upon to join him; therefore Tosti's success in Scotland fell far short of his expectations.

Now William being determined to declare himself, sent a message to Harold, requiring him to relinquish to him that crown to which he was entitled, not only by the will which the late king had made in his favour, and which he pretended himself to be possessed of, but likewise by the agreement which Harold himself had entered into with him, at the time he released him from his imprisonment by Guy, earl of Ponthieu. To this demand, so peremptorily preferred, Harold returned as peremptory an answer, giving the duke to understand, that, in the first place, the supposed will of Edward, if any such there really was, made nothing for his claim, inasmuch as by the constitution of the kingdom no monarch of England could bequeath his dominions to any one without the consent of the states of the kingdom, much less to a foreigner; that the right of election of a sovereign to rule over them, was vested in the nobles and commons of the kingdom; that such election had been formally made in his (Harold's) favour, and therefore that he held the crown by the most authentic of all tenures, the united suffrages of the people. Secondly, that as to the pretended promise that he might have made to the duke, it was extorted from him while in a state of duress, and as such was null and void by the laws of all nations. And lastly, he concluded with declaring, that he was ever ready to maintain himself in possession of that sovereignty, to which the voices of the people, in full assembly, had raised him, against all those who should dare to contest his claim, so long as he had an arm to wield a sword, or a soldier that would fight under his banner. This spirited answer convinced William, that he had nothing to expect but from the successful issue of a war; for which both parties now made the most earnest preparations. Accordingly the duke applied to the neighbouring princes for succour, with the most alluring promises of reward, in case by their assistance he should be enabled to compass his end.

While each party was thus taken up in concerting the most suitable measures to effect and repel the intended attack, Harold Harfager, king of Norway, appeared on the coasts of England, with a fleet of three hundred sail; and being joined by Tosti, who, since his late defeat, had kept hovering on and off the northern part of the island, the two fleets sailed up the river Humber, where they landed their forces, and immediately marched forwards to lay siege to the city of York. This invasion was so sudden and unexpected, that the earls Edwin and Morcar, who were the governors of that country, had not time to levy a sufficient force to dispute their landing: however, knowing that something must be done in this critical situation, in order to check the enemy in their progress, till a stronger reinforcement could be sent from the southern parts of the kingdom, they got together a few troops from the adjacent countries, and advanced to oppose the invaders; but these troops consisting of raw undisciplined men, were quickly beaten, and the enemy proceeding onwards, sat down before the city of York, which soon fell a prey to them, where, we are told by some historians, they put the greatest part of the inhabitants to the sword.

Harold, on the first news of Harfager's descent, had put himself in march with a chosen body of veteran troops to oppose him, but could not come up time enough to prevent the fate of York. At length, however, the two armies met*, near Stamford-brigg, since called Battle-bridge†. This bridge was guarded by a party of Norwegians, who defending it with great bravery, were all cut to pieces, excepting one, who, with a valour almost incredible, but vouched by undeniable authority, alone stood the shock of the whole English army, and, armed with his battle-axe, slew every one that attempted to come over the bridge:

no less than five and forty of the assailants fell by the death-dealing arm of this Norwegian Cocles *. At length, however, after a glorious dispute of near six hours, that was effected by stratagem which could not be brought about by such an infinite superiority of force; for one of Harold's men getting into a boat under the bridge, through a hole he found there, ran a spear up into the Norwegian's lower parts, who, no longer able to maintain his post, fell down dead. Upon this the English made themselves masters of the bridge, which they crossed, and fell upon the enemy on the other side, when the dispute was very bloody, obstinate, and long; but victory declared in favour of Harold. The invaders were defeated with prodigious loss, their two leaders, Harfager and Tosti, were left dead on the field of battle, and an immense booty fell into the hands of the conqueror, being the whole of the spoils that the invaders had amassed in the course of their successful ravages. After this victory, Harold, following his blow, made himself master of most of the Norwegian ships that lay in the Ouse; but coming to a composition with Olaüs, the son of Harfager, and Paul, count of the Orkneys, he gave them twenty-one sail to carry off their wounded, on their swearing never more to invade the English territories.

This victory was one of the greatest that we find recorded by our historians; for, in the beginning of this expedition, the king of Norway had conquered the Orkneys, and, considering the prodigious force with which he invaded England, there was no small probability of his reducing that also. By this defeat Harold entirely frustrated that design, and did not a little disconcert the projects of duke William, at whose instigation Tosti and Harfager had made this descent, in order to give a diversion to Harold's arms, while William should effect a landing in a distant part of the kingdom; and for this purpose he proposed waiting at St. Valery's, till he should receive advice of the success of the Norwegians.

However, this victory, which seemed to establish Harold's affairs, proved the cause of his utter ruin. It was the custom of those days to divide all the spoils taken from the enemy in war, among the officers and soldiers; but Harold, by an ill-timed parsimony, though from a laudable motive †, kept the whole of the treasure to himself, which entirely lost him the hearts of his soldiers, who ascribed his conduct to an avaricious and arbitrary disposition, and looked upon him as one who had robbed them of their property, and whom, therefore, they thought unworthy of being supported by them. Let us now return to William, whom we left busied in making preparations for asserting his claim to the crown of England with success.

Having, as we before observed, engaged Tosti and Harfager to make a descent upon the English coasts, in the nature of forerunners to his grand expedition, he set himself to raise the necessary sums for defraying the expence of such an important enterprize; and for that purpose convoked an assembly of the Norman states, of whom he demanded subsidies: at the same time he laid before them the nature of his claim, the usage he had met with, his prospect of success, and the advantage that must thereby accrue to his hereditary dominions. But these reasons, though urged with all the force of the most powerful eloquence, made no impression on the assembly; they absolutely refused to comply with his request; they remonstrated, that their country was already drained of men and money by the long war it had carried on with its neighbours, the French; and that they were not obliged to serve in foreign expeditions, in which the interest of Normandy was not immediately concerned, which they thought by no means to be the case in the present intended expedition. William, finding himself disappointed from this quarter, gave over prosecuting his enterprize as connected with the honour and dignity of his dukedom, and determined to make a private job of it: with this view he set on foot a subscription, to which every man in Europe was invited as an adventurer. This method succeeded to his wish. In a short time he found means to get several of the chief men of his duchy to contribute, as private individuals, to that scheme which they had opposed in their political legislative capacities. This inspired a general emulation who should be foremost in assisting their prince: William Fitz Osbern, a man of the greatest property and popularity in the dukedom, undertook to fit out forty ships at his own expence; and the most wealthy, after his example, subscribed very large sums, according to their respective abilities. Even his inveterate enemy, Geoffrey Martel, count of Anjou, sent him a considerable body of men. Guy, earl of Ponthieu, followed his example; Eustace, count of Boulogne, and the vicomte of Thouars, in Poictou, joined him in person with their vassals. Howel, count of Bretagne (or Brittany) levied a body of five thousand men, consisting of cavalry and infantry, which he sent under the command of his eldest son, Alan Fargant, attended by the viscounts of Leon and Dinan ‡. The emperor Henry IV. and Philip I. of France were then minors; but, on William's application, the imperial council issued out a proclamation, allowing all the vassals of the empire to enter into his service. It is said, that William had made an agreement with those princes who lent him succours, to assign lands to them in England, after the conquest of that country. But as William was a vassal to the crown of France, he expected a more powerful assistance from thence than from any other quarter; however, he found himself greatly deceived, for on making application to the council of regency, and even offering to hold England in vassalage of the crown of France, that assembly not only refused to concern themselves with his enterprize, but also either advised or ordered him to desist from it. This refusal of the French council did not, however, hinder Baldwin, count of Flanders, who was at the head of the regency and guardian of Philip's person, from giving underhand encouragement to the French nobility to assist his son-in-law. But no assistance was of greater consequence to William than the pope's declaration in his favour, which he obtained by promising to hold the kingdom of England as a fief of the apostolic see.

* This relation, which we have from Brompton and Knyghton, will appear less incredible when we consider, that our ancestors were at that time unacquainted with the use of cannon, which alone at present decide the fate of the day.

Alexander II. then supreme pontiff, full of hopes, and glad to extend the papal jurisdiction in a country where it had not been yet established, readily granted all that William asked. Harold was denounced a perjured usurper; a ring with one of St. Peter's hairs in it, and a consecrated banner, were sent to the duke, to hallow his enterprize: bulls were published to declare the justice of his cause, and to stir up every good Christian to assist him in placing him on the throne of England. This declaration, so artfully obtained, and so admirably well suited to the genius of the times, had a great effect, not only on a number of brave men in all parts of Europe, who, eager to signalize their valour and their respect to the pontifical decrees, flocked from all quarters to range themselves under William's standard, but also on the English themselves, who, looking upon Harold as an excommunicated person, and being moreover incensed against him for his late unpopular act in withholding their dues from his valiant soldiers, were more than half prepared to give the duke a welcome reception; when he, finding all matters ripe for success, set sail from St. Valery, on the eve of the feast of St. Michael, the tutelary saint of Normandy, and landed without opposition the next day at Pevensey, in Sussex, having lost in his passage only two small vessels that were overladen*. The duke is said to have been himself the first who jumped ashore; and the writers of his life have, upon this occasion, adapted to him an incident we meet with in the life of Julius Cæsar†.

And here we may observe, that William could not have chosen a more suitable time for his expedition, inasmuch as there was nothing to oppose his descent. Harold, indeed, had fitted out a considerable fleet, computed at seven hundred sail, which cruised off the Isle of Wight, in order to oppose William's designs: but as the duke had delayed his enterprize so long, partly through the refusal of the states to concur with his proposals, and partly by reason of contrary winds, which had detained him at St. Pierre sur Dive (where his army and fleet had rendezvoused) near two months, the king was led to think that he had entirely declined it. This surmise was confirmed, according to some authors, even by earl Baldwin, who had been applied to for that information. However, Harold's armament was dispersed, and had quitted its station for want of provisions; and Harold himself had withdrawn all his forces from the sea-coast.

And now the duke having thus happily effected a landing, in order to deprive his men of all hopes of returning, or of safety but in victory, ordered his ships to be burnt, according to some authors; but other authors say that he sent them back to Normandy, which latter account appears the most reasonable. He then marched on towards Hastings‡, where he ordered a fort to be built, and published a manifesto, containing the motives that induced him to undertake the enterprize.

He said, he came to revenge the death of prince Alfred, restore Rodbert archbishop of Canterbury, and assist the English in punishing Harold, who had seized the crown, to which he had no right, in direct violation of the oath he had sworn at the Norman court. But these reasons were treated as frivolous by every Englishman of good sense; for, in the first place, Alfred had fallen by Godwin, who had been tried and fined for the same: but although that punishment fell far short of the crime, yet Harold could not be involved in the guilt, as it did not appear that he had any hand in the murder. The second reason was no better than the first (though probably inserted in the manifesto on the pope's account, to serve as a cover for his partiality to the duke), for it was well known that prelate had been banished by the general assembly of the kingdom in Edward's reign, and consequently the present king could not be blamed for it: moreover, it was in itself a wise and justifiable measure, and such as was universally approved of by the English themselves. Thirdly, as to his offering to the English his assistance to bring Harold to condign punishment for having seized the crown without right, and in direct contravention to his oath, Harold had fully answered every thing that William could allege on that head.

All this while it may be observed, that the duke made not the least mention of any will of the deceased king Edward, or even any verbal promise made him by that prince, which might perhaps have wrought a favourable effect on the minds of the people, whom he designed to lure over or subject to his sway; whereas his silence on that head entirely overturned his third motive: nor could the English conceive what grounds a duke of Normandy had to enter the kingdom in this hostile manner; or what advantage could accrue to any one from siding with an invader of their country: so that very few Englishmen would enlist under his banner, notwithstanding that they were far from being contented with Harold's government, who, in several instances, had exerted an arbitrary power, the very name of which has its antipathy planted in the heart of every native of this island.

The provisions which the duke had brought with him being consumed, he gave strict orders that his men should not burn the country, nor plunder the inhabitants, alleging that it was hurting themselves, to destroy what would soon be their own. By this prudent and politic step he, in all probability, saved his army from destruction; for the inhabitants of the adjacent country, finding themselves treated thus mildly, endeavoured to secure the favour and protection of their new master, by supplying him with all those necessaries which

* We shall here set down a list of the most considerable of William's fleet, as it is found in our English historians; but without taking upon us to vouch for its accuracy. The whole is said by some to have consisted of near a thousand sail; of which, William, his sewer, the son of Osbern, supplied him with sixty ships; Hugh, his nephew, afterwards earl of Chester, with as many; Hugh de Montfort with sixty ships and sixty soldiers; Romus, the eleemosynary (almoner) of Toscan, afterwards bishop of Lincoln, with one ship and twenty men; Nicholas, the abbot of St. Odian, supplied him with fifteen ships and one hundred men; Robert, earl of Angus, with sixty ships; Girald, the sewer, with as many; William, count of Durance, with eighty ships; Roger of Montgomery, with sixty; Roger de Beaumont, with sixty; Odo, bishop of Bayeux, with one hundred; Robert de Mortimer, with one hundred and twenty; William Gifford, with thirty vessels and an hundred men.

† The duke going ashore, his foot, by accident, slipping, he fell down, when a soldier, standing by, immediately turned it into a good omen, saying, "Sir, you have thus taken seizin of that land of which you will shortly be king."

he wanted, instead of retiring with their cattle and effects farther up the country, which would have been the inevitable consequence of a different behaviour in the invaders.

While William was thus employed in getting provisions for his men, we are told by our author*, that one Robert, a Norman baron, settled in those parts, sent the duke advice of Harold's victory over the king of Norway, and his return from the North to London, advising him, at the same time, not to venture a battle with such a numerous army of brave men as the usurper had to bring against him, but rather to entrench himself as strongly as possible in his camp at Hastings. William, however, either too judicious, or too intrepid, to follow such timorous advice, returned for answer, "that he was come into England to seek his enemy; that he put confidence in the valour of his troops, and did not doubt of success; and that he held it beneath the honour of a general, who had the swords of sixty thousand brave men unsheathed in his cause, to waste time in parlying†."

But to return to Harold: on the first news of the duke's landing, he made a general muster of his army, when he found too late the bad effects of that discontent which his seizure of the booty had occasioned in his affairs at this juncture; for the greatest part of those who had been disgusted thereby, had deserted him in their way to London; therefore, in order to prevent a more general defection, he behaved to such of his soldiers as continued with him with more than common generosity and kindness; and by sending to the nobility of the kingdom, representing the danger to which they, their country, and himself were exposed, he prevailed on them to send him very considerable recruits. During this interval, William sent ambassadors to Harold, demanding him to surrender the crown, which he had so perfidiously usurped. This message was delivered in such arrogant terms, that it awakened the most furious rage in the breast of the haughty Harold, who could with difficulty be restrained by those about him from falling upon the ambassadors, and putting them to death. However, he suffered himself to be persuaded, and sent them back to the duke, with a retorting answer that did not in the least yield in bitterness and contempt to the message he had received.

While these things were in agitation, Harold made every preparation that his great military knowledge could suggest, in order to resist his enemy, and drive him out of the kingdom: but, in the interim, he was prevailed on by the lords of his council, previous to trying the fate of a battle, to send a message to the duke, with the offer, if he would depart the land quietly, of a large sum of money to defray the charges of his expedition. This message was received by William with the contempt it deserved; and he sent back for reply, "that he was not come over for the sake of plunder or paltry coin, but to seize that kingdom which was his due, and which Harold, in violation of the most sacred oaths, had usurped; and that nothing less would satisfy him."

Harold, who, elated by his late success against the Norwegians, looked upon himself as invincible, and did not question driving the Normans into the sea, immediately on receiving this answer from the duke, prepared to march against him, and to run the hazard of an engagement. Having, therefore, assembled all his forces, he advanced towards the Norman army, and encamped within seven miles of Hastings, where they were posted. While Harold was thus burning with eagerness to attack the duke, Gyrth, a younger brother to the king, who was a person of a cooler head, though no way inferior in wisdom and bravery, endeavoured all he could to dissuade him from this rash step: he represented to him, "that all his supplies were not yet come up; that the enemy was, therefore, much superior in number; that his army was fatigued with its march; and that it would be better to content himself with wasting the country and carrying off all the provisions it afforded, till the expected succours should join him from the North; that such a conduct would greatly distress the enemy, who, when they found that they could neither subsist in the country, nor force the issue of a battle, would be glad to come into any terms, to secure a safe retreat, and leave the land with more precipitation than they ever entered it." At the same time he besought his brother to let him take the command of the army upon himself: "Reserve yourself, said this able counsellor, to other times; while you are safe, the enemy can never be said to conquer, but on your person the fate of your kingdom depends. Leave me to fight the Norman; if, peradventure a favourable occasion shall offer, while you keep yourself ready to reap the glory of my success, or repair the misfortune of my defeat."

But such was the blinded obstinacy of Harold, that, rejecting this wise advice, he fixed the fatal resolve for fighting; nor could he be prevailed upon to wait the arrival of the forces, which were coming up from different counties to join him.

However contemptible the enemy appeared in Harold's imagination, he found himself greatly mistaken when he went the next day, in company with his brother Gyrth, to reconnoitre their camp, the disposition of which, and the number and excellent order of their troops, soon convinced him that he had to deal with a foe who would cut out sufficient work for him. Finding that he had been imposed upon in regard to the strength of the duke's army, on his return to his own camp, he proposed to retreat to London, in order to increase his forces; but here he was contradicted by Gyrth, who, with a generous warmth and freedom, told him, "that he ought to have abided in that city, agreeable to the advice of himself and others his faithful counsellors, till the arrival of his troops; but since it was now too late to repent, so it would be ignominious to recede; that his honour was now engaged, and he must stand the test, prepared either to conquer or lose all; that the least step towards a retreat would be construed into a flight, and lose him for ever in the opinion of his soldiers and all the world, animate the Normans, and so discourage his own men, that they would certainly desert him, and he would never be able to get them together again."

Thus both armies prepared for battle. But William, willing to prevent the effusion of blood, or probably thinking his cause desperate, from not being joined by the English in such numbers as he expected, sent a monk* to Harold, with four propositions: the first was, that Harold should relinquish the kingdom, upon certain conditions; the second, that he should hold it under homage to the duke; and the third, that they should refer the decision of their differences to the pope; the fourth, to determine their quarrel by single combat, and the kingdom to be the prize of the conqueror: all of which Harold refused†. Upon this the Norman barons grew very pressing with William to lead them against the enemy, before they could be reinforced by the expected troops; but he, notwithstanding the eagerness of his people to engage, resolved to try another expedient in order to give a greater sanction to his cause, and mask his ambition beneath a shew of reluctance and necessity. He accordingly advanced in person, with twenty followers, intending to offer Harold all the provinces of England north of the Humber, and to secure all Godwin's patrimony to Gyrth, on condition that the rest of the kingdom should be ceded to him; but in case of a refusal, to pronounce Harold a perjured liar, to declare all his adherents excommunicated by the pope, and to challenge them to a general engagement.

When it was told to Harold, that the duke was advancing to a personal conference with him, he, not chusing to subject himself to the reproaches which he might naturally expect for the breach of his oath and his other underhand dealings, sent his brother Gyrth to receive his proposals. Upon his return, that nobleman reported the whole of the duke's offers and threats, which made a great impression upon the nobles and others that composed Harold's council. Perjury and breach of promise sounded strange and ominous to English ears; and the menace of excommunication carried with it a force, only to be conceived by those who live under the terror of ecclesiastical rule, or are the dupes of bigotry and religious superstition. The assembly, therefore, unanimously advised Harold to come to an accommodation; but Gyrth, alarmed at, though uninfected with, the panic which had now diffused itself like a contagion from the council to the army, resolved to exert his utmost efforts to stop the spreading poison to their hopes, and with irresistible eloquence displayed to them the certain loss of honour, power, possessions, liberty, in a word, of every thing dear to a free-born Englishman, that would await so pusillanimous a resolution; expatiating on the miseries they had to expect under the rule of a conqueror, who had already devoted their persons and effects as a prey to those who assisted him in vanquishing them, and to whom they must, from the instant of such a capitulation, look upon themselves as slaves and bondmen. To these pathetic remonstrances he added the incentives of larger estates, as a reward for their fidelity and valour. This politic and well-timed harangue had such an effect on the minds of those within doors and without, that the assembly with one voice rejected the duke's proffered terms as infamous and dishonourable; and the army, to a man, declared their resolution to stand by their leaders to the last drop of their blood. In consequence of these resolves, the ensuing day, being the fourteenth of October, A. D. 1066, was by Harold appointed for a general engagement, which he imagined would prove fortunate to him, that being his birth-day.

The duke of Normandy, perceiving Harold was determined to give him battle, advanced a little way, and took post in a plain, where he could have room to draw up his army in battle-array. An adventure happened to him at this time, which gives us a remarkable instance of his generous disposition: we are told, that Fitz Osbern, one of his generals, and his favourite companion, being extremely wearied with the duty of the day, was just ready to sink under the weight of his armour, which the duke perceiving, took off his favourite's helmet with his own hand, and carried it on his shoulder into the camp. This and the like acts of condescension worked wonderfully in his favour with the soldiers: nor was his open deportment in other respects less serviceable to him in the minds of the English, especially the instance of his behaviour to two spies, whom Harold sent to discover the real strength of his army and the disposition of his camp, and who being taken within the precincts of the camp, might, agreeable to all the rules of war, have been instantly put to death; instead of which, William dismissed them with great politeness and humanity, having first ordered one of his officers to shew them all over his lines, with a desire that they would make a faithful report to their king of the situation in which they found things for the ensuing contest.

The night preceding the battle was spent in a very different manner by the two armies. Harold, flushed with his former success, and presuming not a little on the dispositions which William had lately shewn for peace, and depending on the experienced courage of his troops, vauntingly declared, that the man who entertained a doubt of victory was a coward in his heart. The example of their king and leader filled the minds of the English with the like presumptuous confidence of success, and they spent the evening in a Bacchanalian mirth and festivity, that seemed rather the prelude to a triumph, than the preparation for a bloody and doubtful field, on whose success every thing dear to the lovers of liberty depended.

Not so passed the hours away in the Norman camp: a sober silence deepened the gloom of night; solemn reflection took possession of each breast; they behaved like men prepared to meet the worst, or hail the most fortunate event: a well-timed devotion inspired that resolute courage which riot and debauch serves only to enervate, by dissipating the spirits, whose support is wanting in the time of trial.

And now the day arose which was to decide the fate of England. Harold‡, far inferior in the number of his forces, resolved not to lose his advantage in the ground, and drew up his men

* Named Hugh Margot.

† To these propositions Harold replied, that he was not so simple as to submit to the arbitration of the pope, who had already declared himself a party; that he scorned to hold the crown of England dependent on any prince whatever; nor would he put his kingdom on the issue of a single combat, in which, though he should obtain the victory, he could reap no solid advantage; and that therefore he would leave the decision of his cause to God alone. Smollett.

‡ The following account of the battle between the English and Normans is taken from Wace's MS. History, and the Life of William by J. H. (or John Hayward) who wrote in the reign of James I. and is to be found in the second volume of the Harl. Miscell.

in a column on the brow of a hill, with a ditch and a line of hurdles before them. The Kentish men, armed with halberts, pikes, and targets, formed the van, a post of honour, which they claimed as their right by ancient usage ever since the time of the Saxon Heptarchy; and the care of defending the king's person and the royal standard was, by like prescription, consigned to the Londoners, whom Harold particularly cautioned to keep close together, telling them that breaking their ranks would be attended with inevitable discomfiture. These latter formed the main body, and the remaining ranks were indiscriminately filled up with the other English. Harold and his brothers Gyrth and Leofwine placed themselves in the centre, that the men might be witnesses of their valour, and disdaining an indulgence that was not shared by the meanest soldier, they fought on foot. The whole together formed a well compacted phalanx, whose close cemented ranks seemed indissoluble by any force that could assail them.

William, mounting on horseback, encouraged his men with a voice that seemed to breathe victory; he appealed to heaven for the justness of his cause: he then hung round his neck, as witnesses of his rival's perjury, the relics on which Harold had sworn, and ordered the consecrated banner sent him by the pope to be unfurled in the front of his army. These things, which would be laughed to scorn in the present enlightened times, had a wonderful effect in those days of dark ignorance and blind superstition. The Normans thought they marched under the immediate protection of heaven. They advanced in three bodies; the first, composed of the troops of Bretagne, Anjou, le Maine, and Perche, led by Fitz Osberne and Roger de Montgomery; the second, of Poictevins and Germans, under the command of Charles Martel* and a German general; the duke himself led up the last division, consisting of his own Normans and the flower of his nobility; and among all the three divisions were interspersed flying bodies of archers, to serve as opportunity should offer†.

The Normans, marching with the pope's banner at their head, to begin the attack on three sides at once, Taillefer, a gallant old soldier, advanced before the rest, and sung, according to custom, the famous song of Roland and the heroes who fell at Ronçeval, to rouse the valour of his countrymen. To animate them still more by his example, he obtained the duke's permission to strike the first blow in the battle, upon which he rushed on to begin the charge, running a standard-bearer through with his lance, and killing another with his sword, but before he could dispatch a third he was slain himself. The air was now darkened by a cloud of arrows, discharged from the bows of the Norman archers‡, which terrified the English, unused to those missiles; and seeing their men fall on all sides, they thought the centre of their army had been broken through, which for a while occasioned such a confusion and dismay as was easily perceived by the Normans, who, resolving to follow their advantage, charged with redoubled impetuosity; but the English having recovered from their first astonishment, and forming a penthouse with their targets over their heads, closed their ranks, and presented such an impenetrable body to their enemy as obliged them to retire, and, being thus reunited, did amazing execution upon them with their javelins, inasmuch that the Bretons, in the enemy's left wing, giving way, were pushed into some covered ditches, which they had not observed as they marched up to the attack. The other corps being struck with a panic, on a false report that the duke was slain, were preparing for flight, when he coming up in lucky time, shewed them their mistake, rallied them, and led them again to the fight.

The English, vain of this trifling advantage, had, contrary to Harold's express command, quitted their post on the hill to pursue the broken column into the plain, which as soon as William perceived, he, with a happy readiness, brought up a body of Norman cavalry from his right wing, and cut off the retreat of three thousand of the most advanced of the pursuers, consisting of the Kentish and Essex men, all of whom he put to the sword: he then renewed the general attack against the main body of the English, by whom he was received with the same firmness and intrepidity as before. He was repulsed on all sides, and wherever he strove to make an impression, the loss reverted upon himself. Thus circumstanced, he despaired of prevailing by open force. Thrice had he led up the charge, and each time the horse on which he rode was killed; he flew from rank to rank, from squadron to squadron, animating by his words, and encouraging by his example, both the brave and the irresolute; sometimes rushing on with a torrent of death in his rear, sometimes opposing his single authority to a crowd of runaways. Harold, with equal spirit, with equal valour, but with superior success, opposed him: the eyes of his faithful English were fixed on him; by his uplifted sword they dealt the blow, and mowed down the remaining ranks which his javelin had thinned: no man felt fatigue, no man thought of recess, while their king seemed lost to every sense but that of a thirst for glory, and to have nothing in pursuit but conquest or death.

And now victory appeared on the point of passing over to the side of the English; the drooping Normans staggered under their resistless shock, when William's genius found means to fix the wavering fortune of the day, by one of those stratagems in war which, from their frequency, are the less suspected or guarded against; he sounded a retreat; the knell of English liberty! for so it proved. Harold's brave soldiers, thinking that nothing now remained but to glean the deathful harvest, for which they had so painfully laboured, were ruined by a rash security; deaf to all order, impetuous and ungovernable, they pursue the wily fugitives into the plain with as little caution as before; and they, who, when united, were invincible, when thus dissipated became an easy prey to those of whom they thought they had the mastery. For

* So Wace and J. Hayward call him. Camden and others name him Jeffery.

† Our ancient historians inform us, that the morning of the battle, the duke's esquire, by mistake, put on his armour with the breast-plate behind instead of before. William averted the omen by a well-timed jest: "Thus (said he) shall my dukedom be turned into a kingdom ere night."

‡ Here we are told by some of our historians, that duke William ordered his Normans not to shoot their arrows directly forward, but upward, so that, forming a curve, they might fall upon the heads of the English and stick in their brains.

the Normans rallying upon a signal given, closed their ranks, faced about, and, surrounding their pursuers with their cavalry, cut numbers of them in pieces, and the rest, with great difficulty regained the hill, where they still maintained their ground in spite of the utmost efforts of the enemy to dislodge them or break their ranks.

The Normans finding all their attacks were fruitless, had recourse to their former stratagem, and, amazing to be told! it met with the same success; the English, never to be taught by experience when their fighting humour is indulged, forgot the check they had so lately met with, and followed the enemy a third time into the plain, where they were again trodden down by the Norman horse, and strewed the field with their dead bodies. Weakened as they were with these repeated losses, they still kept their ground on the hill, unshaken for some time, and, in all probability, might have recovered their strength and spirits, and have finally repulsed their fierce assailants, had not an arrow, shot from the bow of the evil genius of England, laid their monarch breathless on the ground, whose dying groan was the departing sigh of English liberty. William and slavery triumphed. Gyrth and Leofwine, the gallant brothers of Harold, still survived, and still animated their countrymen to stand their ground; the amazed English thronged instinctively round the standard of their deceased prince; but the Normans pouring upon them in redoubled numbers, carried their point: Gyrth and Leofwine fell in each others arms; Harold's standard was pulled down*, and the duke's erected in its stead; upon which the English retired from all parts of the hill, and were hotly pursued by the enemy, even after the close of day.

The darkness, however, which favoured their retreat, had well nigh proved fatal to the Normans, by wresting the victory out of their hands; for in the eagerness of their pursuit, and not being so well acquainted with the country as the English, they fell into morasses and deep ditches, and lost a great number both of horse and foot. The fugitives, reanimated by this accident that had befallen the foe, turned upon their pursuers, and made a dreadful slaughter amongst them, Engenouf, baron de l'Aigle, falling among the rest; and, indeed, so hot was the action, that Eustace, count of Boulogne, persuaded William to sound a retreat for that night, and not to trust to the chance of darkness, a victory that would be insured to him by the returning day; while he was whispering this counsel in William's ear, he received a blow between his shoulders, which for a while bereft him of speech. The duke, however, resolving not to leave his victory imperfect, still continued the fight: the battle seemed now to be renewed, the Normans redoubling their efforts, but still the English maintained their ground. At length, William, pretending to be touched with the fate of those whom he now looked upon rather as his subjects than his enemies, but in reality being fearful of experiencing one of those sudden reverses of fortune, which are so frequent in battle, ordered a truce to the combat, and offered liberty for that body of English to retire: this was accepted; they drew off, through the marshy defiles before-mentioned, and night being now pretty far advanced, William saw himself left in full possession of the field of battle and of the crown of England.

Such was the issue of this long and bloody engagement, which decided the fate of England, and by which the Normans are said to have lost six thousand men; and if so, the loss on the side of the English must have been considerably greater. William having thus attained the accomplishment of his desires, ordered his whole army to kneel, and return thanks to him who is the giver of all victory: he then commanded a tent to be pitched for himself in the midst of the slain, and there he passed the remainder of the night†.

The next morning was taken up with burying the dead: the corpse of Harold falling amongst the undistinguished carnage, was so miserably deformed that it could not be discovered after the most diligent search, till at length a lady being sent for, who had formerly been mistress to the deceased monarch, she recognized his body by a certain pri-

* This standard had on it the picture of a man fighting; and being enriched with gold and precious stones to a great amount, was sent by William, after his victory, as a present to the pope. It is said, that twenty young Normans had bound themselves by a fearful oath to take this standard, or die in the attempt; and though most of them perished in this desperate enterprise, yet those who remained alive carried it off.

† As the battle of Hastings, by which the Normans conquered England, was certainly won by the help of the broad-arrow and long-bow, so it was by the same weapons that the English afterwards conquered France; I shall, therefore here give the reader an excellent and curious comparison between this weapon and our fire-arms, as I find it in the Life of William, by J. H. "One circumstance more I hold fit to be observed, that this victory was gotten only by the means of the blow of an arrow, the use whereof was brought into this land afterwards. The English being trained to that fight, did thereby chiefly maintain themselves with honourable advantage against all nations with whom they did contend in arms, being generally reputed the best shot in the world. But of late years it hath been altogether laid aside, and instead thereof the harquebuz and calliver are brought into use; yet not without contradiction of many expert men of arms, who, albeit they do not reject the use of the small pieces, yet do they prefer the bow before them: first, for that, in a reasonable distance, it is of greater both certainty and force: secondly, for that it discharges faster: thirdly, for that more men may discharge therewith at once; for only the first rank discharge the piece, neither hurt they any but those that are in front, but with the bow ten or twelve ranks may discharge together, and will annoy so many ranks of the enemy: lastly, for that the arrow doth strike more parts of the body, for in that it turneth by descent, and not only point-blank like the bullet, there is no part of the body but it may strike, from the crown of the head to the nailing of the foot to the ground; hereupon it followeth, that the arrows falling so thick as hail upon the bodies of men, as less fearful of their flesh, so more slenderly armed than in former times, must necessarily work more dangerous effects. Besides these general respects, in many particular services and times the use of the bow is of great advantage; if some defence lie before the enemy, the arrow may strike where the bullet cannot; foul weather may much hinder the discharge of the piece, but it is of no great impediment to the discharge of the bow: a horse struck with a bullet, if the wound be not mortal, may perform good service; but if an arrow be fastened in his flesh, the continual stirring thereof, occasioned by the motion of himself, will force him to cast off all command, and either bear down or disorder those that are near. But the crack of the piece, some men say, doth strike a terror in the enemy; true; if they be such as never heard the like noise before, but a little use will extinguish those terrors; to men, yea to beasts, acquainted with these cracks, they work a weak impression of fear; and if it be true, which all men of action do hold, that the eye in all battles is first overcome, then against men equally accustomed to both, the sight of the arrow is more available to victory than the crack of the piece: assuredly the duke, before the battle, encouraged his men, for that they should deal with enemies who had no shot. But I will leave this point to be determined by more discerning judgments." See Harl. Miscell. vol. ii.

vate mark, known only to herself. A Norman foldier, who was present at the discovery, in a fit of unmanly exultation, ran his spear into the thigh of the lifeless king; which action being told to the duke, he instantly ordered the base wretch to receive the punishment due to so dastardly a deed, and dismissed him from his service. He afterwards sent the bodies of the king and his brothers to their mother Githa, who gave them as honourable a burial as the present circumstances would permit, in Waltham abbey, which had been founded by Harold himself*.

Thus died Harold, says Dr. Smollett (who has drawn the character of this king with great elegance and candour) in the defence of English liberty, against the usurpation of foreign power; and, if we except the injury he did to Edgar Atheling in excluding that prince from the throne of his fathers, he seems to have been in all respects well qualified to wield the sceptre with reputation to himself and happiness to his subjects; for he was humane, intelligent, and his generosity was in most instances equal to his courage. His memory, indeed has been blackened by the Norman writers, at the same time that they have exhausted themselves in encomiums upon the Conqueror. But need the unprejudiced English reader be told that this was the natural consequence of the decision of fortune? Had the day been Harold's, how would those very authors, who are so lavish in the praise of William, have represented his enterprize? he would then have been painted in his true colours, and instead of the generous and justly incensed prince who came to assert his lawful right and punish a perjured usurper, we should have found him a base invader, who, regardless of the rights and liberties of a free people, and trusting only to the power of his own arm, and the assistance of a set of desperadoes, trampled on the laws, the privileges, and the birthrights of the English, while Harold sacrificed his life in defending them from the usurpation of foreigners. Upon the whole, then, to set the characters of both these heroes in a proper contrast, William was the successful Conqueror, Harold the unfortunate Defender of England.

It remains now that we should give some account of Harold's family. He had two wives; the first he buried long before he was king, but none of our writers mention her name; his second was Elgitha, widow of Griffith ap Llhwellyn, prince of North Wales, sister of Edwin and Morcar, earls of Mercia and Northumberland. We are told, that by the former of these wives he had children, who were of such an age at his death that they waged war against the Conqueror in the second year of his reign. The first was Godwin, who, with his brother Edmund, after his father's death and overthrow, fled into Ireland; but returning again into Somersetshire, slew Ednoth, one of his father's generals, who encountered him; and, after having made great depredations in Devonshire and Cornwall, set sail again for Ireland. The next year he made another descent upon Cornwall, where he had a battle with Beorn, a nobleman of that county, in which he got the better: from thence he went back to Ireland, and afterwards went to Denmark, to king Sweyn, where he continued the residue of his days.

The second was Edmund, who joined with his brother in all his aforesaid invasions and wars, depending absolutely on him while he lived, and died, like him, in Denmark.

Magnus, the third son of Harold, went with his two brothers into Ireland, and came back with them the first time to England; after which we hear nothing of him.

By his second wife, Elgitha, he had a son named Ulpho, or Wulf, who was but a child at the time of the battle of Hastings, and was afterwards knighted by William Rufus.

He had also two daughters: Gunilda, the eldest, falling blind, passed her days in a nunnery.

Another daughter of Harold's is mentioned by Saxo Grammaticus, in his Danish History, to have been married to Waldemar, king of Russia, by whom she had a daughter, who was wife to Waldemar, king of Denmark †.

* The corpse was put into a coffin, and being solemnly attended by the Norman barons to Battle-bridge, was there met by the English nobility, who conveyed it to Waltham, where it was deposited. But notwithstanding Harold was thus publicly interred, Knyghton asserts, from Giraldus Cambrensis, that he was not slain in the battle, but retired privately, with the loss of his eye, which was wounded by the arrow, and lived like an anchorite several years afterwards in a cell, near St. John's church, at Chester. This odd story he pretends to support by adding, that the fact was discovered by Harold himself to his confessor, just before he died; and that it was a circumstance universally believed by the inhabitants of those parts, who shewed the tomb wherein he lay interred, even at the time in which he wrote. Tyrrel judiciously obviates the difficulties which might be started from Knyghton's allegation, by granting the tomb might have been made for a person who assumed the name of Harold; and, in process of time might have been believed to be that of the real monarch. Tyrrel's Hist. vol. i. p. 114.

† Tyrrel says (from Speed) she was mother to Waldemar, the first king of Denmark of that name; from whom the Danish kings for many ages after succeeded.

I N T E R R E G N U M,

Between the Battle of Hastings, gained on the fourteenth of October, A. D. 1066, and the Crowning of WILLIAM the BASTARD King of England, on the Christmas-day following; containing the Transactions of about Two Months.

AS it is absolutely necessary that the reader should be let into the history of that great and fortunate prince, William duke of Normandy, preceding the event of his conquering England and obtaining that crown, the author of these sheets thinks he cannot chuse a more proper place to introduce these circumstances, than after the short, active, and important reign of his predecessor on the English throne, and by way of relief from the various scenes of bloodshed and commotions which have taken up our attention in the foregoing pages.

That William was a bastard is generally and, I think, justly agreed upon*. But we are assured by Malmesbury, and others, that though William was born out of wedlock, that his mother was afterwards married to duke Robert, which, by the laws of Normandy, in that point agreeable to the civil and canon laws, was sufficient to make the issue inheritable although born preceding the performance of the marriage rite: besides, it was a general custom at that time in France, for bastards to succeed to the inheritance, and even to the highest dignities, enjoyed by their fathers, jointly with, and in the same manner as, children lawfully begotten. Thus Thierry, the bastard son of Clovis, shared with the lawful children of the said Clovis, in the division made of his estates after his death, and had for his lot the province of Austrasia, now called Lorraine. Sigebert, bastard of Dagobert I. had his part in the kingdom of France with Clovis XII. the lawful son of king Dagobert. Lewis and Charlemagne, the illegitimate issue of Lewis le Begue, or the Stammerer, succeeded after the death of their father. In like manner we find it in England, where Alfred, the bastard son of Oswy, succeeded his brother Egfrid in the kingdom of Northumberland: so Athelstan, the natural son of Edward the Elder, succeeded his father, before Edmund and Eldred his younger brothers, notwithstanding they were lawfully begotten: and Edward surnamed the Martyr, bastard † to king Edgar, succeeded him in the throne before Ethelred his lawful issue: lastly, Harold, surnamed Harefoot, bastard to Canute, succeeded him in the kingdom before Hardicnute his lawful son. The like custom has been observed in Spain, Portugal, and divers other countries; and it is probable that this usage was grounded on experience, that those begotten in the full heat and vigour of nature and affection, have in general been remarkable for the most excellent endowments both of mind and body. History abounds with instances of this nature; nor can we read the lives of Hercules, Alexander the Great, Romulus, Timotheus, Brutus, Themistocles, Arthur, and, let us add likewise, of the Conqueror; of Homer, Demosthenes, Bion, Bartholus, Peter Lombard, John Andreas, and many other great men in arms and literature, without being convinced of the truth of this observation. Nevertheless, a law was made by the third race of the French kings, that bastards should not inherit the crown of the realm. This custom was likewise banished out of England, and other countries of Europe; although in France the bastards of great houses were still allowed to inherit. Thus much we have thought needful to premise, in order to remove any unreasonable prejudice that might be taken against William, on account of his illegitimacy.

From his earliest infancy he delighted in such exercises only as were ingenious and manly, and tended to dexterity and valour. He was of an active and fiery disposition; rather ambitious than fond of glory; of a piercing wit, lively discernment, and admirable presence of mind. His courage proceeded not from ignorance or rashness, but was founded on mature judgment and sound reflection. In peace he was politic, in war valiant, and alike ready at spying an advantage, and turning it to his own use. He was accustomed from his very childhood to the use and weight of armour. Without despising or fearing death, he faced it in many well-fought fields; and his whole life was one continued scene of warfare, either in defence of himself, or when led by ambition to attack others. The first years of his reign were much disturbed with plots and conspiracies among his Normans, who often conspired against his life, dignity, and state, traducing him as a boy, a bastard, born of a base and ignoble mother, and unworthy to reign over them. Of these, some he appeased and reconciled to him; others he prevented in their designs, or crushed their power before it could be collected; others he encountered and vanquished

* He was the son of Robert II. duke of Normandy; some say by a concubine named Harlotta; but, according to Carte and Tyrrel, his mother's name was Harleva. She was daughter of Foubert, the duke's valet de chambre and son of a furrier of Falaise. It is said, that the first night the duke took her to his bed, she dreamed that her bowels extended over all in the open field ere yet the down of puberty appeared on his face.

Normandy and England. This dream was very naturally interpreted in the sequel, if it was not invented after the successes of William.

† Though the present age appears to be well satisfied with regard to the legitimacy of this prince, yet there was, at the time of his succeeding, great debates upon that head.

William's first encounter, according to John Hayward, the excellent writer of his Life, in the reign of James I. was with Roger Frefney, who, from an old claim, demanded the duchy of Normandy, but was by William overthrown in battle. His next was against William, earl of Argues, his uncle: this nobleman was supported in his pretensions on Normandy by the power of France; but William surprized him and the French king his ally so opportunely, that he had well nigh cut them both off; and, after routing their combined forces, he accepted, or rather gave them, an honourable peace. Not long after, the French king making war on Geoffrey Martel, earl of Anjou, William went to the assistance of the former with a chosen body of forces, and so well acquitted himself both in the cabinet and field, that the French king was wholly guided by him in all his operations: and such was his great skill in the military art, that Geoffrey Martel, who was the most experienced foldier of his age, made no scruple to declare that young William was like to prove the best commander in the world. It was the characteristic of William to be remarkably kind to those who submitted to his authority, and to carry his resentment even to a degree of cruelty against such who obstinately resisted: of this disposition he gave a remarkable instance at the siege of Alençon, when the defendants would frequently call out to him from the walls, "La pel ! la pel !" alluding to the story of his birth; which ill-timed jest so incensed William, that, having made himself master of the place, he, with an unparalleled barbarity, ordered the hands and feet of all whom he found in arms, to be cut off.

The following well-attested story may serve as a proof of his great intrepidity and presence of mind in time of danger: having once fallen into an ambuscade which had been laid for him by Geoffrey Martel, and an universal panic prevailing among his soldiers, who were on the point of abandoning him, though not till after numbers of them had been slain, the duke, in a transport of rage, cried out unto them, "If ye love me not, soldiers, for shame follow me ! for shame, stand by me ! for shame, let not any of your friends hear the report, that you ran from your general and your prince, and left him fighting alone !" So saying, he threw himself into the thickest throng of the enemy, denouncing those traitors and cowards who would not follow. His soldiers, inspired with fresh ardour by the words and example of their valiant leader, rallied and returned to the charge with such resolution, that they soon turned the scale of victory to their own side: the duke, fighting more like a demon than a man, clove down all who opposed him, till he reached count Martel himself, whom he, with one blow of his faulchion, unhorsed, threw to the ground, and striking off his helmet cut off one of his ears. Many more proofs did he give of his superior valour and military knowledge, which to enumerate would swell our page to an unreasonable length: suffice to it say, that all the time he was only duke of Normandy, he was never free from some martial atchievement, and that all his enterprizes were attended with a most unparalleled and constant series of success, till at length his manifold and painful labours were amply rewarded with the possession of the crown of England, to the final attainment of which we shall now proceed to accompany him.

The victory of Hastings, complete as it was, may be said to have opened rather than terminated William's prospect of success; there were many, and those not inconsiderable difficulties to be surmounted before that enterprising warrior could fully attain the end of his indefatigable labours, I mean the succession to the crown of England. There were at this time three powerful factions in England, each of whom entertained very different views, the Anglo-Saxon, the Danish, and the Norman. The former consisted of all the patriotic English, who earnestly wished to see the calamities of their country terminated by restoring the race of Cerdic to the throne, of which it had been dispossessed, even though at the expence of a further effusion of blood. The Danish cabal was headed by all the old families of that nation, who had been long settled, and had great possessions in England; these were for recalling the line of Canute the Great, and were a formidable party, having received a solemn promise from Sweyn king of Denmark, who claimed in right of Canute, that he would openly assert his title to the crown, and support it and his friends by a powerful fleet and army. The third party was that of the Normans, who, though far inferior to either of the other two in interest or connections, was now become powerful, in consequence of the late victory; and those of their countrymen who had settled in England during the reigns of Ethelred II. and Edward the Confessor, had rendered themselves respectable to the people on account of the high posts they held under a prince whose memory was still dear to the nation, and the dignity of their own persons, heightened by their superior knowledge in the social and civil arts.

William, who was perhaps the deepest politician as well as the greatest warrior of the age, had the address to let these storms, which seemed to threaten the bark of his expectations, spend their fury on each other, sensible that while such factions as those we have already mentioned subsisted in the state, he had nothing to fear from unanimity in the public councils, nor consequently from any sudden and vigorous resolution in the English to defeat his designs on the succession. He therefore expressed no kind of uneasiness when he heard that Edwin and Morcar, the two powerful earls of Mercia and Northumberland, had retired, with a part of the army that had escaped the slaughter of Hastings, to London, where they had summoned a meeting of the English states. However, not to omit any thing that could make for his security against an unforeseen accident, and apprehensive that if he should march immediately to London, the factions, which now promoted his designs, might unite from the prospect of present danger, and prove too powerful for him, he therefore resolved to make himself master of some fortress on the sea-shore, to secure a retreat in case of necessity, and a port from whence he might send for supplies from his own country.

With this view, after remaining a few days at Hastings to refresh his army, he left a garrison behind him there, and advanced against Dover, a place so fortified both by art and nature, that it might have withstood for a long time all the efforts of the Conqueror; but the fame of his victory, and some seasonable severities which the Normans had lately exercised*, struck such a terror into the hearts of the garrison, that they threw open their gates almost as soon as he appeared in sight, or at least submitted after a very short capitulation†. As soon as the duke was in possession, he ordered the town, which Matthew Paris justly styles the lock and key of the kingdom, to be more strongly fortified, and spent eight days there. Change of climate at that season of the year, with alteration of diet, and the amazing fatigues they had undergone, occasioned several distempers amongst his soldiers. This accident, which would have damped the courage of a less intrepid general, served only to convince William that no time was to be lost, and that it behoved him to follow his late victory with unremitting ardour, while his remaining troops were yet in a condition to aid the vast designs of their leader: therefore, leaving his sick in hospitals at Dover, he set out for London, at the head of a small but trusty army, in which every man was well affected to the cause of his general, and all determined to contribute to his success, or share in his defeat. However, his march was retarded for some time by his falling ill himself of the same disorder which had prevailed among his men‡. Let us now return to London, and take a view of the situation of affairs in that capital of the kingdom.

It is easy to conceive what a consternation the whole nation was in, after the loss of the battle of Hastings, and the death of their king: this general confusion was every moment increased by the diversity of opinions of which we have already spoken. Had one spark of the spirit which animated the blood of Cerdic, exerted itself in Edgar Atheling, England, notwithstanding its late defeat, might still have made a vigorous, perhaps a successful, struggle; but that prince was too young, and, besides, of too little soul to give any hopes of assistance to his party in these times of pressing necessity. It is true, the earls Edwin and Morcar were still living, and at that time in London, with a part of the fugitive army; but their authority was not sufficient to execute such measures as were necessary for the preservation of the commonwealth. They had, indeed, assembled in London almost all the remaining nobility of the kingdom, to deliberate upon measures to be taken in the present emergency, both for settling the government of the nation, and raising an army to oppose the Normans. They proposed, that Edgar should be placed on the throne, in which they were warmly supported by archbishop Stigand and the Londoners, whose weight was very great even in those early times, on account of their great wealth, prowess, and numbers; but the major part of the clergy favoured the designs of the Conqueror, whose great successes, and his being countenanced by the pope, made them believe they should find in him a more powerful protector than they could expect under so young and weakly supported a prince as Edgar: they could not, however, so far prevail, but that the unanimous voice of the citizens was hearkened to; Edgar was accordingly proclaimed king of England, with the general consent of the nobility, and orders were issued for levying a new army to support his title||. But, by the dissensions and cabals that prevailed among the great men, this salutary measure was rendered in a manner ineffectual.

William being recovered from his disorder continued his march towards London, after having received the submission of the Kentish men, who gave him hostages for the assurance of their fidelity; in which they were followed by the inhabitants of Canterbury. But, apprehensive that he might not meet with the same disposition in the inhabitants of the other counties through which he was to pass, he caused his army to march in three divisions, by three different routes§, with orders to his men, if they should meet with any resistance, to destroy the country with fire and sword: an order which was made a pretext to commit the most dreadful outrages on the slightest pretences. The duke's view in this severe command was evidently to intimidate the English from any attempts to oppose him in his progress: however, this conduct seems not to be entirely of a piece with that policy he in general appears to have observed, by cautiously avoiding any step which might animate the English to resentment; a particular instance of which we have recorded of him, even while on this very march.

Being stopped in his way by some trees, which Fretherig, abbot of St. Alban's, had caused to be felled, and placed in the road, he ordered him to appear before him, with a promise that he should have no harm offered him, if he complied. On the abbot's coming into his presence, the duke de-

* At Rumney, which place William, in his way to Dover, had sacked, in revenge for the ill treatment that the crew of one of his ships, separated from the rest, had received from the inhabitants.

† We are told by Gulielmus Pictavenfis, that while this treaty was carrying on, the Normans had, by shooting fire-arrows into the town, burnt several of the houses; which circumstance William politicly turned to his own advantage, by making good the damages that the inhabitants had sustained by the imprudence of his men; which gave the English an high opinion of his lenity, and made them believe that he would treat them more like subjects than a conquered people.

‡ The dysentery or bloody flux. It is here that we are to place that famous story of the Kentish men meeting William with each a branch or bough in his hand, and obliging him to grant them several exclusive privileges, and in particular that of gavel-kind (by which all the sons succeed equally to their father's estate): but this story contradicts itself, as it mentions that they marched with green boughs in their hands, in the beginning of November; besides, so tame an acquiescence is inconsistent with the known character of William, who was as remarkable for his severity to the obstinate, as for his lenity to the submissive. Add to this, that the story was originally taken from the MS. History of the Monks of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, written by Thomas Spot, who, in all probability, invented it to magnify the valour of their abbot and of the Kentish men. But as neither Somner, in his Treatise of Gavel-kind, and especially Gulielmus Pictavenfis, who accompanied the duke in his march, make mention of this fact, we may fairly refuse our credit to it. Nor does the well known courage of the English stand in need of being supported by idle tales or monkish legends: while they had a leader to direct their operations, they fought like brave soldiers; when left to themselves, and no longer able to resist, they submitted like wise men.

|| The only instance we have of the exertion of this prince's sovereignty, was his giving his assent to the election of Brand, in the room of Leofric, abbot of Peterborough (nephew to Leofric the great earl of Mercia) who died at this juncture. Sax. Chron. 1066.

§ The march of those columns was through the counties of Sussex, Kent, Hampshire, Surry, Middlesex, Hertfordshire, and Berkshire.

manded of him, how he dared attempt to impede his march, after the rigorous order which he knew to have been given? "In this (replied the royal abbot, with a noble firmness) I have done no more than my birth* and duty exacted of me; and had others of my rank, O duke, acted in a manner alike becoming them, you would not have penetrated thus far into our country." Struck with the boldness of this answer, William dismissed the abbot unhurt.

As he approached towards the capital, the terrors of the people increased; and the clergy thought this a good opportunity to exert their talents of insinuation to dissuade the Londoners from making a resistance, which, they said, would answer no end but to incense the Conqueror, and push him to acts of tyranny and revenge, which might prove fatal to all the inhabitants; whereas, by a timely submission, they might conciliate his affections, secure his protection, and blunt the edge of the uplifted sword of power. By these and the like arguments, concurring with the near approaching danger, the citizens of London, who, as they had more to lose, had also more to fear, than any other subjects in England, suffered their former ardour to abate; and from having so lately resolved to brave the utmost malice of their adverse fortune, they now expressed an earnest desire of coming to an accommodation. The two brothers Morcar and Edwin, more accustomed to the perils of the field, and having had more frequent opportunities of observing the amazing vicissitudes of war, than the home-bred peaceful burghers, resolved not to give up their all without venturing one last effort in the defence of their liberties and properties. With this view they animated those of their own party to engage in the hazard with them, and, watching a favourable opportunity, sallied out from London upon the duke, who was now arrived in the neighbourhood of that city, at the head of his first division, hoping to find him fatigued with his march, and to fall upon him unprepared; but they had to do with a general too well practised in the art of war to suffer himself to be so surprized: William was upon his guard, and gave the assailants so warm a reception, that they were glad to retire with all haste. Their unsuccessful return added fresh alarms to the dispirited Londoners; the friends of Edgar shrunk back from his cause, and thought only how to avert the gathering storm from their own heads. The clergy, assiduous abettors of William and his enterprize, turned this accident in favour of their former counsels, which now began to be generally embraced. In this situation of affairs the earls of Mercia and Northumberland, deeming Edgar's cause desperate, retired with their forces to the northern provinces.

It is far from being clear by history, what part these two noblemen took, after the battle of Hastings, in the public distresses of their country. Some authors pretend that they were warm in the interest of the young prince Edgar, and with that view had drawn their forces towards London; and that it was owing to this prudent step of theirs that so many of the English escaped the carnage of that fatal day. Other writers insinuate, that following only the dictates of their own ambition, they themselves aspired to a share in the sovereignty; and the scepter having been lately wielded by the hand of a subject, they perhaps thought themselves as well fitted for ruling the state as any other person. Be that as it might, thus much is certain, that they did not push the title of Edgar so warmly as they might have done, and that their irresolute conduct gave great advantages to the Conqueror.

William, who had the earliest intelligence of what passed in London, thought the confusion which that city must be thrown into by the departure of the two brothers, on whom the citizens had fixed their eyes as their only support in the present exigence, offered too favourable an opportunity for compassing his designs to be neglected even for a moment: accordingly he himself crossed the Thames, and took post at Wallingford, in Berkshire, from whence he sent out detachments to do military execution on all the country round; after which he marched to Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire: but previous to this step, he sent a strong body of forces to the Surry side of the river, with orders, if they were not received in London, to reduce all Southwark to ashes; which was accordingly performed with the most cruel rigour.

This severity had the desired effect. The chief of the English party, foreseeing that their longer holding out would only open new scenes of calamity, resolved to give way to the torrent of the times, and, if possible, save their country from devastations more shocking than it had ever yet experienced. With this view several nobles, accompanied by Stigand archbishop of Canterbury, Wulstan bishop of Winchester, Walter bishop of Hereford, and other the most eminent citizens of London, repaired to William, at Berkhamstead, and swore him fealty, having first entered into a contract with him for their own security.

Such an example could not fail of having great weight with those who had hitherto stood out; and in proportion as they reflected upon William's power, his rapid success, and the severity he had exercised in treating every one who did not declare for him as if he was against him, this example became more efficacious; and the magistrates dreading a siege, and thinking that the only way to secure the Conqueror's favour was to anticipate his wishes and make a merit of necessity, after having consulted with the nobility, who had already made their submission, they unanimously resolved to go in a body to make him a tender of the crown, with this expression, "That having always been accustomed to live under kingly government, they knew no one more worthy to govern them than himself."

William received them with great courtesy; but, as if unmindful of the very purpose for which he had invaded the kingdom, he, with the most refined policy, pretended at first to have some scruples, and desired time to deliberate on their proposal: but suffering himself at length to be won by their pleasing importunities, to do that which was the darling purpose of his ambitious soul, he returned for answer, that he was ready to consent to their request, and accepted the crown as their gift; thus tacitly acknowledging the right of election in the people of England, at the same time that the manner in which he acquired that election plainly shewed him unregardful of such right.

* He was descended on the one side from the Saxon monarchs, and on the other from king Canute the Dane.

Edgar Atheling, thus abandoned by every one, found it vain to resist, and accordingly implored the protection of William, who readily granted it him. Morcar and Edwin likewise, seeing all their protections entirely superseded by this act of the Londoners, had no longer any pretence to hold out, they, therefore, joining with the current, swore fealty to the duke of Normandy; who, on his part, gave all his new subjects the strongest assurances of protection in their civil and personal rights, and in return received hostages for the faithful performance of their engagements: but notwithstanding this, William did not care to trust himself in the city till he had built a fortress in it, to awe the inhabitants, which he secured by a strong garrison of Normans.

While this was erecting, he made Barking, in Essex, the place of his residence, and caused preparations to be made for his coronation, which was performed in the most splendid and magnificent manner on Christmas-day. A. D. 1066.

Here we may fix the entire extinction of the Anglo Saxon government, which, with various vicissitudes of fortune, had lasted in England near six hundred years, from the reign of Hengist, the first king of Kent, to this submission to William; from which we may date his reign as king of England, and with which we shall close this period of our history.

Of the State of Religion, and of the Laws, Arts and Sciences, Manners and Customs of the Anglo-Saxons, from the Union of the Heptarchy under EGBERT to the Reign of WILLIAM I. commonly called the Conqueror; containing an Æra of Two hundred and thirty-nine Years.

THE perpetual inroads of the Danes, and the merciless ravages they committed in this unhappy country for the space of near one hundred years after the union of the heptarchy under Egbert, king of the West Saxons, left so little time for any material improvements either in ecclesiastical or civil affairs, that we have found ourselves under a necessity, from the barrenness of history during this period, to throw together the events of more than two centuries, so far as they relate to the state of religion, laws, manners and customs, &c. Thus much premised, we shall now proceed to consider the most remarkable and interesting occurrences and institutions under each of those heads, in order as they passed. And first,

OF RELIGION, and of the CHURCH.

DURING the reign of Egbert nothing happened worth notice, if we except the charter granted to the abbey of Croyland, about the year 833, by Withglaff, the tributary king of Mercia, in gratitude for his life having been saved by Seward, the abbot of that monastery. This charter was passed at a meeting of the states, assembled to consult upon the means of expelling the Danes; and the same privileges and immunities were thereby granted to it, as to the most favoured abbey in Rome, for their cloister was held as a sanctuary which no officer of justice could enter on pain of losing his right foot; and it was enacted, that the abbot and his monks should be treated with the same respect as princes of the blood. This charter was confirmed by Egbert himself.

Ethelwolf, the son of Egbert, as we have observed in the history of his reign, gave himself entirely over to the guidance of priests, and was in every thing under the government of Swithin, bishop of Winchester, who had been his tutor. This prelate, taking advantage of the pious weakness of his sovereign, inspired him with an extreme affection for the church and clergy, wherein the main of religion was, in those times, made to consist. It was by his means that Ethelwolf made the famous grant of tythes, A. D. 854. which has ever since continued in the church.

This charter runs thus*: "I, Ethelwolf, by the grace of God king of the West Saxons, &c. with the advice of the bishops, earls, and all other persons of distinction in my dominions, have, for the health of my soul, the good of my people, and the prosperity of my kingdom, taken the prudent and serviceable resolution of granting the tenth part of the lands throughout my whole kingdom to the church and ministers of religion, to be enjoyed by them with all the privileges of a free tenure, and discharged from all services due to the crown, and all other incumbrances incident to lay fees. This grant has been made by us to the church, in honour of Jesus Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and All Saints, and out of regard to the Paschal Solemnity, and that Almighty God might vouchsafe his blessing to us and our posterity. Dated at the palace of Wilton, in the year 854, Indiction the second, at the feast of Easter."

Our historians acquaint us, that in the following year 855, Ethelwolf held a great council at Winchester, at which were present Buthred king of Mercia, and Edmund king of the East Angles, in which this famous donation was solemnly con-

* The charter here translated is in the Monasticon, p. 100. and is dated at Wilton in 854. whereas there is another charter, very different from this, in Ingulphus and Matthew of Westminster, dated at Winchester in 855. To solve this difficulty, it is supposed that Ethelwolf repeated this grant, first at Wilton for the tythes only of his own demesnes, and the year following at Winchester for the tythes of the whole kingdom; though it must be owned that they both seem equally to extend to all his dominions. See Ingulph. p. 17. edit Gal. & Mat. West. Flor. Hist. an. 854. Ingulphus says this charter was made after Ethelwolf's return from Rome; but that could not be, seeing he was then only king of Kent.

firmed, being witnessed by the two kings last-mentioned, and was publicly offered upon the high altar of St. Peter the apostle by Ethelwolf himself, from whence it was transcribed, and sent down through all the parishes in England.

The reigns of Ethelbald, Ethelbert, and Ethelred I. (from the year 866 to 870) are very barren of ecclesiastical events, excepting the destruction of the monasteries and religious houses by the Danes; and the pathetic description our historians give us of the implacable fury of these invaders against the monks: they in particular regret the ruin of the three famous monasteries of Croyland, Ely, and Medeshamstead, to which we may add those of Bardney and Peterborough, where the monks were all massacred and their libraries burnt (see Inguphus, p. 22, 23, 24.) These ravages put a stop to all ecclesiastical authority, for we meet with no English councils after that of Winchester, till the reign of Alfred the Great.

This glorious monarch was the restorer of the lustre of the English church with that of the state. The most material of his ecclesiastical institutions were probably made about the year 877 or 878, till which time, from his accession, he had been engaged in perpetual wars with the Danes; the first part of these is little more than a transcript of the Decalogue, omitting the second commandment, because repugnant to image-worship, which had by this time gained footing in England. These are followed by an abridgment of the regulations instituted by Moses in the book of Exodus (which, for their curiosity, I shall here insert in a note*); after which we find a short introduction to his code of civil laws, which the reader will find at large in its proper place, to which we refer him.

So destructive had been the ravages of the Danes throughout England in one part of Alfred's reign, that he himself informs us, in his epistle to Wulf-gig, bishop of London, there was not to be found, on the south side of the Thames, a man who could translate a Latin epistle, or understand the English of the Latin service. To repair these defects, and to revive the taste for letters, he was obliged to send for ecclesiastics from foreign countries: of these we shall speak when we come to take notice of the learned men who flourished during the period under our consideration.

We shall now review some of the many benefactions of this great king to the church. He built two monasteries, one at Athelney, the place of his retreat, in Somersetshire; during the inroad of the Danes, the other at Winchester; which were afterwards, with almost all the monasteries in England, filled with married clergy. But Alfred finding that the religious and learned persons whom he had brought from abroad were not sufficient to people those foundations, he put into his monasteries a number of children, who were there educated, in order to qualify them for taking the profession when they should arrive at years of maturity. He also founded and endowed a nunnery at Shaftsbury, the nuns of which were all of them women of quality, and he made his own daughter, Ethelgitha, the first abbess. But notwithstanding Alfred was so great a benefactor to the monks, yet was he far from encouraging them in an inactive or useless manner of life, but by his own example taught them the way in which he expected they should walk.

His works of charity were great and eminent. In conformity with the prevailing fashion of vows of poverty, introduced by the monks, he devoted to God one half of his annual revenue, to be bestowed in works of piety, and these he caused to be distributed into four equal portions or parts.

The first of the four parts he assigned to the relief of the poor in general. The second, to the support and maintenance of the two monasteries which he had built. The third, to the maintenance of the schools which he founded. And the fourth and last, to the general relief of all the monasteries and religious houses in England, and, as occasion served, beyond sea likewise.

Thus was Alfred at once the father of the church and state, but without degenerating into any of the meannesses too common with his ancestors, who had paid implicit obedience to the church of Rome: for, during the reign of this great king, we meet with none of the insolent intermeddling of that court in matters relating to the English church, nor can we learn that the pope pretended in the least to dictate with regard to the methods which Alfred took to propagate religion and piety in his dominions.

But in the succeeding reign of his son Edward, surnamed the Elder, who, though he inherited all his father's virtues, was unequal to him in abilities, we find a very particular exertion of the authority of the Roman see; for (A. D. 901.) pope Formosus, if we may credit the authority of Malmesbury, and there has hitherto appeared no good reason to invalidate it, being informed that the bishopric of Wessex had been vacant seven years, sent over a bull, excommunicating the king and all his subjects on that account, which so terrified Edward and the people, that, in a general assembly of the states, Plegmund, archbishop of Canterbury, was sent to Rome to deprecate the pontiff's wrath, who graciously relented, on the archbishop's promise that not only all the vacant bishoprics in the kingdom should be immediately filled up, but that three new ones should be erected in Wessex; which was accordingly complied with, and Plegmund, at his return to England, consecrated seven prelates in one day*.

Plegmund dying in 923, was succeeded as archbishop of Canterbury by Wulfhelm, bishop of Wells, who crowned Athelstan, at Kingston upon Thames, A. D. 925.

During the reign of this prince was held the synod of Greatly, A. D. 928. The canons which it enjoined were nine in number. As the introduction is remarkable, I shall give it the reader entire:

"I Athelstan, king, by the advice of Wulfhelm my archbishop, and other my bishops, command all my reeves, in the name of the Lord and his saints, that they do in the first place give tythes of all my estate, both of the living stock and of the fruits of the earth; and that all the bishops do the same of all that belongs to them; and also my aldermen and reeves: and my will is, that my bishops, and aldermen, and reeves give this in charge to all that are subject to them, and that they do it effectually by the time that we here fixed, that is, the Beheading of St. John Baptist. I Athelstan, king, declare to all my reeves, with advice of archbishop, bishops, and servants of God, that it is my will, that, for the forgiveness of my sins, ye always feed one poor Englishman; and give him, from two of my farms, every month an amber of meal and a gammon of bacon, or one ram worth four pence; and one shroud every year, for the twelve months' wear: and that ye set at liberty some one that has, for his crimes, been condemned to slavery; for the mercies of Christ and for my love, with the testimony of the bishop in whose district it is: and if the reeve with-hold it, let him pay thirty shillings as a satisfaction; and let the money be distributed to the poor who dwell in the town where this omission was made, under the testimony of the bishop."

After this follows the II^d article, commanding the magistrates to put the laws in execution against such as were convicted by all the circumstances of a trial by ordeal.

The III^d is against witchcraft, and robbers infesting the highways.

The IVth regulates the number of mints: for which see the civil laws of this king, in the following pages.

The Vth prescribes the circumstances and ceremonies of the ordeal trial, by which a person may be known to be guilty or not. In this canon the priests are spoken of, as having fixed and settled places; and the accused person is permitted to have the consecrated bread.

The VIIIth orders the bishops to assist the judges in the execution of the laws, and to sit upon the bench with them.

This plainly proves that the power of bishops extended, long before the conquest, to secular as well as ecclesiastical matters; and that they then enjoyed temporal privileges equal to those of the greatest noblemen.

The IXth and last canon inflicts a fine upon such magistrates as should be found remiss in their duty; which fine was to be paid to the bishop of the diocese in which such magistrate dwelt.

After the death of Athelstan, Odo, bishop of Sherburne, was promoted to the see of Canterbury, in the room of Wulfhelm, deceased, A. D. 929. This prelate was by extraction a Dane, born in East Anglia: his parents, being pagans, and of great eminence in their country, disinherited young Odo on account of his attachment to Christianity; but he was soon taken notice of by a nobleman called Eadhelm, by whose patronage he got the see of Sherburne. Edmund, the successor of Athelstan, prevailed on him, after many ridiculous qualms, which were only so many masks to his real ambition, to accept the see of Canterbury: and no sooner was this bigotted priest invested with the archiepiscopal dignity than he published a body of canons, which in his preamble he terms, "institutions not unworthy any worshipper of Christ." This was in the year 943.

The Ist of these canons guards against all violation of the church's property, by threatening the delinquent with the high censure of excommunication, and concludes with this impious expression, which justifies the character I have elsewhere given of this archbishop: "that they who refuse to obey church discipline are more bold than the soldiers who sacrificed Jesus Christ."

The II^d begins with this insolent admonition: "We admonish (says he) all kings, princes, and all who are in authority, to obey in all humility their archbishops and bishops, because the keys of heaven are given to them, and to them is given the power of binding and loosing."

* It may not be improper to give our readers the names of those prelates, which were as follow: Tudstan bishop of Winchester, Werestan of Sherborn, Kenulph of Dorchester, Beornoc of Silfey, Wulfhelm of Wells, Eadulph of Cuerton, and Athelstan of Padstow in Cornwall. The three last were newly erected sees, and that in Cornwall was probably to satisfy the court of Rome, by erecting a bishopric of her own in a country that had presumed to controvert her authority.

In the III^d the bishops are exhorted to discharge their duty of visiting and preaching to their flock throughout their diocese every year, without mercenary views or the respect of persons.

The IVth, Vth, and VIth lay down the duties of priests, clergymen, and monks.

The VIIth prohibits unlawful marriages within the degrees of affinity.

The VIIIth recommends unity and charity.

The IXth enjoins fasting on Wednesday, Friday, and the four Ember weeks. And

The Xth prescribes the payment of tythes, from proofs drawn from the Mosaic institution, without any mention of Ethelwolf's charter.

About the year 941, some say 944, a great synod was held at London, under Edmund, wherein several constitutions passed, the most remarkable of which is, that bishops were enjoined to repair their churches, and the king required to establish funds for their support.

In the course of the following year we find another assembly held for the advancement of the Christian religion, and the maintenance of unity and concord among the people. In this synod, churches and royal palaces were made places of sanctuary; and it was enacted that no remission should be given for any mulct inflicted for breaking the peace, nor any abatement in satisfaction for murder.

In this king's reign the famous charter of privileges was granted to Glastonbury abbey, and was engrossed in letters of gold, in a book of the four Evangelists, which the king made a present to this abbey. The privileges were so extraordinary, that it seemed as if the king had a mind to invest the abbey with a kind of sovereign power within the limits of its own jurisdiction.

About this period the famous Dunstan began to make a great figure both in church and state. He was born in Somersetshire, was descended of a noble family, from whom he inherited a large estate. He received his education at Glastonbury, under the care of an Irish monk, in great repute for his learning.

Dunstan travelled much in his youth, and it was while he was abroad that he seems to have contracted a fondness for the monkish discipline. On his return home he was introduced to court by his friends, where he recommended himself to the great men by his parts, learning, address, and skill in music. But he was much better qualified to insinuate himself into the good graces of the people, than he was to keep their favour; for whether from an haughty, busy, intermeddling temper, or the impertinence and arrogance of his behaviour, he soon created himself abundance of enemies. He seems to have been regular in the general tenor of his living; and had he been as free from the vices of that diabolical spirit, which (according to Osbern's ridiculous relations) haunted him all his life, as he was from the human frailties of incontinence and luxury, he would have been an useful man in his station; but he had too much of that spiritual pride, which, if employed in the service of the monks, gets a man the character of a saint, though it dips him in the sins of sedition and rebellion, and reduces a kingdom to a scene of blood, confusion, and desolation. This disposition of his soon lost him the good graces of Athelstan, who had entertained him with great kindness; but seeing into his aspiring views, discarded him. Dunstan upon this retired in a pett from public life, from whence he was afterwards recalled by king Edmund, at his accession to the throne, and made his confessor. But here again he quickly obliged his patron to dismiss him: however, having some powerful friends about Edmund's person, they prevailed upon that prince to send for him again: from hence he grew into an amazing degree of favour with him and his brother Ethred. Other particulars of Dunstan's life have already been related in the civil history.

The abbey of Croyland was rebuilt in the reign of Edmund, by Turkytel, the king's cousin and chancellor. This nobleman afterwards turned monk himself, and was made abbot of the above monastery by Ethred, who put him in possession by the delivery of a pastoral staff, according to the custom of those days. Turkytel obtained a very advantageous charter for this abbey; however, Edmund refused to grant the privilege of sanctuary, which that abbey had enjoyed before it was destroyed, to which, we are told, he was advised by the abbot himself.

In 959, Edgar gave a short charter to the see of Canterbury, by which she was made the mother and mistress of all churches within the English dominions, with several other extraordinary privileges. In this Edgar seems to have imitated the emperor Phocas, who made a like grant to pope Boniface, in favour of the bishopric of Rome.

A. D. 961, Dunstan was promoted to the archbishopric of Canterbury, upon the dismissal of Brighthelm, a pious, humane, good, and valuable man, who was ejected from his see without any canonical crime being so much as objected against him, merely to make room for this turbulent and ambitious priest: however, a journey to Rome and the papal compliment of the pall, served to gloss over his intrusion into a full see, in open violation of the most essential rules of ecclesiastical discipline.

On his exaltation he exerted all his power and influence to re-establish his beloved friends the monks in the possession of the monasteries, which were occupied by the married clergy: yet, notwithstanding all his eagerness of affection for them, it was not in his power to re-establish them in the monasteries of the north, which had been deserted above two hundred years, insomuch that the whole province of Northumberland was in a manner unacquainted with the monastic name or habit.

As Edgar's views upon the crown had been greatly assisted by the monkish order, Dunstan readily obtained every favour he could ask, and accordingly he got Oswald made bishop of Worcester, who had been educated a monk in France, and was nephew to the archbishop Odo; and the see of Winchester filled up by Ethelwulph, or Ethelwald, a monk of Glastonbury; whose zeal for the religious rendered them proper seconds for their promoter. Soon after an order was procured from the king, by which the secular clergy were turned out of the old abbey of Winchester. This success only served to animate Dunstan and his coadjutors to new attempts, and they at length prevailed on Edgar to call a council, in which he himself presided, with a resolution to carry the reformation through with a high hand against the secular clergy. In this synod Edgar made a speech, which plainly shewed shewed how greatly he was prejudiced in favour of the monks; and as it discovers at the same time the disposition of the king, of Dunstan, and of the other director of the affairs of the church with regard to the secular clergy, the reader will not perhaps be displeased to find the whole of it in this place, as translated by the reverend Mr. Collier, who observes, that this harangue is raised and polished in the original much above the elocution of the tenth century, and, therefore, says he should have supposed Josselin (archbishop Parker's secretary) might have worked the matter he found into a more elegant form, had he not met with it as it stands in Rievallensis, an ancient historian.

"Since God hath pleased, most reverend father, to shew his goodness to us in a remarkable manner, it is most reasonable that we should exert our endeavours to make a suitable return; and since he has given us so large a command, it is our duty to employ our authority to his honour, and bring our subjects to the observance of his laws. Now as it is my office to inspect the conduct of the laity, to take care that there be no stop upon justice, to punish the sacrilegious, to correct the ungovernable, to protect the weak against the mighty, and to deliver the poor from him that is too strong for him; so I am likewise concerned to promote the interest of the church, to enquire into the behaviour of the clergy and religious, to see that they manage themselves suitably to their character; whether they are careful in the administration of their office, and constant in their instructions; whether they are moderate in their refreshments, regular in their habit, prudent and equitable in deciding the causes that come before them.

"And, under favour, reverend father, if you had looked thoroughly into these matters, we had never had the dissatisfaction of receiving so scandalous a charge against the clergy: and here not to mention their failings in the shape of the tonsure, not to mention this, I say, what effeminacy do they discover in their habit, what haughtiness in their gesture and motion, what licence in their discourse and conversation: and are not these all signs that things are terribly out of order within? Then as to the business of their function, with what negligence is the divine service performed: they will scarce vouchsafe their company at the holy vigils; and when they enter upon the most solemn parts of religion, they appear with a foreign air, and fall short of the gravity of the occasion. I am sorry to say how excessive they are in their entertainments, how much they are governed by an intemperate appetite, and what lengths they have taken in libertine practice; thus the encouragements of religion are perverted, and the bounty of princes abused. Had our ancestors foreseen their liberality would have been squandered away thus profusely, and spent upon luxury and disorder, they would certainly have held their hand. And if all this misbehaviour had been private and unobserved, the case had been more tolerable; but, alas! the crimes break out into public notice, and the scandal grows notorious; and yet, methinks, the liberty is strangely connived at and overlooked by the prelacy: would not the sword of Levi, would not the zeal of Simeon, be seasonably drawn and exerted upon this occasion? Where is the spirit of Moses, who punished the idolatry of the golden calf in his own blood and relations? Where is Phineas's lance, to pursue debauchery and execute justice without delay? And yet we see this severity of zeal, this sudden revenge, was acceptable to God Almighty. What is become of St. Peter's indignation and censure against simony and covetousness? You that are the priests of the most high God, ought to copy the proceedings, and be governed by the precedents, of him you represent. It is high time to appear against those who have broke through the rules of duty and religion. I have Constantine's, and you have St. Peter's sword; let us join our force, and unite our respective authorities, that by employing the spiritual and civil power in the same cause, and being thus assistant to each other, the lepers may be discharged the camp, the holy sanctuary may be cleaned, and the sons of Levi put into the temple ministrations: of Levi, I say, who was governed by no partialities to his relations; who said unto his father and his mother, I have not seen him, neither did he acknowledge his brethren. Awaken your discipline, therefore, I beseech you, that we may not repent our bounty, nor be sorry for our kindness to the church; let the disrespect shewn to the relics of the saints, let the profaning the altars with unsuitable approaches, provoke you to animadversion, and do not suffer the piety of our ancestors to be defeated any longer. You know how much my father, grand-father, great grand-father, &c. have lessened their royal revenues, and exhausted their exchequer, in religious benefactions.

"Most reverend father Dunstan, I desire you would raise your imagination upon this occasion: pray look up to heaven a little; fancy you see my father in his station of glory, glittering among the stars, and ready to launch himself from the sky; imagine you hear him deliver himself to you in this language of expostulation and complaint: "O venerable father Dunstan, you used to suggest serviceable advice to me about the building of churches and monasteries; you prompted my piety upon all opportunities, and assisted in the execution of the project; I pitched upon you particularly for my pastor and spiritual father, for the guardian of my soul and the inspector of my behaviour; and did I not always comply with whatever you suggested? Did I not always prefer your advice to patrimony and treasure? How frankly have I laid out my fortune on your proposals; my distributions of charity were always ready, when you called for them. If land or privilege was desired for the church, it was done as soon as mentioned; if you complained the monks or clergy were short in their conveniences, they were immediately supplied by the court. You used to tell me, that the best use of money was to spend it upon the church and poor; that such liberalities would prove immortal in the benefit, help towards an atonement for our failings, and prove the greatest charities to the giver. And is it not an intolerable misapplication, that this holy revenue should be expended upon women, and misemployed for the support of vanity and unnecessary figure? What can you answer to such a charge as this?"

"I am convinced (says king Edgar), most holy father, that this is none of your fault: when you saw a thief, you consented not unto him, neither have you been partaker with the adulterers. No, you have entreated and menaced, but all to no purpose: and since words signify nothing, it is time time to rise in your discipline, and come to blows. For this purpose you shall be sure not to want the countenance of royal authority: you have likewise Ethelwald and Oswald, the right reverend fathers of Winchester and Worcester, ready to assist you. I give you three a joint commission for this purpose, and refer the management wholly to you; it is your part, therefore, to exert the episcopal authority in conjunction with that of the crown, to expel the disorderly clergy from the monasteries, and put in such as live regularly in their place."

This speech had the desired effect, and the reformers carried their point in most places. But the secular clergy soon after applied to the king himself for redress; and Edgar, willing to preserve a shew of moderation, appointed them a hearing before a general council, convened for that purpose, at Winchester, at which the king, queen, and temporal nobility were present. But here Dunstan, by an impious juggle, got the better of his antagonists; for finding the debates likely to go against him, and that the principal laity were for restoring the secular clergy to their former possessions, he was put to a stand, and made a pause for an answer. And now it seems that there was a deep silence in the court; but before the archbishop could declare himself, an answer was given from heaven: for a crucifix, hanging up in the room, pronounced with an audible voice, "Non fiet, non fiet, judicatis bene, mutaretis non bene.—It must not be done, it must not be done; you have already determined well, and would do ill to change." The assembly, astonished with the oracle, was asked by Dunstan, what farther satisfaction they could desire, "for you have heard (says ye) the matter decided by God himself." Upon this the clergy submitted, and left the monks in possession of their revenues*.

In the latter end of Edgar's reign a body of canons were published, which were translated by sir Henry Spelman from a Saxon MS. in Bennet college, Cambridge: the authenticity of the original is indisputable. By the very particular form of confession annexed to these canons, it appears that it was not yet the practice of the church to invoke the Virgin Mary and the saints; for the penitent is ordered to repeat the Lord's Prayer sixty times in the day, but no mention is made of the Ave Maria, as enjoined at present by the Roman church. By the XVIIth article of these canons parents are enjoined to teach their children the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed, on pain of not being admitted the eucharist, nor interred in consecrated ground. And as we shall find in some future canons, it is ordered that the Lord's Prayer, the Apostle's Creed, the Collect for the day, and the Epistle and Gospel should be read in the churches on Sundays in English, I think it is plain that the artful custom of performing the whole of divine service in Latin was not practised in the Roman church; and moreover, as the archbishops and bishops were at this time subject to the papal decrees, it cannot be supposed that the popes would have suffered such a schism in the church of England, as omitting the invocation of the Virgin Mary, performing part of the service in English, denying, transubstantiation, &c. if these practices had really been deemed heretical at this time: and since the foundation of monasteries, and almost all church regulations, were established on the same rules and orders subsisting at Rome, it is a fair inference, that in articles of faith and discipline they agreed also. We shall likewise find, in the course of these pages, that the real presence in the eucharist was openly denied, and the contrary maintained and preached, without any anathemas from the Roman pontiff, or separation in the church, till many years after the Norman conquest.

A. D. 972, Oswald, bishop of Worcester, was preferred to the see of York, and permitted to hold that of Worcester together with it. A monk himself, he, on all occasions, sought to please and provide for his monkish brethren, and with that view a great number of the fraternity were induced to come from foreign parts, and settle in England. Twelve of these he sent to Ramsey, in Huntingdonshire, where Alwin, duke or earl of East Anglia, had founded a religious house; and, among other immunities granted by charter to this house, it is specified that no bishop shall, on any pretence whatever, demand entertainment of the monks, or levy any kind of tax upon them.

Upon the death of Edgar, in 975, the secular clergy, who had been outed from their abbey and other church preferments by the cabals of the monks, began now to bestir themselves in order to recover their former footing. They were supported by Elfgar, earl of Mercia, who ejected the monks and abbots from their possessions; while these latter were patronized by another party of the nobility, who were in the interests of Dunstan. This contest gave rise to several councils, particularly to one at Calne, in Wiltshire, held in the year 978. The advocate for the secular clergy was one Beornhelm, who challenged Dunstan to dispute the contested subject in public, which the archbishop meanly evaded by pretending that it had already been decided by the voice of heaven, speaking through the crucifix, as we have already related that story. Besides which, this crafty priest had recourse to another miraculous attestation in his favour, which supplied the place of reason and argument; for each party sitting in a different place in the room, the floor suddenly fell in, by which many of the seculars, both peers and clergy, were miserably maimed, and some killed outright; while Dunstan and his party remained at the other end of the room unhurt, the beam which supported it being the only one that was unbroken. This accident struck the assembly with conviction in favour of the monks, who were immediately reinstated. The reader will naturally make the proper reflections on this seasonable miracle, without my being at the pains to point it out to him.

A. D. 988, died the famous Dunstan, and, for reasons sufficiently obvious, was canonized for a saint, and his festival appointed on the 20th of February. He was succeeded in the see of Canterbury by one Ethelgar, formerly a monk of Glastonbury; but he enjoying his dignity only three months, was succeeded by Siric, also a monk, and bishop of Ramsbury, in Wiltshire, who stands branded in history for the infamous counsel he gave king Ethelred to purchase his peace with the Danes*,

† This is taken from Mr. Collier, who, with the true spirit of an high-priest, remarks that he is loth to suppose St. Dunstan in a practice to over-rule this case; and that there might be some art used without the privity of the prelate.

* See page 91. of this vol.

though it is to be observed that no part of the Danegelt was paid by the clergy †.

In the year 992 died Oſwald, archbishop of York, who was ſucceeded by Adulph, who governed this church till 1002.

In the year 995, Aldwin, biſhop of Holy Iſland, removed the bones of St. Cuthbert to the city of Durham, where he built a cathedral, and fixed his ſee. This year likewiſe died Siric, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and was ſucceeded by Alfric, or Elfric, who is highly praiſed by all hiſtorians for his many amiable and virtuous qualifications.

A. D. 1001, under the reign of Ethelred, a miſſion was ſent from England, at the requeſt of Aulaff, or Olaff, king of Sweden, to convert his ſubjects and the Norwegians to Chriſtianity. The heads of this miſſion were Sigefrid, archdeacon (and not archbiſhop, as moſt of our modern hiſtorians miſtakenly have it) of York, Eſchel, Gunebald, Rodolph, and Bernard; whoſe joint labours proved ſo ſucceſſful, that idolatry was put to flight whereſoever they came. Sigefrid was made biſhop of Wexca, in Eaſt Gothland; Bernard had the honour to baptize king Aulaff; Eſchel is enrolled in the Engliſh martyrology; and Gunebald, after having been made a Swediſh biſhop, loſt his life in preaching Chriſtianity to the natives of that country.

It is worthy our notice, that during the reign of Ethelred, the Engliſh church, notwithſtanding its ſubordination to that of Rome, had not adopted the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, as will appear by the following tranſlation from one of the Saxon homilies.

“ There is a great difference between the inviſible qualities of this ſacrament, and what it appears to us in its ſenſible qualities. In the former of theſe it is corruptible bread and wine, but by the virtue of the divine inſtitution it becometh truly the body and blood of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, after conſecration; yet not in a corporeal, but in a ſpiritual manner. The body in which Jeſus Chriſt ſuffered and the eucharistical body are widely different; the firſt was born of the bleſſed Virgin, and conſiſted of blood, bones, nerves, and limbs, animated by a rational ſoul; but the eucharistic body is composed of ſeveral grains of wheat, and has neither blood, bones, nerves, limbs, nor ſoul; we ought then not to form any corporeal idea of it, but to underſtand it wholly in a ſpiritual ſenſe.”

And in another homily is the following remarkable paragraph :

“ The ſacrament of the eucharist is not the body in which our Saviour ſuffered for us, nor the blood he ſhed for our ſakes; but it becomes his body and his blood in a ſpiritual ſenſe; in the ſame manner as the manna which fell from heaven, and the water which at Moſes’ bidding flowed from the rock ‡.”

A. D. 1006, died Alfric, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and was ſucceeded by Ælphagus, or Alphage, who was of a noble family, and had been a monk of Deerhurſt, in Gloceſterſhire. Under him ſeveral ſynods were held; and thoſe of Engſham and Haba conſiſted of the temporal as well as the eccleſiaſtical powers, and convened to remedy the diſorders in ſtate; therefore the laws which paſſed therein partake of both kinds ||. We have, in a former part of this hiſtory, related the catastrophe of this prelate, who was barbarouſly murdered by the Danes for not complying with their exorbitant demands, at the time they laid Canterbury in aſhes.

The next archbiſhop of Canterbury was Livinus, who had before been biſhop of Wells: he died after having filled his ſee ſeven years, and was ſucceeded by Agelnoth, ſurnamed the Good, ſon of Ægelmar, an Engliſh earl.

Agelnoth was a prelate equally remarkable for his piety and reſolution; for at the acceſſion of Harold Harefoot he peremptorily reſuſed to perform the ceremony of that prince’s coronation, declaring that he had promiſed Canute to crown no prince but the poſterity of Emma: having declared his ſentiments with this noble freedom, he ſet the diadem on the altar, and denounced the vengeance of heaven upon any prelate who ſhould place it on the head of Harold. This prelate had great intereſt with Canute, who owed no ſmall part of his popularity to his ſage and politic advice.

In the reign of this prince, the complaiſance of the Engliſh church to the ſee of Rome ſeemed to be far advanced: the invocation of the Virgin Mary and ſaints in glory was now introduced, but not in ſo direct a manner as in aftertimes, the addreſs towards them being rather in the form of a wiſh than immediate application or homage. In the great charter of Canute to the abbey of Glaſtonbury, mention is made of the bleſſed Virgin and all the ſaints, as intreating interceſſion for the patrons of that monaſtery *. The immediate addreſs, as far as we have been able to trace it, does not ſeem to have been introduced into the Engliſh ſervice till the eleventh century, at which time, in the homily of the Aſſumption of the bleſſed Virgin, we find a direct prayer to the bleſſed Virgin, for her interceſſion.

Canute provided for the honour and peace of the church by ſeveral excellent eccleſiaſtical laws, the principal of which are as follow § :

The IVth enjoins all Chriſtians to pay great reſpect to the clergy, becauſe their ſacerdotal functions are extremely beneficial to the people.

By the Vth, if a prieſt was accuſed of any crime, he had the liberty of purging himſelf by ſaying maſs and receiving the eucharist.

The XIIth recommends celibacy to the clergy, and ſays, “ if a prieſt abſtains from the uſe of women, may God have mercy on him, and let him

† They, good men! thought, in all probability, that their prayers were alone ſufficient.

‡ Theſe homilies are in Latin titled Sermones catholici; the tranſlation, in old Engliſh, ſuppoſed to be done by Alfric, archbiſhop of Canterbury, is preſerved in the Bodleian library and in that of Bennet college, Cambridge.

|| The moſt remarkable of the eccleſiaſtical laws, or canons, are as follow :

In the council of Engſham, the IIId canon enjoins the celibacy of the clergy.

The VIIth forbids all perſons doing any wrong to the church, or to eject a clergyman out of his benefice without the conſent of the biſhop.

By the XVIIth, every Friday was to be a faſt, unleſs it fell upon a holiday.

The XXth enjoins frequent confeſſions, and orders the people to receive the ſacrament three times at leaſt in a year.

The council of Haba has but one canon worth notice, which is the IIId, by which every Chriſtian was enjoined to faſt three days, with bread and water, before the feaſt of St. Michael, and to diſtribute among the poor what he ſhould have eaten in theſe three days.

* The words of the original are, “ Si quis — deſenfore ſtuduerit; beatiffimæ Dei genetricis Mariæ, & omnium ſanctorum, interceſſione amplifcet, Deus portionem ejus in terra vivendum.”

§ In the preamble, it is ſaid, theſe laws were drawn up at Wincheſter by the advice of the wiſe men of the nation, that is, the prelates and nobles.

have the worldly honour of a thane," that is, let him be ranked among the gentry.

The XXth ordains, that at funerals the dues be paid to the priest immediately on breaking up the ground; and that the dues be paid to the parish the deceased belonged to, though he was buried elsewhere.

The XXIIId enjoins the observance of Sundays from Saturday three o'clock till Monday break of day.

The XXIIIId determines the times of fasting, and places the vigils of the festivals of the blessed Virgin and of the apostles among the fasts.

There are several others, relating to the payment of tythes and Peter's pence, &c.

A. D. 1038, Agelnoth, archbishop of Canterbury, dying, his see was conferred on Eadsius, Harold's chaplain, who afterwards crowned Edward the Confessor, and instructed that prince in the knowledge of the English laws and constitutions. As this prelate was of an infirm constitution, he was indulged, during his bad state of health, to govern his see by a substitute, or deputy †, who at that time held his residence in St. Martin's in the Fields.

When, by Edward's invitation, a flood of Norman foreigners came over to this kingdom, Rodbert, a Norman monk, was made bishop of London, and, after the death of Eadsius, promoted to the see of Canterbury. He was driven from thence in the manner already related ‖, and Stigand, bishop of Winchester, was placed in his room, A. D. 1054. This prelate held both Canterbury and the see of Winchester, already in his possession. Rodbert, the ejected archbishop, appealed to the pope against these proceedings; but Stigand, without troubling himself about it, or staying for the pope's determination, who suspended him, got himself consecrated, and, notwithstanding this suspension, and although he had never applied to Rome for the pall, continued his archiepiscopal functions till he was deposed by William the Conqueror*.

Edward, towards the latter end of his reign, being disturbed with some scruples concerning a vow he had made in his exile to visit Rome, the performance of which he was now desirous of accomplishing, he found himself opposed therein by all the great men of his kingdom, upon which, as we have observed in our civil history, pope Leo IX. was prevailed on to commute it, upon condition of his founding a new monastery: in consequence of which St. Peter's, Westminster, was built, and Edward sent an embassy to Rome for the confirmation of the privileges bestowed upon this new foundation. The persons nominated for this purpose were Aldred, metropolitan of York; Tofti, Godwin's son; Giso, bishop of Wells; and Walter, bishop of Hereford.

Nicholas II. who was then pope, gave the ambassadors a very favourable reception, Aldred excepted, who was tried and convicted of simony in a Romish council, for holding the sees of York and Worcester together, without a dispensation from the holy see, and deprived of his character and jurisdiction. The ambassadors, on their return, had the misfortune to be set upon and robbed by a gang of banditti, upon which they were fain to return back to Rome; and Tofti applying to pope Nicholas to be reimbursed for the loss they had sustained, was flatly refused by his holiness. This produced some altercation, in the course of which Tofti gave his holiness clearly to understand, that if he did not comply with a good grace, he would, immediately on his return to England, make use of all his interest with the king his master to stop the payment of Peter's pence, till the pope should have indemnified the embassy for the damage it had sustained.

This high language startled his holiness, and he knew too much of Tofti not to fear that he would make good his threats. In order, therefore, to compromise the affair, and appease Tofti's clamour, Nicholas agreed that Aldred should be restored to his dignity and even receive the pall as archbishop of York, provided he would resign the see of Worcester. The proposal was embraced, the accommodation effected, and the pope sent two legates into England with Aldred, to assist him in consecrating Wulfstan bishop of Worcester, Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, being looked upon as an usurper by the court of Rome, in that he had taken possession of the see of Canterbury during the life of Rodbert the Norman, without having applied to the pope for a pall. But Stigand, who knew himself to be received by the king and people of England as an archbishop, supported his rights on this occasion with an exemplary magnanimity of spirit, and obliged Aldred to declare, before the king and council, that he renounced all pretensions to ecclesiastical or secular authority over Wulfstan, on account of his having consecrated him, or his having been a monk under him before his consecration.

About this time Elfgwine, abbot of St. Augustine's, in Canterbury, was, in respect to his founder, highly honoured by pope Alexander II. for going on a visit to Rome, that pontiff bestowed on him the badges of a mitre and sandals, though peculiar only to the episcopal order; and he continued in possession of these marks of distinction till the persecution raised against him under William the Conqueror, by whom he was expelled the kingdom.

As the ecclesiastical laws of Edward are so interwoven with the political as hardly to be separated, we shall, therefore, refer our readers to the ensuing pages, where he will find them under their proper class; but as the VIIIth and IXth of these laws are but slightly hinted at, I shall here set them down at large, as they are of great ecclesiastical importance, and prove that parish churches endowed with tythes were then common in England.

VIII. "The tenth sheaf is due to God of all corn, and therefore to be paid. If any one keep a family of mares, let him pay the tenth colt: let him that has one or two only, pay a penny for every colt. So let him that hath many cows pay the tenth calf; he that has but one cow, an half-penny for every calf: let him that maketh cheeses, pay to God the tenth cheese; let him that doth not, pay the milk every tenth day: likewise the tenth lamb, the tenth fleece, the tenth butter, the tenth cheese, the tenth pig.

IX. "Likewise of bees the tenth of the profit. Likewise the tenth is to be given to God, who giveth the nine parts as well as the tenth, of wood, meadows, water-mills, parks, warrens, fisheries, officers, gardens, and negotiations. Let him that detaineth it be constrained by the bishop's court, and by the king's if that be necessary: for the blessed Austin preached and taught this, and it was granted by the king, the barons, and the people. But afterwards many detained them by instinct of the devil; and priests being rich and negligent, did not care to be at the pains to collect them in, because they had sufficient maintenance, for there are now three or four churches in many places, where then there was but one; and thus tythes have come to be lessened."

Mr. Camden, from the Canterbury History, makes Honorius, archbishop of Canterbury in the year 636, the first who divided his diocese into parishes; but there is great reason to question whether this division ought to be taken as answering to the modern division of parochial cures.

This last seems to have taken its rise from the conveniency of great men and subjects of property, who did not care to have a new priest at every turn, which was the case when the clergy led an itinerant life without being fixed to any particular cure which took care of their maintenance: the bishops readily concurred with this disposition, as it freed them from the expence of maintaining a number of labourers that might come accidentally into their dioceses. It appears, however, from the above laws of Edward, as well as from many parts of our history, that the noblemen and others were, in general, very remiss in furnishing their quotas towards the support of the clergy they had fixed among them: this, in all probability, gave occasion to the frequent acts which, after the reign of Ethelwolf, were passed to enforce the payment of tythes in the strictest sense.

Such was the rise of the parochial division, which was almost quite settled in the reign of Edgar, or at least of Canute the Great. Between that time and the reign of Edward the Confessor, there were some further divisions, but in all appearance there were very few new ones after the Norman conquest; at least we find, by several charters of the latter Saxon kings, that the parishes of Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, and Lincolnshire, were the same as at present†: whence it may be fairly presumed that the parishes of other counties agreed with our modern division‡.

It may be proper in this place, for the reader's better understanding the future part of the history of the church, to give an account from the latest edition of Mr. Camden's Britannia, of the divisions both of dioceses and parishes, as under the two metropolitans.

In the Province of CANTERBURY.

Canterbury, with Rochester, contains the county of Kent. London; Essex, Middlesex, and part of Hertfordshire. Chichester; Sussex. Winchester; Hampshire, Surry, and the Isle of Wight, with Guernsey and Jersey islands lying upon the coast of Normandy. Salisbury; Wiltshire and Berkshire. Exeter; Devonshire and Cornwall. Bath and Wells jointly; Somersetshire. Gloucester, Gloucestershire. Worcester; Worcestershire and part of Warwickshire. Hereford; Herefordshire and part of Shropshire. Coventry and Litchfield; Staffordshire, Derbyshire, and the other part of Warwickshire, as also that part of Shropshire which borders upon the river Repil. Lincoln, the largest; six counties, Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, Huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and the other part of Hertfordshire. Ely; Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely. Norwich; Norfolk and Suffolk. Oxford; Oxfordshire. Peterborough; Northamptonshire and Rutlandshire. Bristol; Dorsetshire. To which eighteen dioceses in England must be added those of Wales, which were deprived of an archbishop of their own, and are also made fewer, seven hardly coming into four: these are St. David's, whose seat is at St. David's, Llandaff, Bangor, and St. Asaph or Devenis.

In the Province of YORK.

York itself comprehends Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire. Chester; Cheshire, Richmondshire, and Lancashire, with part of Cumberland, Flintshire, and Denbighshire. Durham; the bishopric of Durham and Northumberland. Carlisle; part of Cumberland and Westmoreland. To which number may be added the bishopric of Sodor, in the Isle of Man.

Among these the archbishop of Canterbury takes the first place, the archbishop of York the second, the bishop of London the third, the bishop of Durham the fourth, and the bishop of Winchester the fifth; the rest take place according to the time of their consecration: but if any of the other bishops happen to be secretary of state, in virtue thereof he takes the first place next to these three. Besides twenty-six deaneries, thirteen whereof were erected in the larger churches by Henry VIII. upon his expulsion of the monks, the archdeacons are sixty; and the dignitaries and prebends make five hundred and forty-four. There are also nine thousand two hundred and eighty-four parish churches, under the bishops; of which three thousand eight hundred and forty-five are appropriate, as is plain from the catalogue exhibited to king James I. which I have here subjoined. Now appropriate churches are such as, by the authority of the pope and the consent of the king and the bishop of the diocese, were, on certain conditions, annexed to those monasteries, bishoprics, colleges, and hospitals, whose revenues were but small, either because they were built upon their ground, or granted by the lords of the manor. Such a settlement is expressed in law by being united, annexed, and incorporated forever: but upon the subversion of the monasteries, these, to the great damage of the church, were made lay fees.

All that now remains to finiſh this ſketch of the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of this country, is to give a brief account of the tranſactions of the Welch church during the ſame period. In or about the reign of king Alfred, no leſs than ſeven ſynods were held at Llandaff; but their particular dates are not come down to us. In the firſt, king Teudor was excommunicated for the complicated crimes of perjury and murder. In the ſecond, held by Berthgwin, one king Clolti underwent the ſame ſentence for the like offence. In the third, aſſembled under the ſame prelate, Gurcan was put under eccleſiaſtical deprivation for inceſt with his mother-in-law. The fourth ſynod was convened by biſhop Cerenher, in which one king Howel was excommunicated for murder and perjury. The ſame biſhop held the fifth ſynod, and excommunicated Coubli for the like crimes. The ſixth was held by Civiellanc, againſt king Brochmail*, who had incurred his diſpleaſure. And the ſeventh by biſhop Gulfied, in which the rights of the church ſanctuary were vigorously ſupported. In all thoſe ſynods the offenders not only made very ſubmiſſive concessions, but alſo paid large fines to the church. It is obſervable, that Aſſerius, the author of thoſe collections, whenever he ſpeaks of excommunication, mentions the clergy laying their croſſes upon the ground, and turning the bells of the churches upſide down.

Howel Dha, or Howel the Good, cotemporary with

Edmund king of England, has left a conſiderable collection of canons, compoſed in an aſſembly of his ſtates, which conſiſted of all his eminent clergy and ſix learned laymen, out of every hundred, or demut, of his kingdom: of theſe canons the only one truly remarkable is the XIIth, by which it is provided, “ That a woman might, upon three accounts, obtain a ſeparation and reſtitution of her portion from her huſband; firſt, if he had any tedious eruptions; ſecondly, if he was impotent; and thirdly, if he had a ſtinking breath.”

About the year 955, a ſynod was held at Llandaff, on account of ſome ravages committed againſt the church by king Nogui, who ſubmitted to eccleſiaſtical cenſure. Another ſynod was held at the ſame place in the year 991, by Gurcan, who had been conſecrated biſhop of Llandaff by Dunſtan; here eccleſiaſtical cenſure was paſſed upon one king Arthmail, who had murdered his brother, and the offender was obliged to expiate his offence by large donations to the church.

Thus, to whatever quarter of this kingdom we turn our eyes, we ſhall find popery and the overbearing inſolence of the monkish clergy ſapping the foundations of the civil power, and obſcuring the light of the Goſpel; and that the pretended diſpenſers of God's word and power, took care on all occaſions to provide for their own authority and emolument, whenever they had to do with bigotted and eaſy princes, or ſuch who ſtood in need of their intereſt.

But notwithſtanding all their arts, and the great condeſcenſion of the princes of the Saxon race in their favour, they could not keep to themſelves the election of biſhops and abbots; for the kings, juſtly alarmed at the growing power of the church, which, not contented with tyrannizing over the conſciences of the people, frequently ſnatched the ſceptre from the hands of their ſovereigns, began to think it neceſſary to oppoſe art to inſolence and prieſtcraft, and with this view kings began to interpoſe in elections by way of canvassing or recommendation, in order to exclude ſuch prelates or abbots whom they did not like, and to eſtabliſh thoſe on whoſe humility or complaiſance they thought they might place ſome dependence. In time, theſe proceedings ſucceeded ſo much in favour of the court, that in the reign of Ethelred II. we learn from Ingulphus, that the monks had entirely loſt the privilege of chuſing their abbots. It is remarkable that this writer, who was himſelf a monk, and is the moſt vehement in exclaiming againſt this abuſe as he calls it, was inſtalled in the abbey of Croyland by the very ſame methods, that is to ſay, by the ſole will of William I.

Having thus gone through all that relates to the church during the period before us, I ſhall now, in imitation of ſome of the moſt celebrated writers of hiſtory, give a brief account of the moſt noted perſons for their piety and learning; a method which I ſhall purſue throughout this work at the cloſe of every period.

* The reader will abate his ſurprize at finding ſo many kings depoſed or excommunicated, when he is informed that theſe kings were no other than petty toparchs, or men of great property in their ſeveral diſtricts.

LEARNED MEN in the IXth, Xth, and XIth CENTURIES.

TOWARDS the close of the eighth century lived Alcuin, or Albinus, a famous Northumbrian. He was bred a Benedictine, and was made abbot of St. Augustine's, Canterbury. He was disciple to Egbert, archbishop of York. Being sent ambassador by Offa to Charles the Great, that prince invited him to stay at his court, and was taught by him logic, astronomy, and mathematics: by his persuasion the emperor founded the university of Paris, as likewise that of Pavia. He wrote a great many books: and died in 804.

The next was Swithin, or St. Swithin as he is called; he had been preceptor to king Ethelwolf, by whom he was promoted to the see of Winchester. It was by his advice that this prince granted the famous charter of tythes, mentioned in our history of the church. The popish legends are full of pretended miracles said to be wrought by him after his death, the true value of which no one is at this day to learn.

Humbert, or Hubert, bishop of East Anglia, massacred or martyred by the Danes with king Edmund.

ALFRED the Great, exclusive of his royal dignity, was the most learned person of his time. The author of his life assures us that he was the best Saxon poet then living, an excellent grammarian, orator, philosopher, architect, geometrician, and historian. He composed several works that were held in great esteem; among others, he translated into Saxon, Gregory's Pastoral, Boetius De consolatione, and Bede's Ecclesiastical History. Mr. Bayle, in his Centuries, has given us a list of his works, as well those of his own composing as what he translated from the Greek and Latin languages; but they were so numerous, that the list would exceed the limits we have assigned to this part of our work: we cannot, however, dismiss this article, without giving the reader the following curious anecdote relating to this extraordinary personage.

He was twelve years of age before he could read, which he first began to learn upon this occasion; his mother seeing him one day highly delighted with a book beautifully adorned with capital letters in gold and various colours, said, in the hearing of him and his brother, that she would bestow that book on him who should first get it by heart. The infant breast of Alfred was instantly fired with emulation, and he set himself so diligently to learn his letters that, in a very short space of time, self-taught he was able to read and repeat the whole book to his mother. From this time he conceived that relish for learning, of which he made so noble a use in his riper years.

During his reign we find many great patterns of learning, who were either natives of this country or had been invited by him from foreign parts to settle here, and revolved like bright luminaries round their royal orb and patron. Of these the principal were Johannes Scotus Erigena, so called as being a native of Ireland (Erene being the name by which it then went.) He had studied at Athens and in other foreign countries, and made himself master of the Greek and oriental tongues. He then repaired through Italy to France, where he was in high favour with Charles the Bald. The fame of his talents extending to England, he was invited hither by Alfred, whom he instructed in the liberal arts. Afterwards he taught at Oxford, from whence he was removed to Malmesbury, where his scholars murdered him with their penknives, though on what occasion we are ignorant.

Gumbald was another foreigner for whom Alfred conceived a very early affection, on account of the hospitable entertainment he had given him at Rheims, on his journey to Rome. He created him abbot of Winchester. He was a learned divine, well skilled in music, and no less remarkable for his oratorical talents.

Among the English that were eminent for their learning, the most considerable was Asserius, surnamed Menevensis, from St. David's, the place of his nativity. He wrote the Life of Alfred the Great, in 893, and died bishop of St. David's in Wales.

Werefred, bishop of Worcester, in Mercia, lived in the reign of Buthred king of that country. When the Danes made themselves masters of Mercia, he retired into France, but was recalled by king Alfred. He translated the Dialogues of Gregory the Great into Saxon. He died A. D. 902.

Plegmund, who was archbishop of Canterbury, passed for the most learned prelate of his time: he was particularly skilled in divinity, which he taught in the public schools erected by Alfred at Oxford.

Dunulf had been an herdsman, but, for his great parts, had been cherished by Alfred, and at length promoted to the see of Winchester, as we have already mentioned in the foregoing pages.

John, the monk of St. David's. He is probably the same who, in the preface to Gregory's Pastoral, is termed by Alfred, John his mass-priest, and to whom he was obliged, as he owns there, for the instructions that enabled him to understand and translate that Pastoral.

Wulffig, bishop of London. This prelate had also a great share in the esteem of the excellent Alfred, as appears by his letter to this prelate prefixed to his translation of Gregory's Pastoral. As this epistle is in itself extremely curious, we think that it would be depriving the reader of a very valuable monument, were we not to give it him as it hath been handed down to us; we have therefore thrown it at the foot of this page in a note*.

But

* "Alfred, king, wisheth greeting to Wulffig, bishop, his beloved and friend-like, and thee to know I wilh, that to me it cometh very often in mind what manner of wise men long ago were throughout the English nation, both of the spiritual degree and of the temporal; and how happy the times then were among all the English, and how the kings, which then the government had of the people, God and his written will obeyed; how well they behaved themselves both in war and peace, and in their home-government; how their nobleness was spread abroad, and how they prospered in knowledge and in wisdom: also the divine orders how earnest they were, as well about preaching as about learning, and about all the services they should do to God; and how men from abroad, wisdom and doctrine here in this land sought; and how we the same now must get abroad if we would have them, so clean has learning fallen among the English nation, as that there have been very few on this side Humber that were able to understand the English of their service, or turn an Epistle from Latin into English; and I wot there were not many beyond Humber that could it: there were so few, as that I cannot bethink me of one of the south side of the Thames, when I first came to reign, God Almighty be thanked, we have ever a teacher in pulpit now;

But of all the eminent personages who dignified the court of Alfred, Neotus, or St. Neot, was most remarkable for his learning, piety, and example. Being descended from the blood royal of the East Angles, he was respected as a prince as well as a prelate, and is said, by his personal admonitions, to have restricted the follies of Alfred's youth. On his death his reputation of zeal for the honour of religion was such, that being buried in St. Guerer's church, in Gainsbury, in Cornwall, he supplanted that old Cornish saint in the name of the place, which, with a religious house, was dedicated to him, and after him called St. Neotstow. He is by Bayle called Neotus Adulphius; and by Speed, the reputed son of Ethelwolf, or Adulph; but Affer calls him the kinsman, not the brother, of Alfred. He died A. D. 895.

Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of an East Anglian Dane. He took orders in the reign of Edward the Elder; and his zeal, virtue, and capacity, gained him so great a character, that Athelstan made him bishop of Sherburne: he had no less interest with king Edmund, who resolved to promote him to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury; but it was a considerable time before he could be prevailed upon to accept this new dignity. Afterwards, becoming a vigorous champion for the monks, whom he served on all occasions, without any strict regard to the means, we need not wonder at finding him enrolled in the number of the saints. But of this prelate, as also of his contemporary and successor, Dunstan, we have already said sufficient to make their characters known.

The same may be said of Ethelwald, bishop of Winchester, and Oswald, bishop of Worcester first, and afterwards archbishop of York: whose great zeal in the cause of the monks is doubtless what contributed most to their reputation for piety; but as men of learning and abilities, their characters remain unimpeached in the annals of history.

Alfric, archbishop of York, remarkable for his translation of the Saxon Homilies, was promoted to the see of Canterbury in 995, and died in 1006.

Wulfstan, bishop of Worcester, was a person of an extraordinary character. This prelate having been consecrated by Aldred, archbishop of York, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, made his profession of canonical obedience to Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, though suspended by the pope.

Edmund, bishop of Durham, was remarkable for the manner of his election. The chapter of Durham being met to elect a bishop, but not being able to agree upon their man, Edmund, a priest of that church, said jestingly, "Since, reverend fathers, you are so divided in your opinions whom to chuse, e'en take me for your bishop." As omens and miracles were the prevailing follies of those days, the chapter looked upon this as a divine impulse, and unanimously agreed to elect him. He became famous for his courage and boldness in reprimanding vice even in persons of the most exalted birth and station.

L A W S.

DURING the heptarchy there were no laws common to all the seven kingdoms, but each had its own in particular. The first laws we have any knowledge of, are those of Ethelbert, king of Kent, enacted about the time of the conversion of the Saxons to Christianity, those of Ina, king of Wessex, and of Offa, king of Mercia, which we have already given the reader, in a foregoing part of this history. There is no doubt but that some of the other kings of the heptarchy enacted laws for the government of their respective dominions, but they are not come down to us.

Alfred, justly surnamed the Great, no less eminent in his legislative capacity than in that of the good king and the expert warrior, found the body of laws extant in his time, to be of three sorts; the first,

now; therefore I pray thee that thou do, as also I believe thou wilt, that wisdom, that God has given thee, bestow all about on them thou canst bestow it: think what punishment shall for this world befall us, when as neither we ourselves have loved wisdom, nor left it to others; we only loved the names that we were Christians, and very few of us the duties. When I minded all this, methought that I saw, before all was spoiled and burnt, how all the churches throughout the English nation stood filled with books and ornaments, and a great multitude of God's servants; and at that time they wist very little fruit of their books, because they could understand nothing of them, for that they were not written in their own language; so they told us, that our ancestors, that before us held those places, loved wisdom, and through the same got wealth, and left it us. A man may yet here see their swath, but we cannot enquire after it, because we have let go both wealth and wisdom, for that we would not stoop with our minds to the seeking of it. When I thought of all this, then wondered I greatly that their godly wise men, that were every where throughout the English nation, and had fully learned all those books, would turn no part of them into their own language: but I then again quickly answered myself, and said, they weened not that ever men should become so reckless, nor that this learning would so decay; therefore they willingly let it alone, and wot that here would be the more wisdom in the land the more languages that we understood. Then I called to mind, how that the law was first found written in the Hebrew speech; and after that the Greeks had learned it, then turned they it into their own speech wholly, and also all other books: and then the Latin people, a little after they had learned it, they translated all, through wise interpreters, into their own language: and all other Christian people have turned some part thereof into their own tongue. Therefore, me thinketh it better, if you so think, that we also some books, that be deemed most needful for all men to understand, into that language turn that we all know; and that we bring to pass, as we easily may, with God's help, if we have quietness, that all the youth of freeborn Englishmen, such as have wealth that they may maintain them, be committed to learning; that while they no other note, can they first learn well to read English writing; afterward let men farther teach in the Latin tongue those that they will farther teach, and have to a higher degree. When I minded how this learning of the Latin tongue heretofore was fallen through the English nation, though many could skill to read English writing, then began I, among divers and manifold businesses of this kingdom, to turn into English this book, which in Latin is named Pastoralis, and in English The Herdsman's Book, some time word for word, some time understanding for understanding, even as I learned them of Plegmond my archbishop, of Affer my bishop, and Grimbold my mass-priest, and John my mass-priest: after that I had learned of them how I might best understand them, I turned them into English, and will send one to each bishop's see in my kingdom; and upon each there is a style that is of fifty marks: and I command, on God's name, that no man the style from the books, nor the books from the minister, take; seeing we know not how long there shall be so learned bishops as now, God be thanked, every where there are. Therefore, I would they should always remain in their places, except the bishop will have them with him, or that they be lent some whither, until that some other be written out."

those contained in the scripture; the second, those drawn from the history of ancient nations; and lastly, those of his predecessors the Saxons, as they had been digested by Ethelbert, Ina, and Offa, the three kings above-mentioned: he therefore endeavoured to form from the whole of those such a system as might gradually lead them, under his successors, to that perfection which is at once the glory and security of a free state. To the immortal honour of Alfred we must observe, that to him was owing that invaluable privilege peculiarly enjoyed by Englishmen, of being tried by a jury of their own peers; an institution which, indeed, had its rise among our German ancestors; but from the multiplicity of jurymen, which amounted in most cases to an hundred, was attended with many difficulties and delays, from which, by fixing the number to twelve only by Alfred, it was happily freed. To him likewise was owing the finding of sureties for good behaviour, or the commitment to prison. The original of fairs and markets is also given to this king by sir John Spelman, which first took their rise from a practice which was common between the Danes and the Saxons, after the former had gotten footing this country, to steal not only horses, oxen, and other cattle, but also to carry the wives and children from each others lands and sell them as slaves; and it was frequently very tedious, if not impracticable, to find out the offenders and bring them to condign punishment, by the sufferers properly proving their property.

Finding that the counts, or great men, governors of shires, frequently used their authority to the cruelly oppressing the inhabitants immediately under their jurisdiction; Alfred resolved to abolish that slavish jurisdiction, and in its place substituted a shire-reeve, or judge for each particular shire, who, from their secondary rank, were called vice-counties, or deputies of the count. And furthermore, that he might, as much as in him lay, put a stop to private robberies and murder, which prevailed much in his time, from the number of lawless vagabonds whom the Danes had left behind them when expelled the kingdom by his victorious arms, he erected courts of justice in each tything and hundred. The tything-court consisted of ten heads of families, who were obliged to be mutual sureties for the good behaviour of each other, as each of them in particular was for all that were under him. Each tything had a head, or president, called the tything-man, whose office it was to hold courts on all occasions that might require the more speedy administration of justice.

Thus he divided all England into shires, or counties, the counties into hundreds, and the hundreds into tythings; and all the inhabitants of the kingdom were obliged to belong to some tything. By this excellent disposition the householders became responsible for their own families, the tything for the householders, the hundred for the tythings, and the shire or county for the hundreds, so that every one was watchful over his neighbour's actions; and by this means the tranquility of the whole was admirably provided for, by the means of suit and ready prosecution of right*.

Though Alfred was endowed by nature with a capacity fully sufficient to direct him to the most suitable means for putting his designs for the good of the people in execution, yet, with a noble diffidence worthy of example, he consulted others that were eminent for their abilities, and never enacted a law till it had first passed through three several councils.

The first was his secret or cabinet-council, to which only his favourites and intimate friends among the great men of the state were admitted; here all affairs were debated with the same freedom of opinion as in a private conference of friends and equals. After this they were laid before the second council, which consisted of bishops, earls, viscounts or deputy-governors of counties, and the principal men of property, known then by the name of thanes, which title was afterwards changed to that of barons: this resembled the present privy-council, the members of it being all appointed by the king himself.

The third was a general council, or assembly of the nation, called in Saxon, Wittena Gemot, in which, quality and office conferred a right of session independent of the royal authority or nomination. This assembly, which we at present style the Parliament, from an old French word signifying "speaking together," or "conferring," was composed of the two archbishops of Canterbury and York, the bishops, earls, viscounts or high sheriffs, and the thanes of the first rank or barons. Thus we behold in these three councils the origin of the cabinet and privy-councils, and the antiquity of parliament.

Alfred, throughout the whole of his laws, shewed an ardent zeal for justice, and sincere desire of preventing the great from oppressing the small. In themselves they were mild, compared to those of later ages; but the strictness with which Alfred enforced their observance, gave them a weight superior to the most rigorous penalties: and as he was sensible that it is the actual execution, and not the bare institution, of good laws, that must make a people happy, he, for that reason, laboured all in his power to prevail on his nobles, who were the hereditary judges, to apply themselves to the study of the laws, and gave such weight by his own example to what he had recommended, that in a short time his reign became the golden age of justice. And so careful was he that no kind of wrong should be done to his people, that he used to re-examine the causes tried in his absence; and in case he found any injustice done, out of favour or interest, he punished the judges severely: those who pleaded ignorance, he instantly dismissed with a sharp reprimand for undertaking an office for which they were not qualified; but where he found evident marks of corruption or wilful oppression, the offender was sure to feel the heaviest weight of his displeasure; and it is recorded, that he executed no

* This great work of the king's, saith sir John Spelman, gave original to the Domesday Book, so famous in all our histories: for when Alfred had made the survey of his kingdom, in order to divide it in the manner above-mentioned, he caused it to be ingrossed, and kept at Winchester: and being extant at the time that the duke of Normandy took possession of the English crown, it not only created in him a desire to do the like, but also furnished him with such ample assistance therein, that the survey which William made, was little more than the second edition of the same work (anterior & locupletior), it being in every other respect the same with that of Alfred's, and was also called by the same name, Winchester Book. Afterwards, either by corruption from Dom-boc (by which name the Saxons called all the books of laws and constitutions), or by affectation for the authenticity and originality of the work, it obtained the name of Domesday Book, which it still retains.

less than four-and-forty judges in one year for mal-administration in their office.

We shall now proceed to give an abstract of this prince's laws, as also of those of his successors, by which will be seen the several improvements made by them in the great model he left for their direction.

The laws of Alfred are ranked under two heads: I. The laws of Alfred, forty in number. II. The league between Alfred and Guthrun; which seems to be no more than articles of pacification, and conditions on which Guthrun was to hold East Anglia.

The Ist of Alfred's laws requires, as most necessary to all his subjects, that each keep his oath or pledge, his promise to observe the laws, and keep the peace. And if any should be compelled to swear, or deposite a pledge, whereby he may be bound to betray his lord, or unjustly to assist any person, he ought to break his promise rather than perform it; but in case he hath engaged to perform any thing which might justly be done, and doth it not, his arms and all his personal estate shall be put into the hands of his friends, and he himself kept in the king's prison for forty days, till he undergo that penance which the bishop shall enjoin him, and also his friends and relations require of him: but if he hath not wherewith to sustain himself in the mean while, if his kindred are not able to provide him victuals, the king's officer shall do it. But if he resist, and be taken by force, he shall forfeit both his arms and his personal estate; and if he be killed, nothing shall be paid as the value of his head. And in case he escape before his time (viz. of forty days) be out, and he be retaken, he shall be returned back again to prison for other forty days; if he escape, he shall have no benefit of the laws, but be excommunicated from all Christ's churches: and if any man have been security in his behalf, he shall make satisfaction for it according to right, and do penance till he make such satisfaction as his priest shall appoint.

The IId bears the title of The Immunity of the Church, of which we have already spoken in the ecclesiastical constitutions.

The IIId is concerning the breach of the king's suretyship, by the payment of a mulct of five pounds of Mercian larger money; but the violation of suretyship, or the peace, made to an archbishop, by a fine of three pounds; and if any one break or forfeit the king's pledge, or recognizance, he shall make amends, according to right and the breach of the suretyship, to a bishop or eolderman, by two pounds.

The IVth law is concerning the death of the king, or any other lord. If any one that either by himself alone, or by any other person, shall attempt against the king's life, he shall lose his life and goods; but if he will purge himself, let him do it according to the valuation of the king's head. The same is also ordained in all judgments concerning other men, whether noble or ignoble. Whoever conspires against his lord, shall lose both his life and estate, or else pay the valuation of his lord's head.

The VIIth law is against fighters in the king's palace. If a man shall fight, or draw a weapon in his house, his life shall lie at the king's mercy whether he will pardon him or not: but if the offender flee, and he be taken, he shall redeem his life with the price of his head, or be fined according to his offence.

The IXth law ordains what mulct a man shall pay that kills a woman with-child, which was to be according to the value of her head; and he was also to pay for the child in her womb half as much as for a living one, according to the quality of its father.

The Xth ordains what fines or amends every man shall pay to a husband for committing adultery with his wife, which was to be increased according to the estate or quality of him against whom the offence was committed.

The XIth, what mulct a man shall pay that wantonly handles the breasts of a countryman's wife, or offers her any violence, as by flinging her down, &c. though he does not lie with her.

The XXVIth law appoints what mulcts shall be paid by those who kill in troops or companies; and also to whom these mulcts were to be paid. If the slain innocent party were an ordinary person, that is, one whose head was valued but at two hundred shillings, he that slew him must pay the value of his head, and a fine besides to his kindred; also every one that was in the company must pay thirty shillings: which penalty was still to be increased according to the value of the estate of the party slain, so that as to the penalty for the death of a man valued at twelve hundred shillings, every one that was present must pay an hundred and twenty shillings, and the man-slayer himself the price of his head; and a fine besides: but in case the whole company shall deny that he gave the mortal wound, all of them are to be impeached together, and to pay both the value and the fine besides.

The XXVIIth appoints what share of the mulct or satisfaction a man's kindred on the mother's side shall receive, in case he has no kindred on his father's side; and what share those of his guild or fraternity shall pay, in case he have committed manslaughter in a quarrel, viz. the former shall pay a third part, and the latter, one half, of the price of the head of the party slain.

The XXVIIIth law was made against public defamers, or spreaders of false news; whereby is meant spreaders of false news against the government: and commands that such a one, being convicted, should suffer no less punishment than the cutting out of his tongue, except he redeem it by paying of the value of his head, and even then, he was afterwards to be esteemed of no credit.

The XXXth ordains, that merchants, when they land, shall bring such as come on shore with them before the king's officers in folcmote (or county-court), and there declare their number, that they may be ready to produce them, to answer any thing that may be demanded of them in the said folcmote: and that if they happen to bring many strangers on shore, that they also certify this to the king's officer in that said assembly, that so they may be forth coming.

The XXXIst inflicts upon him that shall put a ceorle's man, that is, an ordinary countryman, without any fault into bonds, a mulct of ten shillings; upon him that beats such a one, twenty shillings; if he hang him up aloft, thirty shillings; if he cut off his hair to expose him like a fool, ten shillings; if he shave his head like a priest, yet bind him not, thirty shillings; and in case he only cut off his beard, twenty shillings; but if he bind him and shave his hair like a priest, then sixty shillings.

The XXXIVth law imposes upon him that shall strike or fight in open court, before the king's eolderman, both the value of his own head and such a fine besides as shall be thought fit; and also an hundred and twenty shillings, to be paid to the eolderman by him that by thus drawing his weapon shall make any disturbance in the folcmote: if the eolderman was not present, but the fact was done before his substitute, or the king's priest, then a fine or amerciamment of thirty shillings.

The XXXVth ordains what satisfaction shall be made for breach of the peace in any other place: as, for example, he that fights in the home-stall of a countryman, shall pay the said countryman six shillings; if he drew his own sword but struck not, half as much: which penalty also was to be increased according to the estate or quality of him upon whose ground the assault was made; so that if he fought in the house of one that was worth six hundred shillings, he was to pay three times as much; if one worth twelve hundred shillings, then the amends was to be twice as much as the former.

The XXXVIth law, of burhlice, or breach of the peace in a town, confirms that part of king Ina's laws concerning that matter, in imposing upon the offender for the breach of the peace in the king's town or city, by setting the mulct of an hundred and twenty shillings: but if it be done in the archbishop's town, then ninety shillings; in that of a bishop, or eolderman, sixty shillings; in the town of a man valued at twelve hundred shillings estate, thirty shillings; but half as much if done in a village of one worth but half the sum.

The XXXVIIth is that law concerning beland, by virtue whereof he that holds lands left him by his ancestors, was forbid to alienate it from his kindred to others, in case it could be proved, by writing or testimony, before the king or the bishop, his kindred being present, that the man who first granted them forbid him all alienation, and laid on him this condition. — This law is now altered, for entails can be cut off by fine and recovery; and we have too many instances of the caprices of imbecility and the moroseness of peevish old age disinheriting youth for the very vices and follies which they themselves were addicted to in their younger days.

The XXXVIIIth law, concerning quarrels or deadly feuds, which since it gives a strange licence for men to take satisfaction on their enemies, even without the presence of any officer, I shall likewise set down. First, it forbids any man to attack his enemy if he find him in his own house, except he first demand of him satisfaction; but, if he have force enough, he may besiege the house for seven days, yet he shall not assault him if he stay within; but if he will then surrender himself and his arms into the defendant's hands, he may keep him thirty days without hurt; but then shall leave him so to his kindred or friends. In case he fly to a church, the honour of the church is to be preserved. But if the demandant have not strength enough to besiege him in his house, he may desire the assistance of the eolderman; which if he cannot obtain, he must appeal to the king before he can assault him. If any one by chance light upon his adversary, not knowing that he keeps himself at home, and he will deliver up his arms to him, he shall keep him safe thirty days, and then deliver him to his friends; but in case he will not deliver up his arms, then he may fight with him: but if he be willing to deliver up himself and his arms to his enemy, and any other man sets upon him, such a man shall pay the value of his head if he kills him; or give satisfaction for the wounds, if any be given him, according to the fact, besides which he shall be fined and lose all that may fall to him by reason of kindred.

The XLth sets a certain valuation upon every limb and member, as well upon every person from a king to a bondslave: of this see more at large in the laws of his successor Athelstan.

EDWARD the ELDER.

ALTHOUGH this prince was greatly inferior to his father Alfred, both in personal and political qualifications, nevertheless he extremely well seconded the principles of policy and government which had been laid down by that great legislator. We have still, in Mr. Lambart's collection, an account of this prince's laws, of which the following is an abstract.

In the preface he strictly charges and commands his officers, that, as much as in them lies, they do justice according as it stands in the Judicial Book (supposed to be some book of precedents or judgments), and, without all fear, boldly dispense common right to all men; and that they set and appoint certain days for determination of the several causes depending before them.

The Ist law is concerning traffic; and, in way of confirmation of the IVth article of the league made between his father and the Danish king Guthrun, ordains, that if a man will sell any thing, he shall have one to vouch and make good the sale; and that no man buy any thing without the town, unless he have the port-reeve for witness, or some other man worthy of credit; otherwise he shall undergo the penalty of contumacy against the king. The vouching or warranty shall also proceed from one to another till it end with him who first sold it. The rest of this law, containing in what cases the buyer, and likewise the demandant, shall find sufficient testimony or oaths of the true buying of the goods so bought, being long, I refer the reader to the law itself.

The IId of king Edward's laws ordains, that whosoever denies another man his right in bocland* or folcland†, demanding it before the king's sheriff, whereas he hath no right in either, shall pay to the king for the first offence thirty shillings, and as much more for the second; and if he offend the third time, then to pay an hundred and twenty shillings for his contumacy against the king.

The IIIId adjudges, that for one who had forsworn himself, or borne false witness, no credit shall be given to him for the time to come, but that he be put to ordeal in all cases where his oath is required.

The IVth declares, that king Edward, lying at Exeter once, consulting with his wise men by what means he might best provide for the public peace and tranquility, it then seemed to them, that what he had commanded was too remissly executed; therefore he now required all that will amend and reform these things, and would by him enjoy common society, that they would prosecute with their utmost hatred the same persons as he did, both by sea and land; and that they would take care not to do wrong or injury to any man: he that doth contrary, let him, as was formerly ordained, pay thirty shillings to the king; and if he offend the second time, as much more; if the third, an hundred and twenty shillings.

The Vth commands that the reeve or judge who doth not justice according to the testimony of such as are summoned, pay a hundred and twenty shillings for his contumacy against the king.

The VIth wills, that if a servant be accused of theft, he that recommended him to his master, or other of his friends, if he have any, be sureties for him that he discharge himself of what is deposed against him: and if he have none to interpose in his behalf, those that are concerned may seize his goods; but if he have neither goods nor friends, let him be taken into custody.

The VIIIth law enjoins, that no man knowingly and voluntarily have peace with, or harbour, one that is condemned for any crime: he that acts contrary, and thereby breaks his oath and the faith given by him and all the people, let him undergo the mulct prescribed in the Judiciary Book; which if he refuse to pay, he is to be deprived of the king's favour and all other men's friendship, and farther, forfeit all his estate: and if any afterwards relieve him, let him also incur the penalty expressed in the said book. And farther, whosoever shall relieve a fugitive, either in this country, or in the eastern or northern parts of the kingdom in East England and Northumberland, let him be punished as by the articles of peace is ordained.

The IXth provides, that if one deprived of his liberty for stealing, steal again, so that all his kindred forsake him, and none will engage for him, he is to be set to servile and hard labour, as opportunity shall offer, and his kindred shall lose the valuation of his head.

The Xth law forbids any man to receive another man's servant without his leave, and that he hath fully satisfied his master; he that doth otherwise shall be punished as contumacious against the king.

The XIth and last commands, that about every fourth week every sheriff or judge shall hold the gemot, or assembly, and administer justice to every man, and determine all causes at the days appointed: if he do otherwise, he is to be punished as was before said.

A T H E L S T A N.

THE natural parts of this prince, if we may believe William of Malmesbury, were very little inferior to those of his greatest predecessors; though the toils of war gave him but little leisure for study. Military events, therefore, make the greatest part of his history; but he was far from being deficient in civil policy, as the following abstract from his laws, collected from Mr. Tyrrel, will sufficiently vouch.

After a religious preface, the Ist law is against thieves; requiring, that if a thief be taken in the fact, no man shall spare him, if he be above twenty years old, and had stole any thing above the value of eight pence: if any one do contrarily thereunto, he shall pay the value of the thief's head, or make amends for the fault; and yet the thief himself shall not be spared, who, if he contumaciously make resistance, or fly for it, shall find no favour. A thief cast into prison, shall stay there forty days, and then, after the payment of an hundred and twenty shillings, be discharged; but his kindred must give security for his future good behaviour: after which, if he steal again, they must either pay the value of his head, or bring him back to prison. And in case any one resist, he shall pay to the king, or to any other whom it concerns, the value of his own head: and if any stand by him (defend him) he shall pay to the king one hundred and twenty shillings.

The VIth law is against witchcrafts, enchantments, and such like deeds that procure death: that if any one by them be made away, and the thing cannot be denied, such practicers shall be put to death: but if they endeavour to purge themselves, and be cast by threefold ordeal, they shall lie in prison an hundred and twenty days; which ended, then their kindred may redeem them by the payment of an hundred and twenty shillings to the king: and farther, pay to the kindred of the slain the full valuation of the party's head; and then the criminals shall also procure sureties for their good behaviour for the time to come. The same punishment shall be inflicted on incendiaries, and such as rescue thieves: nay such as endeavour to rescue them, though no man be wounded in the attempt, shall pay a hundred and twenty shillings to the king.—As for enchantments mentioned in this law, the Saxon word is Liblacum, which signifies the art of conjuration, or witchcraft; not all in general, but that sort of it called properly fascination or enchantment, used by certain ligatures, fasciæ, or bands.

The VIIth ordains concerning simple ordeal; that if one, accused several times of theft, be cast by it, and have nobody to be surety for him, he shall be sent to prison, and thence freed by his kindred, as before said.

The Xth forbids any commutation of goods, unless in the presence of the king's reeve, the priest of the town, or the lord of the soil, or some other creditable person, under the penalty of thirty shillings, and the forfeiture of the things changed, to the lord of the soil: and if any shall bear witness, he shall be infamous, and no credit given to him ever after, and also shall forfeit thirty shillings.

The XIIth confirms the first part of the laws of king Edward the Elder, decreeing that no man buy any thing out of a town, which exceeds the value of twenty pence; and within the town, unless in the presence of the port-reeve or some other creditable person, or else in the presence of the king's sheriff or justice, in folcmote.

The XIVth appoints, through all the king's dominions, that one and the same money be current: and that it shall not be coined out of some town; and if any minter or coiner shall debase the coin, he shall lose his hand, which, being cut off, shall be affixed to the workhouse: if any be accused of adulterating money, and will purge himself, he shall by the ordeal of hot iron cleanse his hands of such wickedness; but if by ordeal he be cast, then he shall be punished as now was said. Then follow the places appointed for public mints, viz. at Canterbury there shall be seven minters or coiners, whereof four for the king, two for the bishop, and one for the abbot: at Rochester there shall be three; whereof whereof two for the king, and the third for the bishop: at London eight, at Winchester six, at Lewes two, at Hastings one, at Chichester one, at Hampton two, at Werham two, at Excester two, at Salisbury as many, and in ever other great town one.

That which follows, commands that for every every plough a man shall keep two well-furnished horsemen.

The XVIIIth forbids horses to be transported, except such as are sent abroad as free gifts or presents.

The XXth law enacts, that if any one absents himself from folcmote thrice, he shall be punished as contumacious against the king, if so be that the holding of the assembly was declared a sevensight before; in such case, if he refuse to do right, and pays not his mulct to the king, the ancient men of the country are to go and seize upon all that he hath, and take security for his appearance.

The XXIIId, in confirmation of a former law, requires that no person receive another man's man (as this law words it) into his family without leave first obtained of his master; he that doth otherwise shall restore the man, and pay the mulct of contumacy against the king. And no man is to put away his men, accused of any crime, till they have first made satisfaction.

The XXIVth is concerning traffic, and, in confirmation of former laws, ordains, that if a man buy any thing with witness, which another man challenges for his own, the seller shall make it good and secure the bargain, whether he be bond or free. But on the Lord's day no market shall be held, under penalty or forfeiture of the wares, and a mulct of thirty shillings besides.

The next thing that follows at the end of these laws relating to the civil state, is the valuation of men's heads, which we have often heard mentioned, by these laws, but never yet to what it particularly amounted. First then, saith the text, the valuation of the king's head, according to the English common laws, is thirty thousand thrymses*, whereof fifteen thousand are properly the value of his head, the rest being due to the kingdom; so that the latter fifteen belonged to the nation, the former to his kindred. An archbishop's and an earl's weregild (as the Saxons called the valuation of his head) is fifteen thousand thrymses: a bishop's and eolderman's, eight thousand: a general's of an army, or an high-marshal's, four thousand thrymses: the valuation of a spiritual thane, or priest, as also of a temporal thane, was two thousand thrymses: that of a countryman, or ceorl, by the Danish law, two hundred and sixty-seven thrymses: but if a Welshman grow so rich as to maintain a family, have land, and pay a yearly rent to the king, he shall be valued at an hundred and twenty shillings; if he possesses half a hide of land, at eighty shillings; if he have no land, yet if he be a freeman, the value of his head shall be seventy shillings. If a ceorl, or countryman, be so wealthy as to possess five hides of land, in case he be killed, the price or value of his life shall be two thousand thrymses; but if he come to have a corselet and helmet and a gilt sword, though he have no land, he shall be accounted a sithcundman†; and if his children, or grand-children shall grow so rich as to possess five hides of land, all their posterity shall be reckoned as so many sithcundmen, and be valued at two thousand thrymses. The Mercians value a countryman at two hundred shillings; a thane, at twelve hundred. They were wont to equal the single value of the king's head with six thousand thanes, that is, thirty thousand sceatas, for so much is the value of the king's head, and as much more must be paid as a recompence for his death; the value of his head belongs to his kindred, and the compensation of his death to the people. He that is valued at twelve hundred shillings, his oath shall be of the same esteem as those of six countrymen; for where such a one is slain, six countrymen would satisfy over and above for the value, therefore the value of him and all of them shall be the same. By the English law, the oaths of a priest and a thane are of the like esteem.

This valuation was called in the Saxon language, Weregild.

We find the Saxon money thus calculated by Mr. Camden: a peninga (or penny) three of our pence; a shilling, three peningas, or fifteen pence; a pound, forty-eight shillings, or three of our pounds: manca, mancusa, or mancuse, or marca, twelve of our pence; manca of gold, thirty peningas, or seven shillings and six pence.

EDMUND I.

IN the preface to this prince's laws, translated by Brompton and Lambart, we are told, that at the solemn feast of Easter, the king had held a great council at London, as well of ecclesiastics as laics, where were present Odo and Wulstan, archbishops, with many other bishops, to consult for the good of their own souls, and of those that were committed to their care and government; at which synod or council were enacted several laws: but they being six in number, of mere ecclesiastical concernment, as for paying tythes, and against fornication with nuns, and perjury, I omit them. Then follow, in Brompton's copy, seven other constitutions, of civil concernment, said to have been made by the king, his bishops, and wise men, at Cullington, not extant in the Saxon edition.

The Ist of these requires an oath of fidelity to be taken by all to king Edmund, in like manner as a man ought to bear faith to his lord, without any controversy or sedition, both in public and private; to love whom the king should love, and to hate whom he should hate: and before the oath be given, that no man should conceal a crime in his brother, or neighbour, more than in a stranger.

The IId, concerning the apprehension of thieves, enjoins, that if it be known for certain where a thief is, the twelfhind and twihind men (the former worth twelve hundred, and the latter two hundred shillings of estate) should combine together, and take him either alive or dead. But in case any man take up a mortal feud against another; for so doing he is to be esteemed as the enemy of the king and all his friends; and if any one refuse to assist in his apprehension, he shall forfeit to the king an hundred and twenty shillings, and to the hundred, thirty shillings.

The IVth enjoins, that if several thieves do steal, the eldest of them shall be hanged, and the rest be whipped thrice, and, for an example, have the little finger cut off. This I take notice of, because it is the first law whereby thieves are expressly ordered to be hanged, without being admitted to pay their weregild, or price of their heads.

* According to sir Henry Spelman, valued at three shillings; while Mr. Selden makes it to be about a groat.

† That is, a gentleman, or one qualified to do knight's service.

The Vth and VIth, being against buying and receiving strangers cattle, I pass by.

The VIIth enjoins, that every person make his servants, and all that live within his peace, his district, and on his lands, to give security; and also, that all others of ill fame, who lie under accusations, should have security given for them: and what officer, thane, eolderman, or countryman, soever he be that refuseth to do according thereunto, shall forfeit a hundred and twenty shillings, and further be deemed worthy of such punishments as have been before mentioned.

After these follow seven other of king Edmund's laws, found both in Brompton's and Lambart's copies; before which we also find a preface, wherein the king signifies to all his subjects, both old and young, that he had most studiously enquired, in a solemn assembly of ecclesiastics and laics, by what means the Christian life might best be maintained; and that it seemed most convenient to them all, that he should cherish and procure love and mutual friendship through all his dominions; for they were much troubled at the unjust divisions and contentions amongst them. Therefore the king and they did now ordain, Ist, That if hereafter one man kill another, he alone should bear the deadly feud or enmity of the kindred of the party slain, unless, within twelve months, by the assistance of his own kindred, he should pay the weregild or value of the slain man's head, of whatsoever condition he was; and then that they should not be taken for enemies: in the mean time they shall not relieve him, nor have peace with him; and if they do or have, they shall forfeit all their estate to the king. And he that shall kill any man, shall be taken as an enemy by all the kindred of the slain, and they may maintain deadly feud against him. And if any shall revenge himself upon, or prosecute any other of his kindred, besides the manslayer himself, he shall forfeit all he hath, and be taken as an enemy both by the king and all that love him. Which law was made because, before this, if one man killed another, the kindred of the slain had a mortal feud, and revenged his death upon any of the relations of the murderer, as they do among the Indians even to this day.

The IId denounces, that if a man fly to a church, or to the king's town, and there any one set upon him or do him harm, he shall be punished in the same manner.

By the IIId, the king expressly forbids that any fyghtwyte or manbote, that is, any fine for fighting or killing, be remitted.

By the IVth, the king openly declares that his house shall afford no shelter to him that hath shed blood, except he hath first made satisfaction to God and the kindred of the party slain, and done whatsoever was enjoined him by the bishop, in whose diocese the fact was committed.

The VIth enjoins, that he that breaks the peace and sets upon a man in his own house, shall forfeit all he hath, and his life to be at the king's mercy.

The VIIth and last of these laws is also concerning enmities or deadly feuds, declaring, that it is the duty of all wise men to suppress them, and prescribing the ways and means of doing it; as, first, that an indifferent friend be sent before to the kindred of him that is slain, to signify to them, that he that killed him will make all due satisfaction; upon which the manslayer shall be delivered into his hands, that he may safely appear and give caution for the payment of the value of the dead man's head; which as soon as he hath done, the king's peace is next to be made between them. Then, after the end of one-and-twenty days he shall pay halsfage, according to Brompton's copy, or, as the Saxon text hath it, healfange, that is, as Mr. Lambart interprets it, that which was paid in commutation for the punishment of hanging by the neck, to the king or lord.

EDGAR.

THE civil character of this prince will be best known by his laws, an abstract of which is as follows. The preface to them is thus expressed: "This is the decree or law which king Edgar made, with the counsel or consent of his wites, or wise men, for the honour of God, the confirmation of his royal dignity, and for the good of his people."

The laws themselves begin with some ecclesiastical canons, the Ist of which is concerning the immunities of the church, and about paying tythes out of the lands of the thanes as well as of those of ceorles, or countrymen.

The IId is concerning the payment of tythes and first-fruits, as well where a thane had a church with a burying place, as also where he had not.

The IIId appoints the times the tythes should be paid at; and what remedy was to be had, in case they were not paid at the time when they were due.

The IVth ordains at what time of the year Peter-pence should be paid, and the penalty that should be incurred by those that should neglect to pay them in accordingly.

The last ordains every Sunday to be kept holy, and to begin at three o'clock in the afternoon on Saturday, and to end at break of day on Monday, upon the penalty appointed by the Judiciary Book. From this last law we may observe how early keeping the Sunday like the Jewish Sabbath began in England.

Then follow the secular or temporal laws: the Ist of which enjoins, that every man, poor or rich, enjoy the benefit of the law, and have equal justice done him. And for punishments, he would have them so moderated, that being accommodated to the divine clemency, they may be the more tolerable unto men.

The IId forbids appeals to the king in suits, except justice cannot otherwise be obtained: and if a man be oppressed, he may betake himself to the king for relief. And in case a pecuniary mulct be inflicted for a fault, it must not exceed the value of the man's head.

The IIId imposes a mulct of an hundred and twenty shillings to the king, upon a judge that passes an unjust sentence against any man, except such judge will take his oath that he did it not out of any malice, but only from unskilfulness and mistake in judgment; and in such case he is to be removed from his place, unless he can obtain favour of the king longer to retain it: and then the bishop of the diocese is to send the mulct imposed upon him, to the king's treasure.

The IVth commands, that whosoever maliciously shall defame another man, whereby he receives any damage, damage, either in body or estate, so that the defamed party can clear himself in those reports and prove them false, then the defamer's tongue shall either be cut out, or he shall redeem it with the value of his head.

The Vth is to the same effect as in another law we have formerly cited, commanding every one to be present at the gemote, or assembly of the hundred: and farther ordains, that the burghmotes, or assemblies of the great towns or cities, be held thrice a year; and the shiregemotes, or the general meetings of the whole county, twice; whereat were to be present the bishop and the eolderman, the one to teach the people God's laws, and the other man's. From whence we may observe the antiquity of our charges at our assizes and sessions, which, no doubt, do succeed those discourses which the eolderman and bishop then made to the people upon the subjects above-mentioned.

The VIth requires that every man find sureties for his good behaviour; and in case any man commit a crime and fly for it, the sureties should undergo what should be laid upon him. If he stole any thing, and be taken within a twelvemonth, he should be brought to justice, and then the sureties should receive back what they had paid on his account. Hence we may also take notice not only of the antiquity of frank pledges, which had been long before instituted by king Alfred, but also the continuation of this law by king Edgar, from whence it appears that it was no Norman invention, introduced to keep under the English commonalty, as some men without any just cause have imagined.

The VIIth ordains, that when any one of evil report is again accused of a crime, and absents himself from the gemotes or public meetings, some of the court shall go where he dwells, and take sureties for his appearance, if they may be had; but if they cannot get them, then they should take him alive or dead, and seize on all his estate, whereof the complaining party having received such a share as should satisfy him, the one half of the remainder should go to the lord of the soil, and the other half to the hundred. And if any of that court, being either akin to the party, or a stranger to his blood, refuse to go to put this in execution, he should forfeit an hundred and twenty shillings to the king. And farther, that such as are taken in the very act of stealing, or betraying their masters, should not be pardoned during life.

The VIIIth and last ordains, that one and the same money should be current throughout the king's dominions, which no man must refuse: and that the measure of Winchester should be the standard; and that a weigh of wool should be sold for half a pound of money, and no more. The former of these is the first law whereby the private mints to the archbishops and several abbots being forbid, the king's coin was only to pass.

ETHELRED II.

ALTHOUGH king Ethelred was no great or worthy prince in his own person, yet, with the assistance of his wives, or wise men, who composed his great council, he enacted several excellent laws and constitutions. There are in Brompton's Chronicle, four bodies of these laws, made at as many several times, and in different places; whereof there are only two extant among the Saxon laws published by Mr. Lambart. The laws comprized in the first division are six, and are said to have been made "at Woodstock, in Mercia, for the restoration of peace according to the laws of England."

The Ist is, that every freeman shall find sureties to be bound for him, that he shall do right in case he be accused.

The IId I shall omit, since it hath been already mentioned in the laws of king Edgar; only the latter end of it is very remarkable, to wit, The lord shall answer for his whole family, and be surety for the appearance of every person in it: and if any of his servants, after they are accused, run away, the lord or master shall pay his man's Were to the king. And if the master be accused as the adviser to, or promoter of his escape, he shall purge himself by five thanes; and if he do it not, he shall pay to the king his Were, and his man shall be an outlaw.

The IIIrd ordains, that a bondman being cast by the ordeal, shall be marked with a hot iron for the first offence; and being cast in the same manner for the second time, shall be put to death. Which law bears some resemblance to our present law or custom, whereby benefit of clergy is allowed for the first crime committed.

By the Vth, the king's reeve, or officer, is obliged to require sureties for the good behaviour of such as are of ill fame amongst all men; which if such a one obstinately refuses to give, he is to be put to death, and is to be buried in an unhallowed place with malefactors: and if any one use force in his behalf to further his escape, he is to undergo the same punishment.

As for the next set of laws, they are said to have been at Venterig, or Wanating, now Wantage, in Berkshire, and for the increase of common peace and happiness, by king Ethelred and his wise men.

The Ist of them is concerning the keeping of the king's peace, as it was in the days of his predecessors; and for the punishment of the breach of it, in case of manslaughter, if it were in a gemote, or assembly of five boroughs, with the forfeiture of five pounds weight in silver: if in an assembly of a borough or town, by a mulct of seven hundred shillings (but how much this was is not known, for we have not now any true account of the standard of money at that time): if in a wapentake, by one hundred: and if in an alehouse a man be killed, with six half marks; if he be not killed, with twelve oares, for the value of which see sir Henry Spelman's Glossary. From hence, but especially from the law of king Ina, we may observe how ancient the liquor ale, and alehouses, have been in England; and also what commonly follows the abuse of it, quarrelling and breaking the peace in such places.

The IVth commands, that public meetings be observed in every hundred, or wapentake; and that twelve thanes, says Brompton, or twelve men of free condition, as Lambart reads it, being elderly men, together with their præpositus or chief, shall swear, upon the Gospels or holy relics, that they will neither condemn an innocent person, nor acquit a guilty one. From whence we may observe the antiquity of trials by a grand inquest of more than twelve men, even in the Anglo-Saxon times, and not introduced by William the Conqueror, as Polydore Virgil, an Italian, not much skilled in the antiquities of this island, hath delivered in his history.

story. And to confirm what we have here said, the third chapter of the league between king Alfred and Guthrun the Dane very much maketh out; which orders, that if the king's thane, or servant be accused of homicide, he shall purge himself, if he dare, by twelve other thanes: which may be seen at large in those laws themselves. And besides these, the reader, throughout the whole collection of the Saxon laws, may observe there is frequent mention made of clearing and purging by so many men summoned for that purpose, as sometimes by twelve, sometimes by fewer, and sometimes by more.

As for the trial by ordeal, it grew more in request in the reign of king Canute and his successors, being, indeed, originally a Danish custom. The rest of the laws of king Ethelred, made at Wantage, having many of them relation to this way of trial by ordeal, and containing many obscure terms, I omit; but since several of them may very well be referred to other former laws, I shall only select from among them such as are most worthy to be taken notice of here.

The XXIIId appoints what custom should be paid for ships and vessels of all sorts that unladed at Billingsgate. From whence it appears, that this was the ancient port of London, wines and all other commodities being here unladen.

The XXVIth imposes the same punishment upon such as wittingly receive, as well as on those that make, bad money. Whereby we may observe, that though the coining of bad money was not as yet made treason, yet it was punishable at the king's discretion, either by fine or death, as appears in the following law.

The XXVIIIth puts it in the king's power whether to fine, or to put to death such merchants as import counterfeit money: and further imposes upon all port-reeves that shall be accessary, the same punishment as upon those that coin false money, except the king think fit to pardon them.

CANUTE the GREAT.

THIS prince's laws begin thus: "This is the law or decree which Canute, king of England, Denmark, and Norway, hath ordained, with the consent of his wise men, at London, as well for the maintenance of his own royal dignity, as for the benefit of his people; and were made at Winchester in midwinter at Christmas:" which we may observe, was one of the stated times when all the great men of the kingdom, both clergy and laity, used of course to attend upon the king, whether he summoned them or not. But since these laws are very long, and contain a repetition of divers laws formerly made by his predecessors, I shall only here extract some of them, and refer the reader to Mr. Lambart for the rest.

The Ist of civil concernment, commands justice to be faithfully and indifferently administered both to poor and rich; and abolishes all unjust laws.

The IId requires mercy to be used, and that no man be put to death for a small offence.

The VIIIth ordains that all people keep the peace; and orders one and the same good money be current, and no man to refuse it: if any man debase the coin, his hands shall be cut off, without any redemption: and if a reeve or magistrate be accused that it was done by his consent, he shall purge himself by a treble purgation, and if he be cast, incur the same punishment with the offender.

The XIIth is remarkable, since it comprises all those forfeitures which the king challenges as due to himself in the counties of Wessex, except he please to confer them upon any other, viz. the penalties incurred for the breach of the peace, for breaking into a house, stopping up a passage, and forsaking a man's colours: if also, for any crime a man be outlawed, the restitution of him to his former state belongs to the king. He also that possesses bocland-land, conveyed by deed, forfeits to the king, let his lord be who he will: as also whoever relieves or harbours a fugitive.

The XIVth law appoints mulcts for divers offences; and particularly, that if any judge have, out of hatred or lucre, perverted justice, by the law of the English he is to pay to the king the value of his head, and also to be removed from his place, or redeem it, as the king shall please; except he plead that what he did was from ignorance, and then he must confirm this assertion by oath: and by the law of the Danes he is to incur the mulct of the breach of that law, except he can plead ignorance.

The XIXth renews the former laws of king Alfred, commanding every one of free condition to enter himself into some hundred or tything, that, being in a condition to purge himself, he may also be in a capacity to claim from another the value of his head; otherwise, none that exceeds twelve years of age, in case he receive any wrong, shall be capable of enjoying the same privilege with a freeman: and be he a master of a family, or a retainer, he must be entered into some hundred or other, and must find pledges or sureties for his appearance in case he be accused of a crime. Some great men, says the king, if they can do it, will protect their servants, giving out sometimes that they are free, other times that they are slaves; but we, not enduring any such unjust practices, enjoin, that every one of twelve years of age shall give security by oath, that he will neither steal himself, nor be accessary to the theft of another. Thus doth he revive what king Alfred had before ordained, that no freeman should be out of tything, or live at random without the most efficacious tye of suretyship; and to what was enacted before adds this caution of twelve years, beyond which, for the public peace and security, none were to live without being received and admitted into some hundred or tything.

The XXth law of king Canute so far indulges a man, unblameable and of good repute, who never brake his oath in the hundred, nor was cast by the ordeal, that his single purgation should be accepted; but a man of contrary reputation shall either be compelled to take his single oath in three hundreds, or a threefold one, according to the custom of that court; or be put to the ordeal: but a single purgation is to be made with a threefold preparatory oath.

By virtue of the LIth law, whosoever conspires against the king, or his lord, shall forfeit life and fortune, except he purge himself by the threefold ordeal.

The LXIst declares breaking down or burning houses, as also theft, manifest murders, and betrayers of one's lord, according to human laws, to be crimes for which there is no bote or satisfaction.

to be made by way of mulct or compensation; which is an alteration of the former laws, by which all these crimes were redeemable by money.

The next wills that mercy may be shewn as much as may be, to such as truly and unfeignedly amend their ways.

And by that which follows, the king declares he will put a difference between small and great, rich and poor, young and old, infirm and healthful; forasmuch as some men may offend out of a kind of necessity, and that a distinction is to be made between a forced and a voluntary act; therefore he promises to succour where there is most need of his help.

The LXVIIth contains an act of grace of the king to his subjects, whereby he relieves such as were formerly oppressed: he also enjoins all his officers that they make provision for his house out of his own lands and tillage, and that they compel no man to furnish him with any provisions in this kind, upon pain of paying the value of their heads if they impose any mulct upon refusers.

The LXVIIIth ordains, that in case any man by neglect or sudden death depart this world intestate, his lord shall take nothing of his goods except what is due to him, as an herriot; but all this is to be distributed by his judgment, to the wife, children, and next kindred, justly according to their several rights.

The LXIXth settles the rates of all herriots to the king, ordering that the herriot of every one be according to his dignity; as first, that of an earl, eight horses, whereof four with furniture and four without; four helmets, as many corselets, eight spears, and as many shields, four swords, and two hundred mancuses of gold: that of the king's chief thane, four horses, whereof two with furniture and two without; two swords, four spears, and as many shields, one helmet, one corselet, and fifty mancuses of gold: the herriot of an inferior thane, an horse with furniture and arms; or, among the West Saxons, the sum of money that is paid, called halfange, in Mercia and East Anglia two pounds. But among the Danes, the herriot of a king's thane, who has free jurisdiction, is four pounds; and if he be nearer to the king, his herriot is two horses, whereof the one with furniture and the other without, a sword, two spears, as many targets, and fifty mancuses of gold: but the herriot of a thane of the lowest condition is two pounds*.

The LXXIst requires widows to continue in widowhood for the space of twelve months, and then permits them to marry. If a woman marry before her twelve months be out, she shall lose her dower, with all that her husband left her, which is to come in such case to the next of kin: and he that marries her, shall pay the value of his head to the king, or to whomsoever he assigns it.

The LXXVth law deprives him of life and estate, who, either in an expedition by land or sea, deserts his lord or fellow-soldier; and in such case the lord is to have back the land he gave him; or if it was bocland, it goes to the king. But in case any one die in fight in the presence of his lord, either at home or abroad, his herriot shall be remitted, and his children shall succeed both to his goods and lands, and equally divide them.

The LXXVIth gives him liberty that hath defended his land and cleared it from all doubts and incumbrances in the sciregemote (or county-court), to possess it quietly while he lives, and to leave it to whom he pleases when he dies. From whence we may observe, that, before the Conquest, men might bequeath their lands by their last will.

The LXXVIIth gives liberty to every man to hunt in his own grounds; but forbids all men, under a penalty, to meddle with the king's game, especially in those places which he had fenced by privilege.

During the reign of HAROLD HAREFOOT we have only one law, mentioned by Mr. Selden, which was,

"That whatever Welshman coming into England without leave, was taken on this side of Offa's Ditch, should have his right hand cut off by the king's officers."

We shall therefore pass on to those of

EDWARD the CONFESSOR,

AS they are to be met with in Hoveden and Lambart's collections; but it is not to be taken for granted, that Edward was the author of those laws, or that they owe their original to his reign. All we know for certain, is that they were, with some variation, the rules of his government, and the same which William I. and his successors were obliged afterwards to confirm. Though it is now impossible to assign the several reigns to which they owe their origin, that this was the case appears from the preface to those laws, which is as follows: "King William, in the fourth year of his reign, after the conquest of England, by the advice of his barons, caused the English noblemen that were men of knowledge and learning in their own law, to be summoned together through all the provinces of England, that he might from themselves hear their laws, rights, and customs: therefore, twelve men chosen out of every county of the whole nation, did make oath before the king, that they would make known the sanctions of their own laws and customs, proceeding in a direct way without swerving to the right hand or to the left, without making omissions, additions, or prevaricating variations: therefore, beginning with the laws of the holy mother church, because by her the king and kingdom stand upon a solid foundation, they declared her laws, liberties, and protection, saying."

The Ist of these laws confirms all clerks and scholars in their goods and possessions.

The IId appoints the times and days of the king's peace, making it more penal to violate it from the Advent of our Lord to the Octaves of the Epiphany; and in like manner from Lent to the Octaves of Easter, eight days after that feast, and from our Lord's Ascension to the Octaves of Pentecost; and also on Saturdays from nine o'clock to the Monday morning following: likewise on the vigils of all holidays as well as on the holidays themselves. As also in parishes when the feast of the faint, to whom the church is dedicated, is kept;

* The word Herriot, or, as the true Saxon word is written, Heregiate, signifies, furniture for war given by the vassal to his lord; probably at first designed for the driving away thieves and robbers, which abounded when the Danish or northern nations so frequently invaded the land. For though the word Here, does in the Saxon language signify an army, yet it is, in our Saxon authors, when without composition, generally taken in the worse sense, for invaders and spoilers: a lawful army, collected by the king for the defence of the nation, being called by the name of Fryd.

so that if any one come devoutly to the celebration thereof, he was to have security in going, staying, and returning home: and besides in many other cases, too long here to set down.

The III^d is not material.

The IVth is as follows: wherever pleas are held in the court of the king, or of any other person, if the bishop's messenger come thither, and open a cause that concerns holy church, let that be first determined; for it is fit that God be every where honoured before others.

V. Whoever holds any thing of the church, or hath his mansion upon church-ground, shall not be forced to plead in any court but the ecclesiastical, although he have incurred a forfeiture; unless justice there fail, which God forbid.

VI. Whenever a guilty or noxious person flies to the church for safety, let him be seized by no person after he is in the church-yard, except by the bishop or his ministers. And if he flies into the house or court of the priest, he shall have the same protection as in the church, so that the house or court stand on church-ground. If the refugee be a robber or thief, let him restore what he hath taken away, if he have it in his keeping; if he have wholly destroyed it, let him make full restitution to the injured person out of his own goods, if he has wherewithal. If the robber has made it his practice, and has often escaped to the church or the house of some priest, let him, when he has restored what he has stole, forswear the province, and not return to it; and let no one dare to entertain him if he do return, without the king's licence.

VII. If any one violently infringe the church's protection, it concerns the bishop's courts: if the guilty person decline, or arrogantly despise, their sentence, let complaint of it be brought to the king, after forty days; and the king's court shall put him under security and pledges, if he can find them, to make satisfaction, first to God, and then to the king and church: and if he cannot be found within thirty-one days, either by his friends and neighbours, or by the king's court, the king shall outlaw him by the word of his own mouth; but if afterwards he be found, and can be taken, let him be surrendered to the king alive; or if he defend himself till he be killed, let his head be yielded to the king; for from the day of his outlawry his head is a wolf's head; and this is the general law to all that are outlawed.

The VIIIth and IXth relate to the institution and payment of tythes, and have already been given under the ecclesiastical transactions of this prince's reign, p. 147.

X. On the day there is but one ordeal, let the bishop's ministers, with his clerks, come thither, and likewise the king's justice, with lawful men of the province, to see and hear that all be done with equity: and let all those whom the Lord is willing to save by mercy, not by merits, be acquitted, and depart in peace: and let the king's justice judge them, whom their own guilt, and not the Lord, condemns. Let those barons who have a court of their own, deal with their own men in such a manner as not to sin against God, nor to offend the king. And if a plea between men that belong to other barons, happen in their courts, let the king's justice be present at it; otherwise the plea can have no final issue. If any barons have no judicatures, it must be determined at the next church where the king's judicature shall be, in the hundred where the plea was held, with a saving to the right of the barons.

XI. Every one that hath thirty pennyworth of living stock in his house of his own, by the law of the English, and half a mark by the law of the Danes, shall pay St. Peter's penny. Now that penny ought to be demanded at the feast of the apostles Peter and Paul, and to be levied at the feast called ad Vincula, so as not to be detained beyond that day. If any do detain it, let complaint be made to the king's justice, because this penny is the king's alms: let the justice cause the penny to be paid, and the forfeiture to the bishop and the king. If any one have more houses than one, let the penny be paid from that house where he was resident at the feast of the apostles Peter and Paul.

The XIIth never could be intended for a law, because it neither commands nor forbids any thing; it seems, however to have been penned by Glanville, and is a piece of curious history, therefore it deserves a place here.—The payment of Danegelt was first ordained against the pirates, for they laid waste the country with all their might. To suppress their insolence, it was ordained that Danegelt should be annually paid, that is, twelve pence from every hide of land in the whole country, to hire men who might put a stop to their invasion. Every church was free, and acquitted from this Danegelt, and all the land, wherever it lay, that was the property of the church, because they trusted more in the prayers of the church than in the protection of their arms.—Here ends this law or assessment in the Cotton MS. but the rest thus go on: The church of the English preserved this liberty till the times of king William, jun. called Rufus, who, in order to keep Normandy, while his brother Robert, called Curthose, was in his expedition to Jerusalem, required an aid of the barons of England, then it was allowed to him, in this case of necessity, but not ordained or confirmed by law, that four shillings should be paid him out of every hide, the church not excepted: but while this levy was made, holy church, with a loud voice, demanded her liberty, but to no purpose.—Yet the reader will observe, that only hides, or ploughlands, were taxed by him, not manse or tythe.

XIII. The king's protection is manifold; for there is what the English call Peace given with the king's hand; another upon his coronation, which lasts eight days; eight days at Christmas, eight at Easter, eight at Pentecost; another is granted by the king's writ; there is another which belongs to the king's highways, Watling-street, Foss, Ike-nild-street, and Erming-street, two of which are extended the length of the kingdom, two the breadth: there is another, which belongs to the waters of the famous rivers. Manbote is the satisfaction to be paid to the lord for the murder of his man; that is, three marks to the king and archbishop, for one of their men by the law of the English; but twenty shillings to the bishop of the shire, and to the king's earl, and the steward of his household; ten shillings to other barons. From whence it appears, that peace of the king was a privilege or exemption granted to persons, not to be sued, or answer at law in any action brought against them, during certain solemn and stated times, and in certain of the most famous and frequented highways of the kingdom.

The XIVth declares, that all treasure-trove should be the king's; unless it were in a church or church-yard, in which case, if it were gold, it was all the king's, but if silver, one half was to go to him, and the other to the church.

The XVth treateth of murder, and declares, if any one was murdered, the murderer should be enquired after in the village or town where the body was found, and if he was discovered, to be delivered up to the king's justice within eight days after the fact was committed; and in case he could not be found, a month and a day was allowed for search after him, within which term, if he could not be seized on, forty-six marks were to be collected out of that town: and if it was not able to pay so much, then the hundred was obliged to make it good. And forasmuch as this payment could not be made in the towns, and great inconveniences arose, the barons, the freeholders of the county, took care that six-and-forty marks should be paid out of the hundred, which being sealed up with the seal of some one baron of the county, they were to be sent to the treasurer, and by him so kept sealed up for a year and a day; within which time if the murderer was found out, upon his being delivered to the king's justice, they were to be repaid; but in case within that time he could not be discovered, then were the kindred of the murdered party to have six of the said marks, and the king the other forty: if he had no kindred, the lord was receive it; and if he had no lord, then his sworn friend and companion: but if there were none of these, then the king should have the whole to himself.

The XVIth article shews us how this method of discovering murder, and punishing the hundred, came to be in use where the murderer could not be found, viz. that king Canute, when he had gotten England, and settled it in peace, and, at the request of the English barons, had sent back his army to Denmark, those barons became sureties that all the Danes that staid behind with him should in all things enjoy perfect peace; so that in case an Englishman killed any of them, if he could not clear himself by the judgment of God, that is, by water or iron, meaning the ordeal, justice was to be executed upon him; and in case he ran away, payment was to be made as is aforesaid.

The XVIIth declares the office of a king in these words: The king, who is the vicegerent of the supreme king, is appointed to this very end, that he may govern and defend his earthly kingdom, and the people of the Lord; and above all things should reverence his holy church, and extirpate evil doers out of it, which unless he shall do, not so much as the name of a king shall remain to him, but he shall utterly lose it, as pope John witnesseth. Then follows the occasion of this opinion of pope John's, viz. his having given it in answer to the letter which Pepin, and Charles his son, wrote, concerning a foolish king of France, whether they should still continue him on the throne, or not? which being no material part of the law, I omit. And then there is somewhat concerning barons, which have courts and customs of their own, in these words: The archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, and all those that have sac, soc, thol, theam, and infang theof*, shall have their knights' servants, and all other sorts of dependents, under their friebourg, that is, should either have them forthcoming, or else should answer for them, that if they shall forfeit to any one, and a complaint be made against them, they must bring them forth, to have justice done them in their own court.

The XXIIId declares all Jews that were in the kingdom to be under the protection of the king, so that none of them could put himself in the service of any great man without the king's leave; for that the Jews, and all that are their's, are the king's.

By the XXIIId, king Edward forbad all usurers to continue in this kingdom: and if any one were convicted that he exacted usury, he should forfeit his goods, and be looked upon as outlawed.

After which follows, in Mr. Lambart's copy, another law, declaring the king's power, by virtue of his royal dignity, to pardon life and loss of limb; but with this proviso, that the malefactor make satisfaction as he hath injured, according to his power, and, besides, find sureties for his good behaviour; which if he did not, he was to be banished. From whence it may be observed, that this prerogative of pardoning in the king was not to extend to the prejudice of the party injured, or his kindred, to whom an appeal was hereby reserved. Concerning which the XIXth in like manner declares his royal prerogative to be such, that the king may set at liberty any captive or prisoner, whenever he comes in any city, borough, castle, &c. or if he meet with him in the way, by his mere word or command: yet was he, that was thus set at liberty, bound to make satisfaction to the injured party. But a murderer, traitor, or one guilty of such like crimes, although the king should pardon as to life and member, according to law, he shall in no wise stay in the country, but shall swear he will depart to the sea-coast within a stated time set him by the justice, and pass over as soon as he can get opportunity of a ship and wind: and in case any such prove perjured, and shall stay in the land beyond the time, any one that meets them may do justice upon them, and take away their lives. From whence may be observed the antiquity of the law for abjuring the realm for such great offences, to which the king's pardon did not then absolutely extend. The rest of this law, which only recites the penalties for the harbouring or favouring such malefactors, I omit.

The XXVIIth article gives leave to harbour a stranger or foreigner, whom in English they termed "couth or uncouth," that is, known or unknown, as a guest for two nights, in which space if he transgress, he that harboured shall not be answerable for him; but if any one be injured, and complaint is made that it was by the counsel and advice of him that lodged him, he shall, with two honest neighbours, purge himself as to the advice and fact, or otherwise shall make satisfaction. The reason whereof was, because after the third night, the law was such, that this stranger was to be looked upon as one of the family, and the master was to answer for him if he transgressed.

The XXVIIIth appoints how money and cattle brought into a town, and said, by him that brought them, to have been found, shall be disposed of, and who shall have the custody of them.

* That is to say, the privilege of holding courts for the trial of offenders within their own manors. For the particular signification of these words, see sir Henry Spelman's Glossary.

The XXXth enjoins, that those who have the king's peace, either by his hand or letters, shall take care not to injure others, under a double penalty.

The XXXIst declares the particular mulcts or penalties of those who should violate the king's peace above mentioned, and especially that of the eight days of his coronation, and of any of the feasts aforesaid; and who should have the forfeitures arising from thence, how much the king, and how much the earl, and how much the dean or the bishop in whose deanery the peace was broken.

The XXXVIth article directs, that after a man is killed as a thief or a robber, if any complaint be made by his nearest relations to the justice, that the man was wrongfully put to death, and lies buried among thieves, and that such relations offer to make it good, in such case they shall give security for so doing: and then it follows in what manner the party may be cleared in his reputation, and what satisfaction shall be made to his friends for it, in case it appears he was killed unjustly.

ARTS and SCIENCES.

HERE we must again turn our eyes to the great Alfred, who was alike the father and patron of every useful branch of learning and science, as he was of every wise institution in the kingdom he governed: being himself the finest scholar and the politest gentleman of his age, he could not but regret the low ebb to which learning of every kind was reduced in England in those days, so that, as we have already observed, there was hardly a person to be found who could translate a Latin epistle. He therefore resolved to give all possible encouragement to foreigners, who were men of letters, to come and settle in his kingdom; and the noble rewards he offered on this occasion soon drew to his court the most eminent in their professions, whose characters, as they were all or mostly churchmen, we have already given in considering the state of religion during this prince's reign.

But not thinking it sufficient to provide only for the present age, he extended his noble plan for the benefit of posterity, by erecting Oxford into a seminary of learning. Without entering into the much contested subject, whether Alfred was the first founder of this university, or whether he only made some additions to it, and enriched it by certain endowments, I shall content myself with abiding by what is incontrovertibly handed down to us; namely, that he built there colleges, or halls, one for teaching grammar, one for philosophy, and a third for divinity: these were, 1. Little University Hall endowed with competent salaries for twenty-six grammarians. 2. Lesser University Hall, for the maintenance of twenty-six students in logic and philosophy. 3. Great University Hall (now University College) wherein provision was made for twenty-six divines. From the Annals of Winchester we learn that the first professors in divinity were the two abbots St. Neots and Grimbald; Johannes Scotus in geometry and astronomy; Asserus for grammar and rhetoric; John, monk of St. David's, for logic, music, and arithmetic: and that these lectures were often honoured with the presence of the great Alfred himself, who, by his own example, encouraged the labours of those under him, and employed his royal pen in several works of literature, which might do honour even to the present age.

Alfred next turned his attention towards foreign and domestic commerce. With this view, to procure his subjects the benefits resulting from both these, he, with proffers of large reward, invited over many artificers from other countries, whom he employed in building ships of a larger burthen and more convenient for the transporting merchandize, than any that had hitherto been made use of. A number of these he let out to the principal merchants, for the encouragement of traffick: this, in a short time, enabled his subjects to reimburse themselves for the expences they had been at, in helping to support the war against the Danes, those brutal invaders of their country, as also to retrieve the losses they had sustained from their ravages.

We have, in Hacluit and Purchas, a noble monument of his encouragement to navigation, and of his attempt to discover a north-east passage; and many of his ships traded to countries till then unknown.

From these beginnings his marine came to be established on so respectable a footing, that when Edgar came to the throne, about sixty years afterwards, he was capable of sending to sea, on a short warning, no less than four thousand eight hundred sail of ships.

As I have mentioned this great improvement of Alfred in sea-affairs, the reader will undoubtedly be well pleased to see an account of the English shipping in his days, as we have it from sir John Spelman.

"He was (says my author) the first that put to sea such a navy as was awful to strangers; begun the first mastery of the seas, and in the service of his shipping, and found both quiet and reputation. His navy began, not only for number of ships, so great as to keep watch upon all the coasts of the kingdom, but for the quality of them, such as over-matched any of those that at any time infested the seas. What manner of vessels they were, whether ships or gallies, does not fully appear, nor will I determine; but that they were of divers sorts, and that some of them were nearer ships, and others nearer the form of gallies, that I may safely avow; and that some of them were of an especial building, by his own appointment, we have already shewn; where it is not hard to collect that they were after the manner of great long gallies, for they were rowed with forty oars apiece and above, and were as long again, as high again, as swift again, and more steady in sailing than the best of the enemies ships. How they should be so exceeding high as to double the height of the Danish ships, when they went not with sails but oars, I cannot well imagine; unless that, for the better receipt of soldiers, and their greater advantage in fighting, which in those grappling sea-fights consisted wholly in the superiority of standing, they had a plain level deck above the room that the rowers sat in, and from thence, with great odds of advantage, annoyed those they set upon; otherwise their height, which so much advantaged them in fight, would as much disadvantage them in speedy rowing, rowing. As for their steadiness, that argued their greatness and burden, whereby they drew the more water; which, though it were an hindrance in their speed, for the greater body the slower motion, yet that was borne out with an answerable number of rowers, which their length afforded: if this apprehension seem difficult, then may we reckon the height spoken of, to be meant by the height of their poops only, and not of the height of the whole sides of the ship; and so we may think them to have retained so much of the fashion of those of the Veneti, with whom when Cæsar fought, the height of their poops exceeded the tops of their fighting-turrets that were in Cæsar's ships: but those ships of the Veneti went not with oars, but with sails of leather; and these either only or chiefly with oars. If farther we enquire after the form of shipping used by the Saxons, Tacitus tells us, that the Suiones, which were part of the Suevians, as the Saxons were, used a kind of shipping, in the Baltic sea, very rude and plain, that was high before and behind, and made indifferent to go with either end forward, but forced only with oars, which they did not use in any constant fixed seats of rowing, but removed to and fro to any end or part of their ships, as occasion served, as we may see them do in our cock-boats or lighters. Those were slow for any service; though Tacitus counts the Suiones to be expert in shipping. Whether the Saxons came over in such vessels, and whether they continued the use of them, or found here a better form, I shall leave to the disquisition of others; it is sufficient for our purpose to shew, that whatsoever they formerly were, the king augmented the use of them, both in number and condition, over what they were before his coming to the crown."

Alfred, who had always the benefit of his people in view, thought it his duty to neglect no one thing useful in itself: to this end he encouraged all sorts of manufactures and their principal artists. He was the first who taught his subjects to make bricks, and to build their houses therewith, which were before only miserable huts of clay, thatched at the top; or, at best, of timber, rudely put together, without either ornament or security.

THESSE differed so very little from what we have shewn them to be in the last period, that it would be only a repetition of former pages to extend our remarks to any length on this head. I shall, therefore, only observe in general, that the English were notorious for excessive drinking, which was introduced by the Danes: and for that blind subjection to the clergy in all matters of religion, which frequently proved the means of forging chains for themselves.

In the reign of Edward the Confessor, the language and manners of the French began to be introduced; but as those did not so strongly prevail till after the coming of William, duke of Normandy, to the crown, we shall reserve what we have to say on that head, till we come to treat of the manners and customs of the next century.

But before we close our remarks on the present period, we shall take notice of the ancient

As the use of clocks and hour-glasses was not yet introduced into England, he invented a measurement of time by the means of wax-candles, in the following manner: he ordered a certain quantity of wax to be made into six candles, each exactly twelve inches long, with the division of the inches marked on them distinctly. These being lighted one after another, did orderly burn four hours apiece, that is, every three inches one hour, so that the whole six candles lasted just twenty-four hours.

Glass being then a great rarity, or unknown in England, he fell upon a method of scraping white horn so thin as to leave it transparent; in these he inclosed his candles, and hence came the invention of lanterns: and it is highly probable that he made this expedient serve also for window-lights.

In the year 915, Edward the Elder, in emulation of his illustrious father, used the short interval that he enjoyed from the toils of war, in the propagation of arts, and distinguished Cambridge in the manner his father had done Oxford. Some ignorant zealots have stuck at nothing to enhance the antiquity of this university; but we may, upon the whole, reasonably believe that it was a seat of learning, though perhaps not reduced to the form it now has, under this prince; and that he was at great trouble and expence to adorn it with the ablest masters in different professions.

In the reign of Edmund I. Turkytel, that king's near relation and chancellor, was the first who cast a great bell in England, which he named Guthlac, agreeable to a custom of naming bells, that had been introduced, together with the benediction, as a defensive against thunder and lightning, in this century, by pope John IX. Turkytel's successor, taking the hint, added some more to it, and made the first tunable ring of bells in England.

From this period nothing happened worthy of notice, nor did any improvement in the arts or sciences distinguish any part of the long space of time to the reign of William. And therefore we shall now haste to close this division of our history with an account of the manners and customs of our Anglo-Saxon ancestors preceding the Conquest.

manner of espousals in England, which, for its curiosity, we have thought worthy relating.

In the first place it was provided, that in case a man had a mind to marry a maid or a widow, that the bridegroom should have a meeting with the woman's attorney, and claim her in the holy bond of marriage, in case she and her friends are so pleased. If this request is admitted of, the man is then to engage to retain her as his wife, and to give sufficient security for her good treatment. The bridegroom was then to inform the bride and her friends of his circumstances: and there is some reason to believe, from the words of the record, that he was obliged, before marriage, to make her a present in hand, as well as to make a reasonable settlement for her, in case of his death. We must observe here likewise, that our ancestors were very kind to the ladies in this respect; for the record says, that if she survives him, it is reasonable that she have a right to half half his estate; and if she has children, to the whole, unless she should marry a second husband. For the performance of all this, both the bridegroom and his friends are to enter into a bond. The bride's kindred are then to deliver her over to the bridegroom as a wife. But what will sound very odd in modern times, her attorney, or the person who was principally concerned in making the match, seems to have been obliged to enter into a bond for the lady's chastity during her state of wedlock. If, after marriage, the wife should be carried into the land of another thane, her friends obliged the kindred of the husband not only to give fresh security for her good treatment, but in case of any forfeiture incurred by her, that they should pay the balance, if her own means were not sufficient for satisfaction. By which last clause there is reason to believe, that the present made to the woman before or at the time of marriage, was in the nature of a separate alimony, to be enjoyed as her own property during wedlock.

The ceremony of conferring the order of knight-hood among the English at this time, was performed in the following manner.

The person to be knighted confessed himself to a priest, and spent the preceding night in watching and praying in the church. The next morning, before mass, he offered up his sword upon the altar; and, after reading the Gospel, the priest blessed the sword, and put it over the knight's neck; after which he received the communion, and was thenceforward deemed a true knight.

But notwithstanding the pretence which Alfred obtained, on this occasion, over his subject, it had no effect in winning him over to the Saxon side; nor was it worthy his character, or the duty he owed his country; for although William had been generally owned as heir and successor to Edward the Conqueror, and the former kings had been wont only to promise on their royal words to maintain the laws and the liberties of the subject, &c. The Crowning of WILLIAM I. commonly called the CONQUEROR, the First King of ENGLAND of the NORMAN Race, to the Restoration of the SAXON Line under HENRY II. forming an Æra of Eighty-eight Years.

P A R T IV.

W I L L I A M I. A. D. 1066.

IN the foregoing part of our history we left William waiting in his station at Barking, till the necessary preparations were completed for encircling his brows with that crown, to acquire which he had laboured through all the mazes of politics, and braved every danger in the field of battle. If we may be here allowed a retrospection of past events, we shall find that William, howsoever he may have been dignified with the title of the Conqueror of England, seems to have obtained his seat on the throne of this kingdom as much by the voluntary consent of the people of England as by his victories; for the only person who had a right to dispute that seat with him, having made a formal cession of his rights, what remained for the people to do, bereft of a leader to assert the freedom of their choice, but to acquiesce in the temper of the times, and submit to him whom they found they could no longer resist? Thus insured of success, William set out for London, to be inaugurated. Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, was the person who, in virtue of his character and station, ought to have placed the crown on the head of this new claimant; but as at that time he laboured under the papal suspension, and was moreover well known to be no favourer of the Norman line, William did not chuse that he should perform the ceremony; probably out of fear of giving umbrage to the pope, who had so warmly espoused his cause. For these reasons, as also for his approved fidelity to Edgar Atheling, from whose cession of the throne William seemed to establish his fullest right to the sovereign rule, Aldred, archbishop of York, was pitched upon to perform the ceremony. The monkish writers, indeed, affect to make Stigand refuse this office out of his loyalty and affection to the blood of Cerdic: the principal of these is Thorn; but the many historical errors he is guilty of, which have been implicitly followed by his copyists, leave little room to depend upon their assertions. Thorn himself, for instance, tells us that William was crowned in 1064, whereas almost every other historian of credit, and, indeed, the course of events, fully evince this occurrence to have taken place at Christmas 1066.

But notwithstanding the preference which Aldred obtained, on this occasion, over his superior, it had no effect in winning him over to the least concession unworthy his character, or the duty he owed his country; for although William had been generally owned as heir and successor to Edward the Confessor, and that former kings had been wont only to promise on their royal words to maintain the laws and the liberties of the subject, &c. Aldred obliged William to bind himself by a solemn oath to perform these conditions: and this prince, who was too politic to do any thing that was likely to give umbrage to his new subjects, and being perhaps sensible that absolute power can dispense with those engagements that are not for its interest to observe, he readily complied: besides, there may be yet another reason given for William's acquiescence on this head, namely, that it was agreeable to the custom of his own country, where every prince, on his first accession sion to the throne, was obliged to submit to this ceremony.

The manner of his coronation is too curious to be passed over in silence in a work of this nature, especially as it is a proof, that whatever his behaviour was after he was settled on the throne, he by no means claimed it in right of conquest; for at this solemnity, Aldred, after a sermon or oration made to the English, asked them, if they consented that William should be crowned? Upon which they answered in the affirmative with one voice. The bishop of Constance then put the same question to the Normans and other foreigners there present, who returned the same answer: upon which Aldred set the crown upon his head.

The loud acclamations which ensued upon this occasion, had well nigh proved fatal to the inhabitants of Westminster; and, in fact, gave the first occasion to that disgust which the English entertained for the Norman government. The Conqueror, who was too cautious to trust himself in the power of the Londoners without having a sufficient security for his person, had, under the shew of greater state, surrounded Westminster abbey, the place of his inauguration, with a body of Norman soldiers; who, when they heard the tumultuous shouts of the people within the church, on placing the crown on the duke's head, mistook their acclamations for an uproar occasioned by a dispute or quarrel, and thinking their leader in danger, without taking any time to examine into the truth of the fact, they set fire to the city, and began to kill and plunder at random. Those within doors, equally ignorant of the reason of the tumult without, and seeing the flames and hearing the cries of those who ran to the church for shelter, were seized with a panic, different according to the different situations of those whom it affected. The English imagined some treachery was on foot, and that their victor king had doomed them to destruction, in order to fix himself more firmly in his new acquired dignity. William himself, trembling and aghast, thought of nothing but a plot to assassinate him, and fled with precipitation from his throne to the high altar for sanctuary. But all parties being soon convinced of their error, a stop was put to the confusion, and the flames were extinguished before they had done any considerable damage.

The first thing the new king did after his coronation, was to seize on the treasure Harold had laid up at Winchester, and which was very considerable. The greatest part of this he distributed in largesses among the principal officers of his army, and in gifts to churches and monasteries, in order to gain the reputation of a pious and religious prince. On this occasion he did not forget his good friend and abettor the pope, to whom he made several magnificent presents: at the same time he sent to Rome the standard of Harold, which had been taken in the battle of Hastings, as a kind of tacit acknowledgement that the obtaining the English crown had been in a great measure owing to the favourable intervention and approbation of the supreme pontiff, on his undertaking that enterprise. Having thus exhausted the monies which had been found in the late king's coffers, there was a necessity to fall upon some means to replenish them again, in order to provide for the exigencies of state. With this view William employed several of his trusty friends and emissaries to feel the pulses of the people, and, if possible, to prevail on them to make their new sovereign a free gift, from an intimation that such an instance of their confidence and esteem could not fail of having the most agreeable effect upon the king's mind, and insure to them his goodwill and protection. These plausible arguments, artfully urged, had the desired effect; in a short time William received presents from all quarters of the kingdom, to a very considerable amount; the first beginnings of his reign seemed to promise his people a suitable return, and the deluded English fondly promised themselves that they were about to enjoy all the blessings of a just and mild administration: in which, however, they too soon found themselves miserably deceived, as will appear by the sequel.

To impress a favourable opinion of his moderation and equity, he began his reign by strictly enjoining his principal Norman officers to treat the English with humanity, and respect them as their brethren, and as one people with themselves: he issued orders, forbidding the soldiery to commit the least outrage on the inhabitants, under the severest penalties; and published an edict, formally confirming all the privileges of the people, and all the promises he had made in their behalf by his coronation-oath. This artful shew of love and kindness prepared the minds of the English for his next step, which was that of dividing among his followers the lands of all the noblemen who had appeared in arms against him, as well those that fell in the battle as those that survived: and to leave as little room as possible for murmurings or heart-burnings, from a suspicion of partiality in this distribution, he distinguished with particular marks of favour Edgar Atheling, to whom he granted many large possessions, and, as some authors say, created him earl of Oxford; but this latter circumstance has been strongly contested. He likewise conferred posts of great importance on many other English noblemen, particularly Edwin and Morcar, to whom he shewed all the regard that was due to their high station. And to convince the English still more fully of his good intentions, he projected matches between his officers and the English ladies, and at the same time provided husbands among the English for the Norman heiresses. He likewise granted a new charter to the city of London, confirming the privileges and immunities which the citizens enjoyed in the days of Edward the Confessor.

The Londoners, caught with this specious bait, reposed an unlimited confidence in him, and even permitted him, under pretence of better regulating the government of their city, to erect several forts therein, which, being garrisoned by Normans, effectually bridled the inhabitants, and bound them to the most pacific behaviour, from a regard to their own safety. At the same time he made such a disposition of his forces in quarters, that he had little to apprehend from any efforts the English could make to recover their liberties.

And now, that he might leave nothing undone that could tend to the securing of his new acquisition, he resolved upon a tour through some of the principal parts of England, under a pretence of inspecting the civil œconomy of the kingdom, curbing the turbulent, encouraging the quiet, and guarding against public danger, by extirpating the banditti and robbers, who infested the country and and sheltered themselves in the woods, with which the kingdom was at that time almost covered.

To be held for a just, moderate, and equitable king by his subjects William thought not sufficient, unless, in compliance with the prevailing humour of the age, he also established in their minds an opinion of his religion and piety. With this view, which shewed him to be perfectly well acquainted with the dispositions of those with whom he had to deal, he built a church and monastery on the field where Harold was slain, in which prayers were to be made for the souls of those that had fallen in the fight; the high altar was erected on the very spot where Harold's standard had been taken up, or, as some say, where his body was found. The church he ordered to be dedicated to St. Martin, and the monastery to be called Battle Abbey*. This abbey was filled with monks of the Benedictine order, from the great monastery of Winchester, and exempted from episcopal jurisdiction.

It was now towards the beginning of Lent, in the year 1067, when William began to turn his thoughts towards his Norman dominions, which had, during the interval of his landing in England, been left in a defenceless condition, as he had taken with him in this expedition the greatest part of his troops. In order, therefore, to prevent any attempts on his patrimonial inheritance by the king of France, who might be tempted, by the opportunity of his absence, to attack them, he determined to go thither in person. But, previous to the taking this step, he thought it expedient to use every precaution to preserve his late acquisition: with this view, besides the forts he had built in London, he erected others at Norwich, Winchester, Hereford, Hastings, and Dover, all of which he filled with such of his Normans on whom he could best confide for their courage and attachment. He also disarmed all the English, and broke their militia. This act, which is ever that of all tyrants, he glossed over under a pretence of lenity, to ease them of their burthens, and of the expence of keeping arms ready for service on any emergence, and the trouble of appearing at the annual muster†. He took especial care not to forget the citizens of London in this exemption, whom he totally disarmed, and thus left the kingdom naked and defenceless to the mercy of a standing army of Norman foreigners. The command of this army, and the government of the realm, under the title of regents, he committed, during his absence, to his half-brother Odo, bishop of Bayeux, whom he had made earl of Kent, a prelate equally qualified for the management of civil, military, and ecclesiastical affairs; and to William Fitzosborne, a wise, brave, and experienced general, in whom he placed an entire confidence, and whom he had lately made earl of Arundel and Hereford.

Having thus settled every thing upon a safe footing in England, William embarked at Pevensey, in Sussex, and passed over into Normandy; and in the very act of his departure he gave an instance of his consummate policy, in carrying with him not only the hostages which had been delivered to him upon the submission of London and the different parts of the kingdom, but likewise several of the principal nobility, whom he imagined likely, either from inclination or power, able to excite any commotions in his absence. The chief of these were Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, Edwin and Morcar, earls of Mercia and Northumberland, the abbot of Glastonbury, Egelnoth and Waltheof, sons of earl Siward, both powerful noblemen, the one in Kent, and the other in the North of England: and to strike at the very root of his apprehensions, to these he added Edgar Atheling, whom he wisely judged it was not safe or prudent to leave behind in a kingdom to which he had an undoubted title, and whose people loved him to a degree of adoration; consequently might be easily worked upon to hazard an attempt in his favour, should his name be made use of, or he be prevailed upon to put himself at their head. His pretence for taking these great men along with him, was to do them honour, as his most intimate friends and counsellors, and the brightest ornaments of his court: and, indeed, he treated them all with the greatest exterior of respect, particularly Stigand, whom he always, saith Malmesbury, accosted with the title of Father, rising from his seat in all assemblies when he entered, and omitting no ceremony or honour that was due either to the dignity of his person or the sacredness of his character.

He was received in his Norman dominions with all possible demonstrations of joy, and kept his Easter in the abbey of Feschamp, whither the king of France, who had conceived an high idea of William's fortune and success, sent Rodolph, his father-in-law, with a most splendid retinue, to congratulate him on his late victory and coronation. William, resolving not to be out-done by his brother of France in magnificence, affected to shine out in his full lustre on this occasion; and the richness of his own dress, and those of his attendants, added to the vast profusion of gold and silver vessels, astonished the French so much that they could hardly give credit to their own senses, but thought the whole a delusion of the fancy. But no part of what they beheld struck them with such surprise and pleasure together, as the comeliness of the English, whose faces and shapes, to which they had hitherto been in a manner strangers, seemed formed for patterns of beauty and elegance. As this is the testimony of a French author‡, it is the less to be suspected.

But the pleasures in which William indulged himself among his native subjects were soon disturbed by the news he received from England, where he found all the precautions he had taken to establish tranquility had been rendered ineffectual, through the behaviour of the regents, who had, either themselves or by their officers, miserably oppressed the English committed to their charge, by loading them with the most grievous exactions, and exerting such an arbitrary rule as the free and independent spirits of that people could in no wise brook. And here we find a strange disagreement between our historians, in regard to the subsequent troubles and the insurrections raised against William's authority: some will have it, that this prince, acting wholly upon the principles of tyrannical policy, had left such orders with Odo and Fitzosberne, on quitting the kingdom, as he knew, from their nature, could not fail of proving very unpopular, while, by vesting his authority in substitutes, he shifted from his own person upon those of his deputies all the odium of such measures. The Norman writers, on the other hand, and especially William of Poitiers, a professed creature and dependent of William, in order to exculpate the two regents, throw the whole blame on the fickle disposition of the English, alike restless under every administration. They represent the conduct of the regents as guided by justice and moderation, and to have given the English not the least cause of complaint, notwithstanding that these latter had shewn in all their actions a disposition to mutiny, ingratitude, and turbulence. Upon the whole, the fairest inference that can be drawn seems to be this, that William, sensible the English, after the charms of novelty had faded in their minds, would return to their inbred affection for the race of their former kings, and might readily seize the first opportunity to shake off a foreign yoke, had given the governors he had entrusted with the management of affairs in the kingdom, the necessary orders for guarding against such an event, by applying a sharp remedy to the very first symptoms of a party eruption in the body politic; and that these ministers, looking upon those over whom they had the rule in the contemptible light of a conquered people, might have been too hasty in their application of the prescribed remedy, and by an injudicious treatment have rendered that a corrosive which was intended only as a sanative prevention: while the English, considering only what they felt in general, without examining how far the conduct of some individuals might have occasioned the sufferings they complained of, had recourse to the most violent measures, and ran into open opposition against their rulers.

However this might have been, we find the inhabitants of Kent, who thought themselves more particularly aggrieved by the government of Odo, and not finding their remonstrances so properly attended to, as they imagined they had a right to expect, entered into a private correspondence with Eustace, count of Boulogne, the very person to whom they had shewn so violent an animosity in the reign of Edward the Confessor, and invited him over to head them, or at least requested that he would send them a supply of men and money, to assist them in recovering their liberties, and bringing their oppressors to condign punishment.

Eustace had at that time a personal quarrel with William, as duke of Normandy, and therefore, dropping all resentment against the English for the treatment he had received from them when in their country, gave their messengers a very favourable reception, and readily acquiesced in the proposal made to him. The negotiation was carried on so secretly, that the regency knew nothing of it but by the effects. Odo and Hugh de Montfort (one of William's ministers, and deputy-governor, under Odo, of Dover castle) distrusting no harm, were both of them at that time absent from their charge, so that every thing seemed to favour the designs of the malecontents: Eustace set sail from Boulogne, and landed at Dover in the night-time, with a chosen body of troops, and gave a vigorous assault to that castle; but the garrison, quickly recovering the surprize they were at first thrown into by this unexpected attack, made a vigorous rally, and falling upon the assailants; put them to flight, drove Eustace and his men to their ships, and a division of the English, which had joined him, towards the brow of a rock, where most of them were precipitated down the cliffs into the sea: Eustace's nephew was taken prisoner in this skirmish, and the count himself narrowly escaped with a few of his followers.

This bad success at the beginning was not sufficient to damp the spirits of those who had unfurled the standard of liberty; their example ran through the kingdom like wild-fire, so that no sooner was the flame extinguished in one part, than it burst forth in another. The next scene of disturbance we hear of, had its rise in Shropshire and Herefordshire, and was of so violent a nature as to threaten the most serious consequences; and so high did the tide of discontent run throughout the kingdom, that Coxo, a nobleman of great power and property, and highly in favour with the English, was murdered by his own vassals, because he would not head them in an insurrection. This worthy lord, whom some of our antiquaries take to have been earl of Northumberland, was a man of strict virtue, and notwithstanding that he lamented the oppression under which some of his countrymen laboured, he thought that the oath of fealty he had made to William, in common with other nobles of the realm, after the battle of Hastings, would not allow him to take up arms against him in his absence.

These considerations, however, had but small weight with Edric, surnamed Sylvaticus, or the Forester, nephew to the infamous Edric Streon, who lived in the reign of Ethelred II. This nobleman's estates lay on the borders of Wales: history does not inform us what reasons he alleged for taking up arms; he had, like earl Coxo and other noblemen, sworn allegiance to William, and had met with the most favourable reception and kind treatment from him. However, seeing himself now at the head of a strong party of the malecontents, he attacked the territories of Richard Scrope, and other Normans in Herefordshire, and being joined by a body of the Welsh, under Blethwyn and Rynwellen, princes of Powis and North Wales, he wasted all the country as far as Luggen bridge, after making a considerable booty, returned home. Nor were these the only insurrections that were raised by the English against the Norman intruders; great numbers of those foreigners were set upon and cut off, by bands of people that rendezvoused in woods and forests.

William, on receiving information of these commotions, left the government of Normandy in the hands of Matilda, his duchess, and his eldest son Robert, and setting sail from thence, landed at Winchelsea, on the sixth of December, 1067. By his sudden arrival he defeated a plan which had been concerted by the English, for shaking off the Norman yoke; and it is not improbable that the discovery of this design having been imparted to him, was the principal means of hastening his coming over. The conspiracy, indeed, was too general, and there were too many concerned in its intended execution, for it to be kept secret: the design was to fall at the same hour upon the Norman forces dispersed in different quarters of the kingdom, for its defence; and having destroyed these, the conspirators thought they should easily oppose the king's setting foot in the kingdom, if he returned from Normandy. Ash Wednesday, when the Normans used, according to the Christian custom and penitential discipline of those days, to go to church barefooted, unarmed, and in the garb of penitents, was the day, and the time of divine service the hour, fixed for the execution of the proposed massacre.

William, by his return, appeased in some measure the storm his absence had raised. But these attempts, and in particular the one last recited, gave him so great a suspicion of all the English in general, that he began from that time to look upon them as so many secret enemies, who only waited for a favourable opportunity to revolt and dispossess him of the throne. And, indeed, this opinion of his seems not to have been without grounds; for, if we consider William's temper, and the disposition of the English with respect to him, it will be found almost impossible, in the nature of things, that there should have subsisted between them that mutual confidence which is the earnest of tranquility in a state. The king was naturally mistrustful and severe: his generosity to his followers, and other expences, had run him greatly in debt: besides, he was fond of money, and never was happy while his coffers were empty; in fine, his excessive partiality to his own nation frequently prevented him from giving ear to the complaints of his new subjects against the old, who, on many occasions, did undoubtedly make use of the king's favour to grind the faces of the English; while, on the other hand, these latter entertained an implacable aversion to, and prejudice against, the Normans. This prejudice, which had begun in the reign of Edward and had been kept alive by earl Godwin and his sons, had been still farther increased by the late transactions during William's absence; for whatever care the king may be supposed to have taken to recommend to his Normans the mild and just treatment of the English, there was no hindering them from abusing the superiority they had over them, by having all the places of strength in their own hands; and the least appearance of an insult was by the English construed into the most cruel act of tyranny, and destroyed the good intelligence that should have subsisted for the general benefit, between the two nations. Lastly, the administration of the two regents, during his absence, gave the English great reason to believe that they would not have dared to have carried so high an hand, had they not been encouraged thereto by their master, or at least under no apprehension of drawing down his anger upon them for such a conduct. Moreover, when they found that, after his return, he neglected to punish those men for their peculation, they set no bounds to their murmurs and complaints, nor were at any pains to conceal their dissatisfaction. William, on his side, finding how matters stood, was convinced that he could no longer trust them, and, therefore, resolved to govern them with an iron rod; as also to put his Normans in possession of all their lands, as opportunity should offer.

It was, however, essentially necessary to conceal a design, the avowal of which would have thrown, perhaps, insurmountable obstacles in the way of its completion, by exasperating the English to a general insurrection. He therefore had recourse to that dissimulation which had served him so well on former occasions; and though he firmly persisted in his intent, he pursued it with the most refined policy, gaining his point by degrees, and carrying it on under the veil of the most engaging caresses, and the most ensnaring promises of kindness, affection, and friendship, the usual covers for ill designs in mean or ambitious breasts.

The late alliance between Edwin and the Welsh had given him no little uneasiness; he dreaded lest those two nations, forgetting their former animosities, should join in their hatred and opposition to him and his government: he therefore left nothing undone to awaken a mutual distrust of each other in both these people, which he in some measure affected, and thus found means to weaken the gathering storm, yet not so thoroughly but that it made itself felt in different parts of the kingdom, especially in the northern and western quarters, where matters seemed strongly disposed in favour of a revolution. We must not here forget, that in order to bind Edwin, the powerful earl of Mercia, to his interest, he promised that nobleman his daughter in marriage, a promise which he seemed totally to have forgotten when his authority became afterwards so firmly established as no longer to stand in need of his friendship.

The first signal which William gave of his intention to rule by arbitrary power was manifested in the revival of the tax of Danegelt*, so justly odious to the whole English nation. The levying it without calling together the states, gave them great cause for suspicion, and added fuel to the present discontent. On this occasion, Aldred, archbishop of York, took the liberty to make several remonstrances to the king with a noble freedom, and endeavoured to dissuade him from so unpopular a measure; but William, deaf to his advice, or rather incensed at his intermeddling, instead of desisting from his design, gave orders for the levying this tax with the most rigorous exactness.

These orders struck a terror into those parts of the kingdom that were more immediately under his eye and the power of his standing army, so that little or no opposition was made to the payment of it in those counties adjacent to the capital; but the more remote provinces of Cornwall and Devonshire did not so tamely stoop beneath the burthen, and the city of Exeter was the first that refused to submit to the Conqueror's new regulations. It is to be observed, that Githa, the mother of Harold, had retired to this city with all her rich effects, after the battle of Hastings, so fatal to her family, and had here, with all her riches, lived uninterrupted, and in a splendor little inferior to that of the possessor of the crown: and it is not improbable but that her influence might in a great measure have contributed to the resistance made on this oc-

* His reasons for reviving this tax, says Mr. Guthrie, in several respects were plausible: many of the English, Danes, and others, who had sided with Harold, had retired to Denmark upon William's success. Sweyn, king of Denmark, was so far from relinquishing his pretensions in blood to the crown of England, that he was actually preparing to make them good by a powerful armament; and there was great reason to believe that he would, on his arrival, be joined by a considerable party of English. This, though not taken notice of by any of our modern historians, seems to have furnished William with the hint of reviving this tax, which he did merely by virtue of his own prerogative. *Guth. caſion by the inhabitants of theſe counties, who abſolutely refuſed to ſwear fealty to William, or to admit a gariſon of Normans whom he had ſent down to take poſſeſſion of their ſtrong holds. William, not chuſing to ſuffer any one inſtance of refractorineſs to go unpuniſhed, left an ill-timed lenity might give riſe to future diſturbances of this kind, ſent the malecontents word, that unleſs they immediately returned to their duty, they had nothing to expect but the moſt rigorous treatment for their diſobedience. They, in no wiſe intimidated by his menaces, perſiſted in the reſolution they had taken, upon which he marched in perſon, with a ſtrong force, to quell them. And here he gave the moſt remarkable inſtance of that refined policy to which moſt of his ſucceſſes had in fact been owing: notwithſtanding he had ſo many Normans ready to march at his command, the greateſt part of the army he raiſed on this occaſion was compoſed of Engliſh, that he might not leave them even the ſhadow of a plea for their ſtubborneſs, by alleging that foreigners were made uſe of, to drive them into a compliance with the will of a foreigner; he therefore reſolved to make the Engliſh cut each other's throats, and, oh ſhameful to be told! they themſelves aſſiſted him in his deſigns. Thus he at once ſpared his faithful Normans, and by thinning the number of the Engliſh, and, what was ſtill more to his purpoſe, by creating between two people of the ſame nation an irreconcilable animosity, he by degrees attained every point he had in view. From hence, oh ye people! invincible whiſt united, learn to diſtruſt and contemn all ſuch, however ſpecious may be their pretences, who ſeek to ſow the ſeeds of diſcord among ye! and reſt aſſured, that every ſuch endeavour can only have your ruin and the aggrandizement of the foes to your happy conſtitution for its real ſource.

Advancing therefore againſt Exeter (A. D. 1068) with the Engliſh in the front of his army, he prepared to lay ſiege to the town in form, which ſo intimidated the magiſtrates and perſons of property within the place, that they ſent a deputation to him, with offers of ſubmiſſion and hoſtages as pledges of their ſincerity. But the populace, who had more reſolution, becauſe they had leſs to loſe, reſuſed to abide by the pact the deputies had made, ſhut the gates againſt the king juſt as he was preparing to enter and take poſſeſſion of the city, and declared they would defend themſelves therein as long as one ſtone remained upon another.

William, highly incenſed at this affront, had reſort to a cruel device, in order to ſtrike terror into the beſieged, for commanding one of the hoſtages to be brought out in view of the walls, his eyes were there inhumanly put out. This deed, however, had a different effect on the minds of thoſe within from what William had imagined, and only ſerved to make them more deſperate, upon which he found himſelf conſtrained to begin the ſiege in earneſt. Having carried on his approaches almoſt to the foot of the walls, he ordered his battering engines to play furiouſly upon them, and at the ſame time gave directions for undermining the ramparts. His orders were executed with the greateſt alacrity, and the townſmen, who had been before ſo insolent, now ſtruck with the baſeſt fear, implored the compaſſion of the victor; but William, who was not to be eaſily appeaſed when once his reſentment was thoroughly roused, reſuſed to hearken to any terms, and threatened to put to the ſword all thoſe who had ſhut the gates againſt him. However, the remonſtrances of the principal nobles and clergy in his camp, whom he did not care to diſoblige, added to the dictates of policy and a deſire to poſſeſs his ſubjects with a notion of his clemency, to which he was in his heart a ſtranger, got the better of his wrath, inſomuch that he not only pardoned them, but even prevented his ſoldiers from plundering their city. As to Githa, ſhe, upon the firſt approach of William, had found means to get on ſhipboard, with her effects, and eſcaped to Flanders. In order to prevent future inſurrections, he built a citadel in the place, which he filled with a ſtrong gariſon, under the command of Baldwin de Moles, on whom he likewiſe beſtowed the government of the county.

From thence he marched into Cornwall, to quell the commotions there, in which he ſucceeded to his wiſh; and having provided for the future peace of that county, he returned to Wincheſter, and ordered his army into winter-quarters.

In this city he paſſed his Eaſter. Hither his duchefs Matilda, or Maude, came to him from Normandy, ſoon after the holidays; and was crowned, on Whitſunday, by archbiſhop Alfred: and before the expiration of the year was delivered of a ſon, who was named Henry, and afterwards filled the throne of England.

And now the king, finding that he could no longer put off the payment of his debts, and the rewards had ſo often promiſed to thoſe who aſſiſted him in compaſſing his deſigns on the Engliſh ſucceſſion, and being loth to part with the immense ſums he had raiſed by Danegelt*, beſought him of another expedient, which was, perhaps, the moſt unpopular, if not unjuſt, that he could poſſibly have deviſed. He ſent commiſſaries into every county, to take information of thoſe who had been engaged in the battle of Haſtings, on Harold's ſide, and to conſiſcate their eſtates.

About this time Aldred, the good archbiſhop of York, finding that all his remonſtrances were of no effect, and that William, contrary to his advice, was proceeding to acts of tyranny and oppression, whereas he had always entertained a different opinion of him, in the bitterness of his heart pronounced a severe curse against him, and soon after died with grief.

William, now rid of this troublesome monitor, listened only to the dictates of his own imperious will; and the inquisition which he had set on foot was carried on with such rigour that most of the men of property among the English were dispossessed of their lands, on frivolous, and too frequently false, pretences, and they were bestowed on the craving Normans. This gave rise to numberless complaints and representations to the throne against the injustice of these proceedings†; but William, who was by this expedient enabled to pay his debts, and satisfy the clamours of his greedy followers, gave himself little or no concern about the rest: besides, these confiscations gave him an opportunity of filling the several counties with such persons as were devoted to his interest, and must find their account in maintaining him in his new throne.

The favourers of William, who are as strenuous in praising this prince as his enemies are in blackening his character (and both sides frequently more swayed by their private sentiments than a strict regard to truth), have laboured to gloss over this act of oppression, by setting forth, in the most pompous manner, an act of justice the king did on this occasion, by restoring a confiscated estate to an English lord*, on the latter making it appear that he had never borne arms against him. Tyrrel, indeed, calls this fact in question, because this estate is not mentioned in Doomsday Book: however, as eighteen years had passed between the time this incident fell out and the survey made by William, and on which he formed that book, we may naturally suppose that during this interval many alterations of property might happen, both in the Saxon and Norman possessions, especially at a period wherein there was such a fluctuation of property: in charity, therefore, we will give William credit for the story. But to return.

The discontent became now general and loud, and the daily confiscations made against all right and equity completely wearied out the patience of the English, who, in this their deep distress, naturally turned their eyes upon the two brothers Edwin and Morcar, from whose valour and patriotic spirit they alone expected deliverance from the Norman oppression. At this time also William had greatly alienated the affections of the first of these noblemen from his service, by neglecting or rather refusing to perform the promise he had made him of giving him his daughter in marriage. This affront, together with the sufferings of his countrymen and the continual intreaties he had from them to espouse their cause, determined him to take up arms. Morcar, his brother, who looked upon the late attempts the king had made upon the properties of the inferior nobility as no more than a prelude to what he was preparing for those of the first rank, and in which he should necessarily find himself and family involved, readily engaged in the party of the malecontents. As these two lords had a very great interest in the kingdom, they soon got together a powerful army, which was reinforced by succours from Blethwyn, prince of North Wales, their nephew, who joined them with a good number of troops. It does not appear, from any good authority, that Edgar Atheling was actually in this rebellion; perhaps William would not trust him far from his presence, well knowing his great influence with the English.

Notwithstanding the great power of which the two brothers now found themselves assured, they did not care to hazard an open rupture with such a formidable prince as William, until they had first solicited succours from Sweyn, king of Denmark, and had actually received promises of a reinforcement from Malcolm, then king of the Scots. These precautions being taken, they assembled their forces at York, and publicly declared their design to wrest the sceptre out of the hands of a prince, who by his manifold acts of oppression and injustice had shewn himself unworthy of reigning over a free and generous people.

William no sooner received the alarming news of this insurrection than he put himself at the head of a chosen army of Normans, on whose fidelity he knew he could confide, and set out towards the North to reduce the rebels to reason. Morcar and Edwin, finding themselves disappointed of the expected support of Sweyn, and also of those succours that were to have been sent them from the Scots, and finding that William had taken the precaution to put all the strong holds of the country into the hands of governors he could trust, and, moreover, perceiving that great numbers of the malecontents, who had at first joined them, were daily dropping off, and that they should soon be left to shift for themselves; on all these considerations they determined to submit to the Conqueror, which they accordingly did; and he, not willing to exasperate the English, received them with a seeming complaisance; nevertheless, as he still apprehended some disturbances from the spirit of disaffection which reigned in the northern part of the kingdom, he, without trusting to the submission of the two brothers, marched onwards against the city of York, the capital of that country, and where several of the rebels had sheltered themselves with no inconsiderable force; but the defection of those leaders, on whom they placed their chief dependence, had such an effect on them, that they sent deputies to meet William on his way, with the keys of the town, which he gladly accepted, and, without proceeding to any extremities against the inhabitants, contented himself with erecting strong fortresses in their city and the adjacent country, which, as usual, he committed to the care of his Norman generals, well knowing that their own interest would induce them to be properly cautious to stifle the first attempts towards any commotions, which, if they intended to injure his authority,

† The sufferers urged in their defence, that when they took up arms, Harold was in actual possession of the throne, and that he had been elected at a time when William's pretensions were not known; they added, that they had never taken an oath to the duke of Normandy prior to the battle of Hastings, and consequently were not liable to have their estates confiscated for bearing arms against him. Besides, had they been really guilty of a rebellion, in appearing at the battle of Hastings, they had made ample amends for this error in their conduct, by the subsequent submission, which had been accepted by him, and engaged a promise from him that he would protect them in their rights and privileges. These reasons were not only plausible, but strong and founded on fact.

* Edwin, proprietor of Sharnburn, in Norfolk, whose lands the king had given to William de Warren and William de Albany, the first his forester and the other his cup-bearer.

could not fail of prejudicing themselves, who were altogether dependent on him, and existed only in his welfare.

By this time every thing bowed before the power of the Conqueror, in those very provinces which had so lately given him the greatest uneasiness. Archil, a nobleman of great interest in the northern parts, made his submission, and even sent his son as an hostage to William for his good behaviour: the example began now to prevail universally, and Egelwin, bishop of Durham, who had been one of the most busy in blowing up the flames of discontent, now fell in with the humour of the times, and made his peace: to render which the more effectual and agreeable to the king, he prevailed on Malcolm, king of Scots, to disclaim any future connections with the malecontents, and to swear peace and amity with William, who having thus successfully quelled this rebellion, which in its beginning threatened such untoward consequences, employed the leisure he now happily found, in providing against future commotions by placing strong garrisons in all those places that he had the most reason to be diffident of; accordingly we find Lincoln, Cambridge, and Huntingdon bridled by strong forts, powerfully manned with Norman soldiers.

Unsuccessful attempts towards the recovery of liberty always rivet the chains of those who groan under oppression. So fared it with the English on this occasion, their late faint efforts had served only to manifest their disaffection, without answering any one salutary end to themselves; on the contrary, it only armed the hands of their severe master with new means for binding their necks to the heavy yoke he had prepared for them. The late tumults he had made use of as a plausible pretext to strip all those obnoxious to him of their estates, or to deprive them of their liberty, and in many instances of both. However, the inborn spirit of English freedom was not wholly extinguished; some few sparks yet remained, and those were cherished in the breasts of Gospatrick and Marleswin, two northern noblemen, who, unable to bear the state of slavery to which they thought their country on the eve of being reduced, endeavoured to awaken in the mind of the supine Edgar Atheling those sentiments which befitted a person of his birth and expectations. Cold and inactive as his soul was by nature, the prospect of a throne, to which he had an undoubted right, the cries of a people who were by the laws of succession his, and some latent principles of the Cerdic blood, begot in him a momentary ardour; he blushed at having so long led an inglorious and inactive life, crouching beneath the rule of the usurper of the throne of his ancestors; he shook off indolence; he felt himself animated with a glorious emulation; but, sensible that he had neither friends nor power sufficient to stem the current of his adverse fortune, he resolved to seek in a foreign alliance that support which he could not hope, for the present, to find among his countrymen: and therefore, in conjunction with the two noblemen abovementioned, and with the other remains of the blood royal, Margaret and Christina, his two sisters, and his mother Agatha, he retired into Scotland, where Malcolm, the king of that country, notwithstanding his late pacification with William, received the illustrious fugitives with the utmost hospitality: formerly an exile himself, he was moved with compassion for their fate. Compassion insensibly begets attachment: love, in this instance, added its powerful influence; Malcolm beheld the princess Margaret with an eye of affection, she received his passion with complacency, and a short time united the royal pair: from this marriage sprung Matilda, or Maud, grand-mother to Henry II. king of England, in whose person the royal families of the Saxons and Normans were united.

The English no sooner heard of Edgar's retreat into Scotland, and the favourable reception he had met there, than they crowded over to Malcolm's court in such numbers as could not fail of greatly alarming William: however, not willing to come to an open rupture with the Scot, he contented himself at first with requiring Malcolm, in virtue of the treaty subsisting between them, to deliver up Edgar, whom he claimed as his subject and a deserter. But Malcolm had not made his engagements so precipitately to be surprized with this requisition: he returned for answer, "that, by the laws of all nations, he was authorized to give refuge in his dominions to the subjects of any other prince who chose to retreat thither, not being capitally convicted of any designs against the state to which they belonged; in which predicament he did not conceive that either Edgar or his family at that time stood; and, by the laws of honour, those whom he had once protected, he never could be permitted to desert or give up." This declaration, as just as it was magnanimous, proved the signal of a war between the two kingdoms, which was immediately proclaimed on both sides.

Many, and truly politic, were the motives that induced Malcolm to take this step: the late behaviour of William towards the English, when he had got them in his power, promised him but little hopes of ease from so ambitious a prince, should that power ever become so considerable as to put him upon reducing the whole island under one head. The great concourse of English from the northern parts of that kingdom, and the presence of Edgar Atheling, whom he well knew to be highly favoured by a great part of the nation, were to him the most certain securities for a powerful support, should he interest himself in behalf of that unfortunate prince and his family against William, who had rendered himself so obnoxious by his arbitrary sway to his new subjects; he therefore sent private intimation to the disaffected party in England, that he was ready to second any attempt they might chuse to make towards shaking off the Norman yoke, with all his power.

These promises of assistance from Scotland worked powerfully with the English malecontents in the North, who took every opportunity of harrassing the Normans in their new acquired possessions, and that to such a degree that many of them threw up all the command and estates they had there, rather than hold them at the hazard of their quiet and even of their lives, and demanded of William to be sent back to their own country: among these were Hugo de Gretnesnil, who commanded at Winchester, and Humphrey de Teliolo, governor of the fort at Hastings, and many others of great character for their military knowledge and prowess. William, though he could ill brook their absence, made it a point religiously to observe all his engagements with those who had accompanied him in his expedition, as well his own subjects as those of neighbouring states, and therefore dismissed those who wanted to be gone, with great expressions of courtesy and several valuable presents over and above what pay was due to them by agreement.

All this while Edgar, with the assistance of Malcolm, was taking every step that could most probably insure success to the attempt he proposed to make towards the recovery of the throne; and with this view ambassadors were sent into Denmark, to solicit the king of that country to hasten the succours he had promised, as also to concert a plan of operations for the more effectually distressing William. By this plan the English monarch was to be attacked by the Irish, by the Scotch, by the northern malecontents, and by the Danes at one and the same time; a project which, if it had been vigorously pursued, would have shaken the very foundations of William's power: but as in most confederacies each party has his own interest principally in view, to which every other concern is made subservient, so happened it in the present case. There was not one of the chiefs of the league, Malcolm excepted, who had not either open or secret pretensions to the crown: Godwin, Edwin, and Magnus, the three sons of Harold, who, on the death of their father, had fled into Ireland, headed the troops that were to be furnished by that nation: the Danes were commanded by Harold, Canute, and Osbern, the two first, sons, and the latter brother, to the king of Denmark, another pretender: at the head of the discontented English was Edgar Atheling; and Malcolm commanded the Scotch. Each of these being undetermined, independent, and jealous of each other, their counsels were consequently distracted, and came to nought.

William was very early apprised of these machinations; he was too politic a prince to neglect any of the necessary precautions on such an occasion: and the diffidence he had entertained of the English determined him to redouble his severities and vigilance over their conduct. The measures he took for this purpose were such as at once tended to break the spirit of the English, and effectually provide for his own security. In the first place he disarmed all the natives; and in the second, ordered them to extinguish the fire and lights in their houses at the sound of a bell*, rung every evening at eight o'clock. This bell, as a judicious historian observes, put the English daily in mind of their slavery, and was in reality the knell of their expiring liberty.

At the same time he thought it expedient to guard in a particular manner against the Northumbrians, who had, on all occasions, shewed themselves of a restless and turbulent disposition, and whom he had, therefore, the greatest reason to believe would not remain long quiet, if any commotions were set on foot. In this apprehension he appoints Robert de Cumin earl or governor of the county of Northumberland, and sent him, with seven hundred soldiers to take possession of his government, and maintain peace among the inhabitants. As this general was on his march he was met, at a small distance from Durham, by Egelwin, bishop of that diocese, who, in a friendly manner, cautioned him to be upon his guard against any sudden rising of the people, to whom, he told him, he knew for certain that his approach was very disagreeable. But the haughty Norman, disdaining caution as cowardice, affected to laugh at the admonition of the good prelate, foolishly imagining that his presence alone would be sufficient to overawe the discontented populace. Accordingly, when he had taken possession of Durham, he suffered his men to strol about the town in a licentious manner, and to commit with impunity any ravages they pleased; in consequence of which many of the citizens, as well as of the people in the country round about, were miserably oppressed, robbed, and many of them slain.

The Northumbrians lost all patience upon receiving such treatment, and resolved to revenge their sufferings fourfold on the authors: with this view assembling in great numbers, they broke into the city by day-break, slew all the Normans they met with, attacked the bishop's palace, where Cumin had taken up his quarters, and not being able to force it, through the vigorous defence made by him and his followers, set it on fire, and consumed all that were within. The slaughter made by the malecontents on this occasion was so savage, that out of seven hundred only one man escaped.

This destruction of the Normans, which fell out on the eighth of January, 1069, encouraged the citizens of York to the like attempt; accordingly they fell upon Robert Fitzrichard, their governor, and slew him, together with the greatest part of his garrison: but William Mallet, a brave and faithful servant of the Conqueror, who at that time was governor of the castle, on which the insurgents next made an attempt, defended it so gallantly that he gave William time to come up to its relief; who, on the first notice of these bloody commotions, set out from Winchester with a strong army, and marched with such expedition that he was ready to give battle to the besiegers before they were apprized of his coming: however, an engagement ensued, in which the latter were routed with great slaughter, William, in the heat of his resentment, having given orders to his men to grant no quarter. After a short stay to erect an additional fortrefs, he marched back to Winchester, to keep his Easter. No sooner was his back turned than the English attacked both castles; but were bravely repulsed.

William, finding matters grow thus serious, and that he was threatened with nothing less than a general defection among his new subjects, sent his wife, queen Matilda, over to Normandy, as a place of greater security: at the same time several Norman noblemen and others who had followed his fortunes, now finding that there was little appearance of their enjoying quietly those possessions his bounty had bestowed on them in England, prepared to quit the island, as others, whom we have mentioned, had already done. The king in vain endeavoured to persuade them to stay, by making them large promises, their fears got the better of their avarice and their loyalty, and they abandoned their prince and benefactor in his greatest extremity. This proceeding naturally begot in the king so warm a resentment, that he confiscated all their estates, nor could after be prevailed on to restore them to these men or their heirs.

The first effect which we learn of the confederacy formed against William in other countries was from Ireland, from which kingdom Harold's three sons, before-mentioned, came over and landed, in the middle of June, in Somersetshire, where they defeated Ednoth, an English general, who was sent to oppose them; after which they marched into Devonshire; but being twice defeated in one day by the valour of Briant, son of Eudes count of Brittany, after losing seventeen hundred men, and some of the chief of the Irish nobility, they were glad to retire on board their fleet, and make the best of their way off, under covert of the night.

About the end of August or beginning of September, in the same year (1069), the Danes appeared, with a fleet of two hundred and forty sail, under the command of Osbern, brother-in-law to Sweyn, king of Denmark*. They made their first descent at Dover and Sandwich, but were repulsed with loss at both places; upon which they steered their course for the coast of Suffolk, and landed at Ipswich, where they committed cruel ravages on the circumjacent country; but having been several times defeated in skirmishes with the king's troops, they passed on to Lincolnshire, where the same ill success followed them; however, taking advantage of the wind, which had all along continued in their favour, they got into the mouth of the Humber, and having landed their forces without opposition, were soon after joined by Edgar Atheling, Gospatrick, and the famous earl Waltheof, with many other persons of distinction, and among the rest Merleswin, Adelen, and Siward Bearn, and a numerous body of land forces from Scotland; after which they marched in one collected body to York, receiving continual reinforcements from the countries through which they passed.

Thus strengthened, they prepared to form the siege of York, which city was well fortified, and commanded by William Mallet, who was determined to make the most obstinate defence. With this view he gave orders to set fire to all the houses contiguous or adjoining to the forts, lest the Danes might avail themselves, if they were only pulled down, of the rubbish to fill up the ditches; but there happening to be a very high wind at the time these orders were put in execution, the flames communicated themselves to the houses in the city, a great number of which were burnt to the ground before a stop could be put to the conflagration. While the flames were yet raging, the combined army, taking advantage of the hurry and consternation in which they naturally imagined the besieged would be on such an accident, gave a furious assault to the forts, which they carried sword in hand, notwithstanding the vigorous defence made by the Normans, who, in this action, lost three thousand men, few or none escaping of either of the two garrisons, excepting Mallet the governor, his wife, two children, and one Gilbert de Gout and some others of the prime nobility, whose lives were spared. With these prisoners, and a vast booty of all kinds, the Danes retired to their fleet in the Humber, and Waltheof, son of the celebrated Siward, was left with a strong garrison at York.

The king, on receiving intelligence of these devastations, immediately levied a formidable army, at the head of which he determined to march towards Northumberland, vowing, in the fury of his wrath, by the splendor of God's face, that he would not leave a Northumbrian alive to stir up future insurrections. At the same time he endeavoured as much as possible to reconcile the rest of the English to his government; and with this view he hearkened to a proposal which was made him about this time by some of the principal among the English, who laid hold of this critical juncture when they knew he was distressed by the invasion from the North, and the descent from Denmark, to have their ancient Anglo-Saxon laws revived, and the late order repealed, for their adopting the Danish laws observed in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and part of Northumberland. Nothing but the necessity of the times could have bent the haughty soul of the Norman to this concession, "who now (as Matthew of Westminster emphatically expresses himself) humbled himself before the English, repressing the insolence of the Normans, and recalling from banishment many of the natives, whom he restored to their estates, and (continues the same historian) made with them a lasting agreement." But, whatever may be in this, it is certain that, before his setting out for York, he called a council†, wherein the petition of the barons (that is, of the twelve representatives from every county, who had been sent to collect Edward's laws‡) was heard and granted, and those laws established, as also others relating to forfeitures, fines, and amerciaments in criminal cases; and the rates of reliefs and mortuaries due to superior lords. However, these laws were easily wrested or evaded to answer the purposes of oppression.

By this concession William now found himself at liberty to turn the whole stress of his army against the Northumbrian rebels, against whom he thirsted with the most implacable revenge, and in this disposition he set out, and marched with the greatest expedition towards the North. This step, however necessary it might appear to him in the present situation of affairs, gave rise to fresh disturbances in other parts of the kingdom; for it was no sooner known to the inhabitants of Somerset and Devon that the king was thus employed, than they took advantage of his absence to fly to arms, and actually laid siege to Montacute, but were defeated by Geoffrey, bishop of Coutances, at the head of the Londoners and men of Hants and Wiltshire.

Edric Sylvaticus, or the Forester, a brave and noble warrior, at the head of a chosen body of forces, consisting of some Welsh and the inhabitants of Cheshire, thought to have made himself master of Shrewsbury by surprise; but when he came to sit down before it, he found that it was a place of so great strength as to be able to bid defiance for a great length of time to any efforts he could make to reduce it, upon which he drew off his forces and retired. Soon after, William Fitzosbern and earl Briant advanced to the relief of the town; but finding that the enemy had already deserted their post, they did not amuse themselves with following them in their retreat, but marched immediately to the succour of Exeter, which was at that time closely beleaguered by the inhabitants of Devon and Cornwall. On their arrival they found that this siege ther for weight or knowledge in the laws of their country, that he might make himself master of their constitution. Every county sent twelve members upon this occasion, who, recollecting all they could remember of the laws, as they stood in the time of Edward the Confessor, did, upon oath, repeat and lay them before William."

had likewise been raised by the gallant defence its citizens had made. We will now return to William, whom we left in full march for the North.

On his way he received advice that the city of Oxford had taken up arms against him; therefore, that he might not leave an enemy behind him, he went a little out of his way to reduce it. From thence he continued his march towards York, by the way of Nottingham; but when he came to Pomfret, or Pontefract*, he found that the enemy had broken down the bridges, and the waters being at that time swelled, he despaired of being able to pass the river for a considerable time. He had waited three weeks in the greatest impatience when one of his Norman knights, by his historians called Lisois†, discovered a ford, by which William and his army passed the river.

And now advancing into Yorkshire, which lay within the kingdom of Northumberland, he began to put his threats of revenge into execution by the most shocking ravages, filling the whole country with blood and ruin, insomuch that between York and Durham, a tract of sixty miles, he did not leave a single house standing to shelter such of the miserable inhabitants who had escaped the fury of his vengeful sword. However, as he approached towards the city of York, he found that the Danes had posted themselves in an unassailable and strong situation, between the two rivers Trent and Ouse; and not daring to hazard the weakening of his army by an unsuccessful attack, he had recourse to that expedient which the foregoing pages of this history have shewn always to have operated the most efficaciously with these sons of rapine: he sent private emissaries to offer the Danish general a handsome sum of money, with leave to plunder the country along the sea-coast, provided he would retire on board his ships with his forces. This proposal was readily accepted by Osbern, who, the following spring, departed for Denmark, where his brother Sweyn disgraced and banished him, for his corruption and treachery in abandoning those whom he had been sent to assist.

Having thus fortunately got rid of the Danes, William marched directly to lay siege to York, where the English and Scotch confederates had fortified themselves in the castles. In one of the assaults a breach being made, the Normans flocked thither in great numbers, to make themselves masters of the place; but the gallant earl Waltheof defended it with such heroic valour, that it was not in the power of the besiegers to force it. We are told by William of Malmesbury, that this Waltheof was son to the renowned earl Siward, and that he was, like his father, a prodigy of bodily strength. So obstinate was the resistance of those within the place, that William, despairing to reduce it by the usual forms, converted the siege into a blockade, and at length reduced the inhabitants to submit through famine.

William, who, notwithstanding the ferocity of his disposition and a pride which could not brook resistance, was an admirer of valour though in an enemy, was so delighted with the gallant behaviour of Waltheof, that, after the city submitted, he not only forgave him his having taken arms against him, but, with a magnanimity which almost destroys the credit we are obliged to give to the best and most authentic historians, in regard to the general tenor of his behaviour, confirmed him in the possessions of Northampton and Huntingdon, and afterwards gave him his own niece, Judith, daughter to the countess of Albemarle, in marriage. He likewise received into favour earl Godfrid; but he punished with the utmost severity the rest of the officers and soldiers whom he found in the garrison, and laid a heavy fine on the citizens of York.

He was now determined to keep his Christmas at York, and accordingly sent for his crown and other regalia from Winchester, in order to appear with the greater pomp and splendor. But the manner in which he passed his holidays were such as must shock every person who has the least tincture of humanity: under a pretext of preventing a second Danish invasion, he sent several detachments of his army to lay waste the country, both to the southward and northward; and these orders were executed with such a savage punctuality that left no distinction between the innocent and the guilty. It is impossible, say our best historians (even Malmesbury himself), to describe the horrors of this scene; the lands lay untilld, the houses were destroyed, and the miserable tenants, abandoned to cold and hunger, strewed the roads and fields with their dead bodies, after having vainly strove to prolong their wretched lives by feeding on the flesh of the most unclean animals, and sometimes on human carcases.

From these scenes of horror and distress great numbers of the common people fled into Scotland, and settled in the low-lands, which they greatly improved by agriculture: many of the better sort whose estates were confiscated, or who had entertained an aversion to the Norman sway, retired also to that country, where they were kindly received by queen Margaret and her husband Malcolm, who assigned lands for their maintenance; and these proved founders of some of the best families in Scotland‡.

As soon as the holidays were over, William took the field against the Welsh and Cheshire forces, that had besieged Shrewsbury, under the command of Edric Sylvaticus, and still continued in a body unsuppressed. The king had mountainous and deep countries to pass through in his way to attack them, and the fatigues of this march were so great, that his soldiers of Anjou, Maine, and Bretagne desired to be dismissed; but William exhorting them by fair words and promises, and his own example, pursued his way, and at length, after incredible labour, got to Chester. Here, whether tired of the effusion of blood, or willing, out of a regard to policy, to get so great a man over to his party, he invited Edric to an accommodation, promising him not only to forgive what was past, but to take him into his favour. This chieftain, encouraged by an act of such condescension in a king and a conqueror, readily embraced the terms offered him, and laid down his arms: and now William found the most agreeable consequences from this step he had taken, for no sooner had Edric made his submission than all commotions in that country ceased. However, that he might effectually provide for the future quiet of those parts, he built two strong forts, the one at Chester, the other at Stafford, furnishing them with numerous garrisons. He then proceeded to Salisbury, where he dismissed all his troops, with suitable rewards, except those who had attempted to leave him as before-mentioned, and these he detained forty days after the rest were disbanded, by way of punishment for their mutinous behaviour. He afterwards repaired to Winchester, where he was again solemnly crowned by Ermanfroid, bishop of Sion, assisted by John and Peter, two cardinals, sent over as legates by the pope, to compliment him with that ceremony in his name.

From this time William seems to have entertained a confirmed aversion to the English; and, indeed, if we consider the continual enterprizes in which they were engaged against his person and authority, it is not much to be wondered at, if his mind became soured towards them; and if, as he found that they were not to be brought to live peaceable under his government, he exerted the iron means of arbitrary sway to tame those, over whom he had acquired not only the right of conquest, but that of a voluntary submission. Actuated with these sentiments he resolved to leave no measures untried to reduce them to that state of servitude, which he knew would effectually answer his ends. He was sensible, that so long as any considerable properties remained in the hands of the English, so long he should have to fear continual insurrections on their parts, and therefore, with a policy that, indeed, favoured too much of the tyrant, he, on the pretext that power can never want, confiscated the estates of every person whom he thought the most likely to give him any trouble, either by their interests or connections. In order to secure success to his project, he took care to raise a sufficient number of his trusty Normans to be the chief barons of the kingdom; by this means he secured a certain majority in the great council of the nation, and of consequence could carry any point he chose to insist upon. Thus secured of support, and in a seeming legal way, he proceeded to make considerable alterations in the property of England.

It would be endless to enumerate all the grants given by the king to foreigners: in a word, he deprived all the natives of this country of every place of trust and dignity, and bestowed them on his Norman relations and friends that had adhered to his cause. The particular divisions of the counties and manors into different gifts shall be mentioned in another place, where they will more properly fall under the Norman laws, respecting manors, &c.

Nor were the English nobility alone the sufferers by these arbitrary proceedings of William, the clergy had little better treatment; for the king having fixed the court of Rome in his interest, was assured of her countenance in the persons of her legates, to whatsoever he should propose. Accordingly, about this time, he held a great synod or council at Winchester, where Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, was deprived of his dignities, and several other revolutions in church-matters took place, as shall be seen when we come to consider the state of religion and of the church at this period: among other innovations, he compelled all bishoprics and abbies, possessed of baronies, to exchange their tenure, and, instead of holding them free of all secular servitude, to hold them by knight's service, or military tenure. This innovation, however, was attended with some wholesome effects to the constitution of this country, by wresting out of the hands of the clergy a part of that exorbitant power, which they would otherwise have made use of to enslave the laity in time. Such of the clergy who proved refractory to these alterations were quickly displaced, and their benefices filled with Normans. William also quartered the greatest part of his troops upon religious houses, and compelled the monks to find them necessities; by this means he kept his army with little or no charge, and at the same time kept all those communities in awe, and under the immediate eye of his trusty Norman officers.

All this, however, was not sufficient to sate the revenge and avarice of William; for having received information that several persons had, in the troublesome times, lodged their money and other valuable effects in the monasteries, he ordered them to be searched, and, under pretence of taking away what had been concealed, he robbed those religious houses of their vessels, and even stripped the shrines of the saints of their offerings.

Not yet satisfied with the measures he had already taken for the humiliation of the clergy, he resolved to depress some bishops and abbots, whose wealth and credit he looked upon with an evil eye. Accordingly, in this same council, we find that not only Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, was deposed, for having intruded himself into that see, of which his predecessor Rodbert the Norman had not been canonically deprived, but also that Agelmar, bishop of Helmham, in East Anglia, Elgeric, of Durham, and some other prelates, disagreeable to the king, met with the same fate. Agelmar, who was brother to archbishop Stigand, was deprived at the same time with him, together with several abbots of the most opulent monasteries; and all this, according to the invariable narrative of several historians, "without any apparent cause, and without their having been guilty of any act condemned either by councils, the canons of the church, or the laws of the land."

Unjust soever as these decrees of the council must appear to every unprejudiced person, William took especial care to have them executed in their utmost rigour by the civil power. Many of the prelates were kept confined during their lives, and their sees were filled with foreigners from different climes; among the rest, Lanfranc an Italian and formerly abbot of a monastery in Caen, was advanced to the see of Canterbury; Thomas, a canon of Bayeux, was created archbishop of York; the dioceses of Winchester, Helmham, and Selsey were bestowed upon three of his own chaplains: nevertheless, it must be owned that William, in disposing of these places, put none in but persons of distinguished merit.

This oppressive treatment of a whole nation made it absolutely necessary to guard against the resentment which it was natural to suppose it would awaken in the minds of the injured parties, by keeping a powerful military force ready at call, to check the least appearance of a commotion. This could not fail of being attended with a very considerable expence, which could not be defrayed even by the prodigious sums that William had raised by his exactions, without the strictest œconomy. But this great statesman, who was never at a loss for expedients, expedients, on this occasion erected the court of Exchequer*, wherein the accounts of all the officers employed in collecting the king's revenue were passed, and all actions relating thereto were heard. The exactions and irregularities of collectors, and the delays and defaults in payment from the persons assessed, were particularly cognizable in this court.

The king's revenue at this time consisted of several branches besides the old demesne lands, which were reserved for supplying the king's household with oxen, sheep, corn, hay, and all sorts of provision, according to the nature of the lands, and in the quantities necessary; the overplus remaining being compounded for in money. One was a kind of land-tax, called Hidage, of which we have already spoken in our history of the Saxon times, and which being levied to make good the sums promised to the Danes, thence got the name of Danegelt; but collected (as appears from Domesday Book) in William's time, as an ordinary tax, in all appearance at the rate of twelve-pence, as settled by Edward the Confessor. There was also a quit-rent† paid, before William's coming to the crown, out of all the lands of the subject throughout the kingdom, and continued likewise upon the knights fees established afterwards. Another branch consisted in the profits of wardships, reliefs, and fines, as well for livery of hereditary lands, assignations of dower, licences of marriage, and leave to sue in the king's courts, generally termed Oblata; as of a penal nature, for marrying without licence, and other misdemeanors, which amounted to large sums; besides the forfeitures, mulcts, and pecuniary penalties with which all sorts of crimes were before, and for some time after the reign of William, punished. There were, likewise, an infinite number of tolls and customs paid for passage, pontage, freedom of fairs and markets, protection in going and coming, liberty of buying and selling, and duties laid upon merchandize, or paid for imports and exports.

These general aids, with the occasional aid due from the fees of those that held of the crown by knights service, and the tallages that the king had in his power to levy upon the socage tenants in his own demesnes, and upon the trading towns of the kingdom, produced an immense revenue to William. Ordericus Vitalis says, that, setting aside the oblata, fines, and forfeitures, he had coming in near four hundred thousand pound a year, every pound being nearly equal to that weight of silver, consequently the whole is to be estimated at twelve hundred thousand pounds of the present computation; a sum which, considering the difference of specie between that period and the present, was equivalent to twelve millions of money of modern estimation. How rich and powerful, then, must this king have been, who, over and above this vast income, constantly maintained sixty thousand knights by quartering them upon monasteries, or assigning lands for their subsistence.

But not all this vast revenue, nor the mighty standing army which William kept on foot, could secure him against the attempts of the English to throw off a yoke that he had rendered insupportable to them; and so far were the measures he had taken, from answering his view of terrifying them into an abject submission, that, on the contrary, it made them desperate, and many of them wished rather to end their lives in asserting their privileges, than to live with the privation of them. Fretherig, the abbot of St. Alban's, exerted himself in a particular manner to cherish this resolution in his countrymen, and his indignation at the calamities they suffered, made him cast about how to remedy them; for this purpose he gave refuge and entertainment to all such of the English who had been outed of their estates, and proscribed by the Conqueror, on account of their opposition to his measures: and here they concerted matters so secretly and prudently, that they had assembled a considerable army before William had the least intimation of their design. Fretherig, finding his scheme so successful, sent a message to Edgar Atheling, then in Scotland, inviting that prince to come and put himself at the head of the malecontents: which proposal he readily accepted, and, in a few days after, joined the abbot and his friends, who acknowledged him for their king, and caused him to be proclaimed in all the places they were masters of.

When William heard of these proceedings, not all his haughtiness could keep him from trembling for the consequences: conscious of the provocations he had given to the English, he could expect nothing less than that they would, to a man, join in a conspiracy against him, unless he could find some means to crush it in its infancy. In this dilemma he consulted with his favourite and bosom-counsellor, Lanfranc, who advised him, on this occasion, to conciliate the affections of the rest of the English by every act of condescension and kindness that his own dignity and safety would permit: and in particular he represented to him the salutary effects that might arise from recalling the most popular of the proscribed persons, and restoring them to his favour and protection. William listened to this prudent advice, and followed it: he prevailed on the chiefs of the insurgents to give him a meeting at Berkhamstead, where, after many remonstrances and expostulations, he, in the presence of his archbishop, took an oath upon all the relics of St. Alban, at the same time kissing the Gospels, "that he would observe the good, approved, and ancient laws of the kingdom, which the holy and pious kings, his predecessors, and particularly king Edward the Confessor, had enacted."

This condescension having pacified the malecontents, they returned to the army, in order to dismiss their troops, believing they should have no farther occasion for them. But as William had suffered the oath to be extorted from him, in regard to the exigence of affairs, so he thought of nothing less than keeping it; and he no sooner saw his foes disarmed, than he seized and imprisoned their persons, confiscated their estates, and filled them with Normans. Edgar, upon the first news of this treacherous conduct, fled to Scotland, and the rest of the conspirators took refuge in different countries. The abbot of St. Alban's, finding all his intentions for the delivery of his country baffled, retired to the Isle of Ely, where he died soon after of grief. Immediately upon his death, William seized on his abbey of St. Alban's, and stripped it of every thing that was valuable; and Matthew Paris, in his Lives of the Abbots of St. Alban's, says, that the king would have wholly destroyed it, had he not been prevented by the remonstrances of Lanfranc his favourite.

The high hand which William carried over his English subjects, as it intimidated some into the most passive subjection, so it caused in others a resolution to shake off their chains, or perish in the attempt. A number of the discontented, of all ranks, repaired to the isle of Ely, and among the rest the two earls Morcar and Edwin (which latter was set upon and murdered, as he was on his way to Scotland to engage Malcolm to assist the malecontents), and were afterwards joined from Scotland by Egelric and Egelwin, the deposed bishops of Durham and Hereford, Siward Bearn and the brave Hereward de Wake, son of Leofric lord of Brunne, who was reputed the greatest warrior and the bravest soldier of his age; these great qualities and his known hatred to the Norman race, induced the malecontents to chuse him for their commander*. This distinction animated young Hereward with fresh ardour, and, in order to shew those who had put him at their head, that they had not made an unworthy choice, he set about making all the preparations necessary for a vigorous defence, well knowing that William would not long let them remain unattacked; and had this gallant warrior been properly seconded by the other English noblemen, he might still have retrieved the affairs of his country.

William, who was well acquainted with this nobleman's abilities, and apprehensive that Morcar's popularity might draw in great numbers to join his party, resolved to take the advantage of the summer, in which season alone the place was accessible, being surrounded with a deep morass, which in winter was always full of water. The first thing he did was to build a strong castle at Wisbich†, on the east side, and to stop up all the outlets by which the rebels could make any incursions. We are likewise told, that he built a bridge, two miles long, over the morass, on the west side. However, the besieged were so well fortified, that he was obliged to convert his operations into a blockade, a tedious method of proceeding, and the more vexatious to William at this time, as he had received news of an irruption into the northern provinces by Malcolm king of Scotland.

One morning, as the Normans were intent upon their works, the active Hereward sallied out, engaged, and routed the party he attacked, and returned to the Isle loaded with plunder.

The check which this successful sally had given to William's affairs, made that prince very uneasy, and despairing of being able to make himself master of the place in any reasonable time, he made a truce with the malecontents, which, as it was convenient to their affairs, they readily consented to, and Hereward went over to the main land; but William soon broke this truce, by seizing and imprisoning Egelwin, bishop of Durham, as he was attempting to pass from the island. Hereupon hostilities were renewed, and Hereward returned to take upon him the command of the besieged, bringing with him a strong band of his countrymen, whom he had gathered together during his absence from the island, and whom he had bound by a solemn oath to make the most vigorous resistance.

But as there is a great variation among writers, in regard to the remaining part of the history of this insurrection, we shall adhere to what appears most probable, which is, that William, after having suffered repeated repulses in his attacks, bethought himself of an expedient which made him master of the place.

The monastery of Ely had several large possessions which lay on the main land; these William fell upon, and, after rifling them of their most valuable effects, gave the lands to his soldiers. This scheme succeeded to his wish; the brotherhood, touched to the quick with their loss, began to make such clamours, that Thurstan, their abbot, was obliged to promise them that he would fall upon some method to get a restitution of their lands from William. Accordingly he privately sent and offered him to betray the island into his hands, with all who were in it, and also to pay him a thousand marks, on condition the lands, which had been seized, were restored to the convent. William gladly embraced this offer, and the abbot, faithful in his treachery, opened a passage for a party of the king's troops, who kept their post, notwithstanding the efforts of those within to dislodge them, till the whole army entered the island. The gallant Hereward, finding himself betrayed, cut his passage through the Norman troops sword in hand; but the rest were obliged to surrender at discretion. Some were punished with the loss of their eyes, others had their hands cut off, and a few were committed to close prison; among these last were earl Morcar, brother to Edwin‡. The monks themselves did not escape unpunished, for William not

* Though the monk of Ely, who has given us a particular description of his actions, is accused of exaggeration, yet, if we give the general words of Ingulphus, his cotemporary, a creature of William's, and consequently not to be suspected of partiality in favour of his patron's enemy, the reader may perhaps be of another opinion. He performed, says that author, so many noble actions in war, so often did he overthrow, so often baffle his enemies, that he deserves eternal honour; for, as long as he was able, he supported the ruins of his falling country; nor would he suffer his countrymen to go unrevenge to the shades below; and when all the rest submitted to, and courted the Conqueror, he was proof against all temptations, and remained unsubmitting and unsubdued. This great chief was nephew to Brand, abbot of Peterborough. He had been banished in the reign of Edward the Confessor, for some outrages he had committed in his neighbourhood, and retired into Flanders. The death of his father obliging him to return to England, he found his estate given away to a Norman: hereupon he demanded restitution of it, but not being able to obtain it by legal process, he drove out the foreigner by force, and took possession. This was precisely the time when, coming to Ely to avoid the king's displeasure, he was chosen general by the malecontents, who were there rendezvoused.

† From the MS. History of Ely, in the British Museum, marked Titus A. 1.

‡ Ordericus Vitalis clears both Edwin and Morcar from any ill design, and Morcar from having any share in the rebellion, representing his condemnation to perpetual imprisonment as a breach of faith, asserting that he had been prepanned into a voluntary surrender by the assurances of the king's messengers, who had in that respect abused his credit. This historian represents all Edwin's motions to have had no other object than the rescue of his brother, and that, having solicited the English, Scotch, and Welsh for six months together to join him, he was at length betrayed to the Normans by three brothers who were his followers, and entrusted with the care of his affairs. As he was on the road, with a small party consisting of about twenty horse, he was surprized by a much superior body of Normans, from whom he would have made good not only stripped their monastery of all its rich effects, but saddled the brotherhood with the maintenance of forty horsemen; and when they came to pay him the thousand marks agreed upon, a groat happening to be deficient in the sum, he compelled them to pay pay him another thousand marks.

While William had been taken up with the siege of Ely, Malcolm, king of Scots, had entered the northern frontiers, and committed ravages with a barbarity unworthy a Christian prince, or indeed a human being; if what all the English historians have related may be depended upon for truth; therefore, no sooner had William completed the reduction of the people of Ely, than he turned his arms towards this invader of his realm*.

Gospatrik, who had made his peace with William had by him been created earl of Northumberland, on condition to be always ready with a body of men to defend these parts against the invasion of an enemy; but, on this occasion, he found himself unable to withstand the strong army with which Malcolm had entered the country, and therefore retired to Bamborough castle, where he fortified himself, and from thence made incursions upon Cumberland, at that time the appenage of the eldest sons of the kings of Scotland; and, by the cruelties he there committed, revenged on the Scots the calamities their king had brought upon the English.

By this time William, after a long, difficult, fatiguing march, had advanced as far as Nithisdale, on the Scottish borders, where he he found their army entrenched in a very advantageous situation. For the present, therefore, he encamped close by them, being willing to give his men some rest, and also to have an opportunity of observing more narrowly the dispositions and motions of the enemy's forces. In this manner the two armies lay facing each other for some days, each prepared for action, but neither side earnest to begin the attack, inasmuch as, from the equality of the numbers and the bravery of their men, the assailants must at the first expect some disadvantage.

The two kings, who were alike valiant and expert in military knowledge, were likewise wise enough to weigh the doubtful event of a battle and the fatal consequences of a defeat. This had such an effect upon both their minds, that they agreed to a treaty, which ended in a peace, on the following conditions: "that the boundaries of the two nations should be settled; that Malcolm should swear fealty to William, or do him homage, and also deliver hostages for his true performance of the conditions; and that William should restore the English exiles to their estates." In memory of this peace, we are told by the Scotch historians, that a cross was erected, on which were engraven the arms of both kings, at a place called Stanmore, within Richmondshire. This cross was named by the English Rere-cross, and by the Scots Key-cross, that is Royal-cross; and a part of it was yet standing in the days of Camden; and was to serve as a boundary between Malcolm's feudal possessions in England, and those of William. And here we must not forget, that one article of this peace was that Edgar Atheling should be obliged to return home, make his submission to William, and renounce all right to the crown on receiving a maintenance from him.

Our historians are very lame in their accounts of this expedition of William's; they have not marked out his progress, and the first place we find him is in the wild mountains of Galloway, the most western province of Scotland: this seems as if he had made his invasion by sea, and had landed somewhere about Solway firth. As to the homage which Malcolm is said to have performed to William for all Scotland, though we find it roundly asserted by our English historians; yet it must be confessed, that ancient authors are very far from being explicit on this head. They tell us, indeed, in general, that Malcolm did homage to the king of England, but leave us in the dark whether it was for the counties which he held of the crown of England, or for the crown of Scotland. That it was not for the latter, the Scotch historians seem to have clearly proved, to every unprejudiced reader; and if for the former alone, it was a very poor amends for all the trouble and expence William had been at in this expedition†.

Peace being concluded between William and the Scots, he returned to Durham, where, however, he made no long stay; for being attacked with a severe fit of the ague, he left the place, after having deprived earl Gospatrik of the government of Northumberland, which he conferred on earl Waltheof, son of Siward, the brother of Malcolm's first wife, and husband to William's niece.

In the ensuing year, 1073, Philip, king of France, growing jealous of William's prosperity, and imagining that the multiplicity of affairs in England would so much employ his attention as not to leave him at leisure to mind the concerns of his patrimonial dominions, attacked the dukedom of Normandy, and in a short time made himself master of Mans; and Godfrey de Mayenne, with most of the gentry, joining the invaders, the Normans were driven entirely out of the country.

William, upon the first news of this attack on his Norman territories, raised an army, consisting entirely of English, and passed over to the continent. This army, when joined by some levies made in that country, amounted to fifty thousand men, with which William quickly retook the whole good his retreat, had not a river he would have crossed been rendered impassable by the swelling of the tide. This resource failing him, he still made a gallant defence, and was slain on the spot, together with all his followers. His bravery, which would not suffer him to receive quarter, was not more remarkable than the charms of his person, for he was esteemed the handsomest man of his age. As he was universally beloved, his death was lamented by the Normans and French, as well as by the English: his unhappy fate extorted tears even from William, who, though he was a gainer by the treachery, punished the traitors who murdered him with perpetual banishment.

† Hemingford's account of this transaction is thus: "Anno Domini MLXXII. post Assumptionem Beatæ Mariæ cum audisset Wilhelmus rex mala quæ fecerunt Scoti, cum exercitu copioso & navibus multis in Scotiam profectus est, procul mis-

sis ad eum nunciis rogavit rex Malcolmus ea quæ pacis sunt, sciens se non posse dimicare cum eo; occurritque ei in loco, qui dicitur Abernithii, & homo suus devenit, FACTO HOMEGIO, & datis obsidibus multis, reversusque est Wilhelmus, usque Dunkelmun, ubi Castellum de novo construxit." Hemingf. cap. vi. p. 459. Gale's edit. The Annals of Waverly corroborate this account, but leave the article of homage as indeterminate as Hemingford, as appears from the following extract: "Sexto namque anno Willielmi regis duxit idem rex exercitum per terram & per mare in Scotiam, & eam ex parte maris cum puppibus obsedit & exercitum suum per terram apud Scadwade introduxit, & ibi nihil invenit unde melius esset; rex vero Malcolm venit contra eum, & concordatus est cum eo, & dedit illi obsides, & homo suus devenit." Annales Waverl. ad ann. county county of Mayenne, together with the castle and city of le Mans, that had revolted from him. On this occasion the English exerted themselves in such a manner as to afford most of our historians reason to lament that they did not shew an equal bravery and resolution in the vindication of their liberty, as in subduing foreign countries. William, after his success, obliged Philip to give him a safe and honourable peace; after which he returned to England*, where his presence became especially necessary on account of some commotions which had happened upon his leaving the island.

In the first place, a great civil difference happened between Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, and Odo, bishop of Bayeux, the king's uterine brother: the former presuming on the great friendship William had always expressed for him, and thinking himself injured by Odo, in the latter's having wrongfully seized many lands belonging to the see of Canterbury, he sent over to William a formal complaint against this prelate; and the king, who well knew his brother to be of a turbulent and overbearing disposition, ordered the matter to be solemnly heard before an inquest, consisting of the most creditable persons, not only of the county where the disputed lands lay, but also of such other counties where the see of Canterbury had any possessions. This inquest was held, by commission from the king, at Pennenden heath, near Ailesford, in Kent; when, after a full and impartial hearing, Lanfranc received from his antagonist no less than twenty-five manors, in the several counties of Kent, Surry, London, Middlesex, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Essex, and Suffolk.

Another remarkable incident which fell out during William's stay in Normandy, was an attempt made by pope Gregory VII. named Hildebrand, to subject this kingdom to the dominion of the papal see. This pontiff, whose inordinate ambition and extraordinary insolence set half Europe in a flame, seems on this occasion to have mistaken in William the person he had to deal with; for, not contented with several messages he had already sent to the prelates of the English church on this subject, he, upon the king's return to his English dominions, sent one of his nuncios to him with letters, wherein he insisted on his doing homage to him for the kingdom of England as a fief of the Roman see, and at the same time demanded the arrears of Peter pence, that had not been collected for some years.

William, who perfectly well understood the difference between the church and the court of Rome, the former of which he at all times cherished with the duty and fondness of a loving son, while he was as constantly upon his guard against the ambition and encroachments of the latter, made an answer to this insolent demand of the pope's, which was truly worthy a king of England. As his letter well deserves to be transcribed, I shall make no apology for giving it to my readers in this place, as published by the ingenious Mr. Selden, in his notes upon Eadmerus.

“ To the most excellent pastor of the holy church, Gregory; William, by the grace of God, king of the English and duke of the Normans, wisheth health in friendship.

“ Most holy father,

“ Your nuncio, Hubert, coming unto me in your behalf, advised me to do fealty to you and your successors, and to take better care in making good the payments of those monies which my predecessors were wont to remit to the church of Rome. One of these proposals I have consented to, the other I refused. Fealty is what I never have done, nor will do; inasmuch as I have neither obliged myself to perform it by any promise of my own, nor can I find that any of my predecessors have ever performed it to your's. As for the monies, they have been collected in a very bad manner for almost three years, during my absence in France: but now that I am, through the blessing of God, returned to my kingdom, I have sent, by the nuncio above-mentioned, what is already collected; and shall take care that the residue be remitted so soon as convenience will allow, by the legates of Lanfranc, our trusty archbishop. Pray for us, and for the good estate of our kingdom, seeing that we have loved your predecessors, and do desire sincerely to love, and obediently to hear you, above all others †.”

William followed this letter with a spirited decree, forbidding any of his subjects to acknowledge any person for pope, or to submit to any orders from the see of Rome, without his consent.

But the affair which gave William the most uneasiness, and which had chiefly contributed to hasten his return to England, was the advice which he had received of a dangerous conspiracy carrying on here, in his absence, by persons whom, of all others, he thought he had the least reason to suspect of disaffection. These were Normans, whom he had enriched by his bounty, and raised to the most eminent stations out of the love and esteem he had for them. Roger, the youngest son of William Fitzosborne, who succeeded to the English estate and earldom of Hereford, had, either by way of compliment to his sovereign, or in compliance with the forms of vassalage, applied to William for leave to marry his sister to Ralph de Guaer, earl of the East Angles, which request the king had peremptorily refused a little before he left England. However, as the young lady was not an heiress, and that the match had been in a manner concluded between the several parties, previous to Roger's application to the king, they resolved to take advantage of his absence to solemnize it, notwithstanding his prohibition, which was accordingly done with great magnificence, a great number of bishops, barons, and military officers being assembled on the occasion, and among the rest Waltheof the new-created earl of Northumberland.

† “ Excellentissimo sanctæ ecclesiæ pastori Gregorio, gratia Dei, Anglorum rex & dux Normannorum Willielmus, salutem cum amicitia. Hubertus legatus tuus, religiose pater, ad me veniens ex tua parte me admonuit, quatenus tibi & successoribus tuis fidelitatem facerem & de pecunia, quam antecessores mei ad Romanam ecclesiam remittere solebant, melius cogitarem. Unum admisi, alterum non admisi. Fidelitatem facere nolui, nec volo; quia nec ego promisi, nec antecessores meos antecessoribus tuis id fecisse comperio. Pecunia tribus fere annis, in Gallia me agente, negligenter collecta est. Nunc vero divina misericordia me in regnum meum reverso, quod collectum est per præfatum mittitur. Et quod reliquum est per legatos Lanfranci archiepiscopi fidelis nostri, cum opportunum fuerit, transmittetur. Orate pro nobis & pro statu regni nostri, quia antecessores vestros dileximus; & vos, præ omnibus, sincere deligere, & obedenter audire desideramus.” Selden, p. 1631.

As the parents of the new-married couple were well acquainted with the severity of William's temper, and could not but be apprehensive for the consequences of having thus acted in direct opposition to his will, the conversation naturally turned upon that topic; when, after some severe strictures upon the king's conduct, and the tyrannical rule he pretended to, even in the domestic affairs of all his subjects, they fell upon his manner of treating the English, whom they affected to compassionate as a brave people, who were unjustly subjected to the arbitrary sway of a bastard and an usurper. By these and the like insinuations the noblemen present, already intoxicated with the fumes of wine, were inflamed to such a degree of temerity, that it was unanimously agreed upon to take up arms and depose William: and in the mean time it was proposed to solicit the assistance of Sweyn, king of Denmark, whom they knew to be a sworn foe to the Norman †.

The next day earl Waltheof, beginning to reflect coolly on what had passed over-night, either out of gratitude or fear, revealed the whole affair to Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, who advised him to take shipping instantly, and go over to William, and discover all he knew. The earl followed his advice; and, when he came to the king, met with a most gracious reception. The disappearing of Waltheof, and some steps taken by the regency, soon gave the conspirators to know that they were discovered, and consequently that no safety was left for them but in their swords. Upon this they sent to the Welsh, who readily joining them, hostilities were begun; but, by the diligence of Odo, bishop of Bayeux, the king's brother and chief regent of the kingdom during his absence, the conspirators found most of their schemes disconcerted. Roger attempted to pass the Severn, but was prevented by Wulfstan, bishop of Worcester, and Urso, high-sheriff of the county. Ralph de Guaer advanced into the neighbourhood of Cambridge; but being defeated by Odo and Godfrey of Coutances, the justiciary, retired to his castle of Norwich, from whence he went over to France, hoping to obtain aid from king Philip, whom he well knew bore ill-will to William, notwithstanding the late pacification between them; and by that means he was in hopes to cut out sufficient work for William till the Danish forces should arrive, and throw the ballance of power into the scale of the confederates.

But all these towering prospects were soon overturned by the sudden arrival of William in England, who having settled the affairs of his dukedom, embarked about the middle of this autumn, 1074, and, landing safely in England, by the vigorous measures he took, soon put an end to the conspiracy. The earl of Hereford, Roger, finding that he was unable to make head against the king's forces, submitted; and, by William's orders, both he and Waltheof, notwithstanding his discovery of the plot, were committed to close imprisonment. The Danes, who, under Canute, the son of Sweyn, and earl Haco, were upon the point of making a descent in favour of the conspirators, finding William prepared for their reception, or else being bribed by him *, laid aside their design, and retired with their ships to the ports of Flanders, where Ralph de Guaer went on board; and, being joined by his wife and family from England, repaired to an estate that belonged to him in Brittany.

William now summoned a great council at Westminster, where the case of those concerned in the late rebellion came under consideration; and they were proceeded against with the utmost severity. Of the inferior rank, some were punished with the loss of their eyes, others had their hands or feet chopped off; but no one act of William's drew upon him such deserved reproach as his treatment of earl Waltheof, who, notwithstanding the proof of fidelity which he had given in discovering the plot, was tried for being an accomplice; and, upon the information of his own wife, sentenced to lose his head. Lanfranc in vain exerted all his interest with William to save him; the stern Norman was inflexible, he was determined to quench every the smallest ember of rebellion with blood: besides, as Mr. Carte seems not unjustly to have observed, his being an Englishman of great power and property, and Ino de Taillebois and other Normans thirsting after his estate, added to the wickedness of his wife, who wanted to get rid of him as an obstacle in the way to another match she had in view, all these things made so against him, that his innocence proved insufficient to protect him from the malice of his enemies; and he was accordingly beheaded at Winchester, very early in the morning, on April 29, A. D. 1075. He was the last Englishman who retained any considerable power or interest in the nation. His corpse was at first thrown into a ditch, but a fortnight afterwards it was removed to Croyland abbey, where, by the monks and abbot, it was said to work miracles. William, who had good sense enough to laugh at these idle stories, and to resent them when made use of against his interest or will, was so much incensed at the abbot, that he deposed him, and put Ingulphus, the historian, into his place †.

From this time William seems to have kept no measures with the English, but to have studied every possible means to make them feel the whole weight of absolute power, and to rule them with the most rigorous sway, depriving some of their estates, and others of their liberty; so that we may truly say, with William of Malmesbury, "that England was become an habitation and dominion of foreigners."

The king having thus extinguished every spark of rebellion, by the punishment of the conspirators, resolved to turn his arms against Ralph de Guaer, and despoil him of his estate in Brittany. With this view he passed over into that country, with a large army, a short time after the execution of Waltheof, and laid siege to the castle of Dol, where Ralph then was, and who made so brave a resistance on this occasion, that William had it not in his power to effect his design against the place † Tyrrel places this transaction A. D. 1076. the Annals of Waverley, A. D. 1075. and Matth. Paris, whom we have followed, A. D. 1074.

* William of Malmesbury is of this opinion, in his third book. Adam Bremenensis is so explicit on this point, that we will recite his own words: "There was an obstinate animosity between Swein and the Bastard, though our bishops, who were corrupted by bribes, endeavoured to bring about a reconciliation between the two kings."

† Who, says Rapin, notwithstanding his obligations to William, has positively attested, in his History of Croyland, the truth of the miracles said to be wrought at Waltheof's tomb. Rap. Hist. Eng. Will. I.

before Philip, king of France, marched to the relief of the besieged, with a powerful army; and William, to his no small vexation, found himself under the necessity of drawing off his forces, and returning, after an inglorious campaign, and with great loss of men, to England*; where, during the rest of that and the following year, nothing remarkable happened, except a council held at London, to settle the precedence of bishops, of which we shall treat in its proper place.

Nor did this vexation come alone; for ambition, more prevalent than the ties of blood and nature, occasioned him new anxieties, and exposed him to fresh dangers and difficulties, from a quarter whence he assuredly had the least reason to expect them. In the beginning of the year 1077, Robert, his eldest son, called, on account of the shortness of his legs, Gambaron or Courthose, being privately instigated by the persuasions of Philip the French king, who promised him powerful succours in case of necessity, called upon his father in a peremptory manner to perform a promise had made in the French council, when he was at that court soliciting succours to carry on his expedition against England, that as soon as he should be master of that kingdom, he would leave Robert in possession of Normandy. It is certain that William had made such a promise, and had even renewed it in a dangerous fit of illness, declaring Robert heir to his hereditary dominions; but the disrespectful manner in which his son now reminded him of it, added to the natural dislike we have to part with power when once in our enjoyment, made William return this answer: "That he never used to strip till he went to bed, and that his son ought to wait till his decease."

The severity of this reply could not but be deeply felt by one of Robert's temper, who was naturally turbulent, imperious, and restless, fond of power, and full of vanity; nevertheless, it is to be believed that he would not have proceeded to any open act of disobedience, had it not been for the instigations of those who desired nothing so much as to set the father and son at variance; besides, a trifling dispute which happened about this time, between his brother William and him, and in which his father appeared to favour the former, so far inflamed his disposition, that he broke out into open rebellion. The plausibility of his claim to the dukedom, and the popularity of his person, soon gained him numerous adherents. His first step was an attempt to surprize the castle of Rouen by night; but Roger Iveri, who had received some intimations of the designs that were hatching by the prince and his friends, had put the place in so good a posture of defence, that Robert found his project defeated.

The king, apprized of this audacious attempt, immediately drew an army together, wholly made up of English, and passed over into Normandy, to put a stop to the proceedings of his rebellious son; and, with an expedition which is so peculiar to his character, advanced against him, and straitened him so much, that Robert was forced to apply to the king of France for a place of retreat from his father's resentment. This Philip readily afforded him, by engaging the Vidame Helie to admit the prince into Gerberoy, a strong fortress in the Beauvoisis. Hither William followed him, and prepared to besiege the place in form. While the operations were carrying on, a number of skirmishes happened on both sides, which we shall pass over, to take notice of that remarkable action which brought about a reconciliation between the father and the son.

Robert having been joined by a great number of French noblemen and others, made frequent incursions into the Norman Vexin and the Pays de Caux, levying contributions, and plundering the inhabitants with great cruelty. William, to put a stop to these outrages, took the resolution to carry his approaches nearer to the place, in order to straiten the besieged, and keep them, if possible, within their walls. But Robert thinking it a disgrace to be thus shut up within a town at the head of an army, drew out his forces, and gave his father battle†. The dispute was bloody and obstinate; and William, dreading to see his dear-earned laurels torn from his brow by his own son, exerted himself beyond his strength; and his horse being killed under him, some say by an arrow shot from the arm of Robert himself, fell to the ground almost breathless, and being very corpulent and unwieldy with age, would certainly have been trod to death by the press, had not Robert, either by the sound of his voice, or from a glimpse of his face as he lifted up his beaver to get air, luckily recognized him. This sight awakened in the breast of the young prince all the sentiments of filial reverence and duty; he threw himself precipitately from his horse, flew to his father whom he lifted from the ground with infinite tenderness, and then, casting himself at his feet, implored his pardon for the difficulties to which he by his inconsiderate conduct had subjected the author of his life, and offered to lay down his arms and return to obedience. This generous behaviour, however, had no effect on William, whose soul felt the affront done him, too deeply to forget or to forgive it; nevertheless, as he himself had been greatly hurt by his fall, and his son William Rufus was wounded, and that the fate of the day was evidently against him, he took advantage of this circumstance to draw off his forces and return to Rouen. During his stay in this place, he was, by the intercession of his queen, reconciled to Robert: however, not caring to trust him, in his absence, on the continent, brought him over to England with him, on pretence of sending him against the Scots.

For in the preceding year, taking advantage of William's absence, they had, on what pretext is unknown, harassed the northern borders, and, at the latter end of August of this year (1079) Malcolm, with a royal army, fell upon Northumberland, and ravaged it as far as the Tyne. The Scots had been the more encouraged to this attempt as that country was then in a state of confusion,

* We are told, that previous to William's leaving Normandy, he had entered into a negotiation with Hoel, earl of Brittany, the powerful ally and protector of Ralph de Guære, and a peace was afterwards concluded at Bayeux; the principal article of which was, the marriage of Constance, William's daughter, with Alain Fergeant, Hoel's eldest son; and that the nuptials were solemnized at Caen with great pomp. Order. Vital. p. 543, 544.

† A. D. 1079. Some writers place this transaction A. D. 1077, among which are Hemingford and Mat. Paris. Thomas Wekes seems to confine it to 1078; but from the testimonies of Florence of Worcester, Simeon of Durham, the Chronicles of Melrose, the abbot of Peterborough, and others, not to mention the circumstances of the narrative, it appears to have happened in the order of time under which I have here ranged it; occasioned by the murder of Walcher, bishop of Durham, who had drawn upon him the resentment of the populace on account of his favouring some persons who had rendered themselves obnoxious to them by their exactions and oppressions. But historians differ so widely in their accounts of this affair, that it would be only taking up the time of our readers to attempt to reconcile or digest them into an uniform narrative; thus much, however, is certain, that the insurrection raised on this account first gave Malcolm a prospect of success in his invasion; but upon William's sending his son Robert against him with a powerful force, as just related, he thought it most prudent to withdraw into his own country. Robert followed him; but, whether the Scot had the heels of him and sought his safety in a precipitate flight, or whether the prince, contented with driving the invaders out of the kingdom, did not chuse to risk an engagement, which the fortune of war might have turned against him, does not clearly appear: however, Robert did nothing more remarkable in this expedition than laying the plan, and building part of a town on the banks of the Tyne, which he then called Monkcester, as being the habitation of monks, but which has since become one of the most considerable towns in the kingdom, and is at present well known by the name of Newcastle upon Tyne. This war ended in a treaty between the two nations.

Robert, upon his return to court, found a great coldness in the king his father towards him; this determined him not to continue in a place where he was looked upon with an evil eye, but at the same time he resolved that no behaviour of his father's should ever make him again take up arms against him. His first voyage was in the summer of 1080, into Italy, where he had some hopes of obtaining a daughter of the marquis Bonifacio to wife; but finding himself disappointed in that match, he travelled from one prince's court to another, and among his relations in Gascony, Lorraine, and Germany. In this manner he passed five years; in every place where he made any stay, he received magnificent presents in money, and other valuable effects, all which he squandered away upon his pleasures, in company with Robert de Belesme, a dissolute young nobleman who was his favourite. At last he fixed his residence in France; where he continued till his father's death, without attempting to make any disturbances in his territories.

The year 1081 began with some skirmishes with the Welsh, who made incursions upon those parts lying nearest to them; but William, not having yet disbanded the army he had raised against the Scots, soon quelled these disturbances; for the Welsh princes finding themselves in no condition to keep the field against the powerful forces William was able to bring against them, voluntarily submitted, and obliged themselves to pay an annual tribute to England. At this time also we may place the settling of the Welsh marches; Hugh de Abroncis, or d'Avranches, being made earl of Chester by William, and invested with the office of lord warden of the Welsh borders, in the room of earl Gherbod, who was taken prisoner in Flanders.

As William at this time had his residence chiefly in London, he took advantage of the tranquility which the submission of the Welsh, and the peace lately concluded with Scotland, had introduced, to take such steps as he thought most likely to secure the citizens in their obedience, whose fidelity he had long suspected, and to put this capital out of danger of any external attempt: accordingly, in the latter end of this year, he laid the foundation of the tower of London*, which some writers, overfond of antiquity, will have to be originally founded by Julius Cæsar. But it would be very difficult for them to prove that Cæsar was ever at London, and still more so to prove that he undertook this work, since we do not find the least mention of it in his Commentaries; and certainly he never would have omitted so material a fact.

William, who was as great an œconomist as he was a warrior and a statesman, always took care to keep his coffers well filled, and ready to supply his occasions on any sudden emergence or difficulties that might happen; and as all rebellions at home, all opposition abroad was now quieted, he took this time to carry into execution a plan for ascertaining the true value as well of his own demesnes as of his lands held by tenants in capite, or by knight's fee. He was also desirous of knowing exactly what impositions his subjects, both Norman and English could bear. With these views, therefore, he sent some of the most eminent of his prelates and nobles† as commissioners into the counties respectively allotted them, to take a general survey of the kingdom. This survey was given in by the verdict of juries, sworn in every county, hundred, or wapentake, before the respective commissioners. In this account they were obliged to specify the real extent and value of what arable land, pasture, meadow, or wood was possessed by every individual, as well at the actual time of this survey as in the reign of Edward the Confessor. The survey was made by counties, hundreds, towns or manors, hides‡, virgats§, and acres; and likewise contained the number of mills and fisheries, in some counties; and in others the number of freemen, socmen¶, villains¶¶, cottagers, bordars, slaves, cattle, sheep, hogs, cattle for draught, and other animals in each town or manor, and the names of those to whom they belonged. It was six years

† As appears from the names of the following persons, who were joined in the commission for Worcester, viz. Remigius, bishop of Lincoln, Walter Giffard, earl of Buckingham, Henry de Ferrieres, earl of Derby (a son of Gualihelm de Ferrieres, a follower of William, who was possessed of one hundred and seventy-six lordships or manors in Derbyshire), and Adam, brother of Eudo, steward of the household to the king. This Adam, who was third son to Hubert de Rie, a faithful adherent to William when only duke of Normandy, was entrusted by him in his negotiations with Edward the Confessor, about the succession to the crown; and after William was settled on the English throne, had great possessions assigned him in Kent, as a reward for his eminent services.

‡ A Hide is a portion of land as much as one plough can labour, and supposed to be sufficient for the maintenance of one family for a year.

§ The Saxons called this Gardland, now commonly called Yardland: it consisted of a certain quantity of land, or part of a hide, differing in various places, and is in some twenty acres, in others twenty-four, in others thirty, and in some others amounts to thirty roods.

¶ Socmen were tenants who held by no certain tenure, but paid their rent as a Soke, or sign of freedom.

¶¶ Villains were persons of a low and servile condition, bound to a certain and bodily service. The landlord could deprive them at pleasure of their lands, goods, and chattels; and compel them to pay redemption-money before they could give away their own daughters in marriage.

 Bordars, or Bordarii (from the French bordier), were cottagers who supplied the lord of the manor with poultry and eggs.

in taking, not being finished till the beginning of 1087, and was drawn up in two books; the lesser describing the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex, the great one containing all the rest of the kingdom, except the three northern counties of Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Northumberland. This book, according to Ingulphus, who lived at the time wherein it was made, was called the Roll of Winchester, because originally kept at that cathedral; afterwards it was named Domboc, or Domesday Book, "because (says Carte) every man was to receive his doom, or be judged, by it, in case any dispute about the value, tenure, payment, or services of his lands, should arise upon the collection of the king's ordinary revenue, or the raising of extraordinary taxes*." This being the highest record in the kingdom, it was then (and is to this day) a decisive evidence in any controversy in which there may be occasion to appeal to it. The care of these books is committed to the chamberlain of the Exchequer, in whose office they are always kept.

That the reader may have the clearer conception of the manner of entering the lands in these books, we shall here give him an extract from the Little Domesday Book in the Exchequer, fol. 450. In the top of the leaf is entered.

Essex, the king's land. The half hundred of WITHAM.

Harold held Witham, in the time of king Edward, for a manor, and for five hides. There were in that king's time twenty-one villains, at present fifteen; at that time there were nine bordars; at present ten; then there were twenty-three socmen, now the same number; then the whole was valued at ten pounds, now at twenty: but the viscount or sheriff received from the half hundred, for his customs, mulcts, or forfeitures, thirty-three pounds, and four pounds for fine or income. In this manor there were, in the time of king Edward, thirty-four freemen, who then paid an accustomed rent of ten shillings and eleven pence; of which Ilbod holds two, containing forty-five acres, of the value of six shillings, which paid their old rent to the manor. Tedric Pointel holds eight, having half a hide and twenty-two acres and a half, paying custom or old rent. Ranulph or Ralph Peperel holds ten, with two hides and forty-five acres, which paid no custom or old rent. William Grosse holds five, only one of which paid custom, and were valued at three pounds thirteen shillings. Ralph Baignard holds six, one of which paid custom, and were valued at twenty shillings. Hamo† the sewer, or steward, holds one, who had half a hide, valued at twenty shillings. Joscelin Lorimar has the land of one, and pays no custom.

Peter, the viscount or sheriff, keeps this manor in the king's hand.

But however exactly this survey might have been performed in general, it was impossible, on account of the extensiveness of its design, that it could have been minutely so; on the contrary, we find that several towns or villages, held by feudatories or under-tenants, are omitted; and, indeed, the king seems to have intended nothing more by issuing this commission than, as we have already observed, to get an account of his tenants in capite, and to see what taxes the nation could bear. Accordingly, several great towns and cities of note are not so much as mentioned, as may be found from comparing this survey with an exact catalogue of the towns and cities in England. London, which made so considerable a figure in those days, is taken no notice of; and even with respect to the places registered in this survey, it appears that the assessors were far from being very exact or very just. Ingulphus himself owns, that they favoured his monastery considerably; and it is not to be doubted but that they behaved in the same manner to other abbeys as they did to that of Croyland‡.

Whilst William's commissioners were engaged in taking this survey, he went over to Normandy, where he held a great council or synod of the clergy, but returned soon again into England:

For, in the year 1082, Odo, his uterine brother, bishop of Bayeux and earl of Kent, who, as chief justiciary of the kingdom, was the second person of the realm, had, during the several times of his governing the kingdom in William's absence, amassed immense sums by the most illegal and oppressive methods; and, upon an idle prediction of some itinerant astrologer or fortune-teller, that Gregory, then pope, should be succeeded by one Odo, resolved to employ them in purchasing the papacy. With this view he had, in the beginning of this year, bought a palace at Rome, which he fitted up in a most superb manner, and had employed a number of agents there, to engage the

* Stow imagines that the word Domesday, by which we at present call this book, is a corruption of Domus Dei, the name which it might have received from its being lodged in the church (of Winchester), which is styled Domus Dei, or the House of God.

† Brady makes this a surname, but in the Latin he reads it "homo dapifer," which signifies only a Steward. Gale's edition of the Domesday Book reads Amo, which shews it to be a surname.

‡ The reader owes this observation to Mr. Rider, who, in his History of England, vol. v. p. 112. tells us that he took it from a MS. note in the Polydore Virgil belonging to St. Paul's school, London (of which he is now sub-master.) The writer having shewn that Virgil's account is not consistent with the Domesday Book, proceeds thus: "Non censatur Londinum," &c.

cardinals and other great men in his behalf at the next election. But, judging his presence would be essentially necessary to the success of his designs, he purposed to withdraw privately out of the kingdom, and go over to Rome to reside till the death of Gregory should open a way to the succession. He took all his measures with the utmost secrecy, and even persuaded Hugh d'Avranches, earl of Chester, together with a great number of his adherents and tenants, to follow him into Italy, with large promises of making their fortunes out of the spoils of St. Peter's church.

These proceedings, however, were not so effectually concealed but that William got advice of them, and was, with reason, apprehensive that the kingdom and himself might be considerable sufferers by the loss of so many noblemen of great property, and the immense treasure which Odo was carrying away with him: he, to whom forming and carrying into execution a design was the work of the same instant, transported himself over to England so suddenly, that he came upon Odo and his attendants as they were just ready to embark from the Isle of Wight, on board a ship that was to carry them to Italy; and suddenly bursting into the house where they were all assembled, he ordered the bishop to be seized immediately; but finding that fear and respect hindered his officers from doing their duty, he laid hands on him himself*. In vain did the bishop plead the privileges of his order; the king told him, that he seized him not as a bishop, but as earl of Kent and his vassal, and commanded him to be kept in safe custody. The seizure of the prelate's person was followed by the confiscation of all his effects (which amounted to incredible sums) for the king's use; and numberless extortions being proved upon him, William ordered him to be transported to Normandy, and imprisoned in the castle of Rouen, where he remained till the king's death, notwithstanding all the efforts of pope Gregory, who soothing and threatened William in his behalf. This behaviour of William did infinite honour to the vigour of his administration in the opinion of all the princes of Christendom, most of whom were at that time little better than slaves to the imperious pontiff of Rome.

An epidemical distemper which had broke out and raged with great fury in Normandy, detained the king longer in England than he intended. In order, therefore, to amuse himself during this constrained absence from his native country, in favour of which he was warmly prepossessed, he passed his time in hunting, a diversion of which he was fond to a degree of infatuation; and the measures he took to gratify himself therein were no less absurd than tyrannical: he destroyed all the villages, churches, and houses in Hampshire, within the compass of thirty miles, to make a forest in which he might follow his favourite pastime without molestation; and, if historians may be credited, he never made the least amends to the many inhabitants whom he by this means deprived of their lands and houses. The tract of land he thus depopulated was called before Ytene, but afterwards it took the name of the New Forest. The injustice and cruelty of this measure, whereby William deprived so many of his subjects of their subsistence and amusement, gave rise to several bitter invectives from the sufferers, who styled him the Father of Wild Beasts; but so far was he from endeavouring to conciliate the minds of his people by any act of benevolence or kindness, that he followed this last instance of oppression by enacting the most severe laws relating to forests, whereby he claimed an absolute right and property in them, forbidding, on very severe penalties, any person to hunt therein, without his express permission. Such an ordinance could not but appear very grievous both to his Norman and English subjects, and in particular to the nobility, as it debarred them the use of their favourite pleasure, the only one which, in that illiterate age, they had to amuse or pass their tedious hours. This conduct is hardly to be reconciled with William's usual prudence, which directed him always to take the most proper seasons for the execution of his measures; unless we suppose, that, finding himself now firmly secured on the throne, he might imagine he had no longer any occasion to lay himself under restraint, but might give a loose to his inclinations, however oppressive to others, without being apprehensive of consequences.

These and many other oppressions which the English suffered under this king, plainly shew that they did not complain without cause; though, perhaps, their impatient behaviour might sometimes have exasperated William to harsher measures than he would otherwise have pursued. But be this as it will, it is certain they were at this time reduced extremely low, and beheld, without daring even to murmur, the Normans enriched with their spoils; nay, William even endeavoured to abolish the English tongue and introduce his own into its place. He did not, indeed, dare absolutely to abrogate the laws of Edward the Confessor, but he introduced divers alterations in the modes of administering justice. He ordered all the laws to be published in the Norman tongue; and no other was heard at court. He erected schools in all the towns and boroughs of the kingdom, the masters whereof were Normans, and taught in that language; and all parents were commanded to send their children to these seminaries, under severe penalties.

In the year 1084, we find William imposing a tax in England of no less than six shillings upon every hide of land, which was three times as much as Danegelt used to be. This brought a prodigious sum of money into his coffers; and one would be tempted to think that William had acted from some secret presage, since he soon found occasion to employ the monies he had thus raised, in preparations against an invasion he was threatened with from Denmark, which happened the succeeding year.

The king was, in the latter end of the autumn, called over into Normandy, by the sickness of his queen Matilda, or Maud, of whom he was tenderly fond, and who resigned her breath in his arms soon after his arrival. He was so much afflicted at her death, that he abstained from his usual diversions for ever after. Her funeral he celebrated with great magnificence in the nunnery of the Holy Trinity, at Caen.

* Speed gives us a flaming speech, which he makes William to have uttered on this occasion, and which may be found transcribed by Rider; but as the authenticity of it seems very dubious, we have purposely omitted it in this work, the intent of which is to instruct by the relation of facts, rather than to amuse with rhetorical flourishes.

In the midst of his sorrow, however, he found himself alarmed by an insurrection that broke out in le Maine, and was fomented by the nobility, who were not reconciled to the Norman government. These disturbances lasted upwards of three years, and many persons of noble birth and exemplary valour lost their lives on both sides, till at length William, finding he could not quell the disaffected party by force, made a treaty with the chief of them, by which matters were again settled on a quiet footing. But from William's known military skill, and the great number of veteran troops he had at his command, there is the greatest reason to believe that he would have reduced the insurgents much sooner to obedience, had he not been called off the very next year after his going over to Normandy, by advices that the Danes were actually ready to make a descent upon England with a strong naval armament, which was to be joined by the forces of Robert, earl of Flanders, with whom the king had for some time been upon very bad terms.

William, upon the first notice of the storm that threatened him, crossed over to England* with a numerous army of mercenaries from Spain, France, and Germany, well knowing that he could expect little assistance from the English whom he had lately governed with such an iron sway; on the contrary, he dreaded, with reason, that they would by a general insurrection favour the attempts of the enemy. In order, however, to guard against these consequences, he distributed his foreign forces all over the kingdom, obliging the nobility to furnish them with provisions, and quartering considerable numbers on the monasteries†.

Canute IV. king of Denmark was no sooner settled on the throne that he began to form a design of asserting his right to the crown of England, which his predecessors had always kept alive since the first conquest of this kingdom by Canute the Great. In this present design, however, the Dane appears to have been guided chiefly by the instigation of his father-in-law the earl of Flanders, between whom and William, as I have before observed, there had for some time been an animosity, and who promised to assist in the expedition with all his forces. The preparations made by Canute on this occasion were very extraordinary, and had taken him up no less than two years. He had a formidable fleet, amounting to near a thousand sail, on board of which he embarked a prodigious quantity of warlike stores, with provisions sufficient for the maintenance of an hundred thousand men. He had assembled all his forces, and his fleet lay ready to sail, when William returned to his English dominions and took those precautions we have already related. Whether the knowledge of these, or the disagreement between himself and his brother Olaus, as some historians affirm, or else a mutiny among his sailors, might be the occasion, it so happened, that Canute was obliged to abandon his designs against England‡, and William was rid of an enemy, of whom he was peculiarly apprehensive on account of his connections and interest with the natives of this island. When he had certain intelligence that the Danish expedition was laid aside, he disbanded one half of his troops, but kept the remainder together till winter, to prevent a surprize. The Saxon Chronicle tells us that he passed his Christmas holidays this year at Gloucester, where he disposed of the vacant sees of London, Thetford, and Chester, to his three chaplains, Maurice, William, and Robert.

In the following year (1086), according to Florence of Worcester and others, it was that the king knighted his son Henry, at Westminster, in Whitsun week; and on this occasion summoned all his prelates, nobility, and the most considerable of his military tenants throughout the kingdom, to attend him, on the first of August, at Salisbury, there to take an oath of fidelity to him before his intended voyage to Normandy, and at the same time obliged them to enter into an association to defend his person and government against all attempts of his enemies. No sooner was this ceremony performed than he gave them a specimen of what they were to expect from the engagements they had so lately entered into; for while he was waiting in the Isle of Wight for a fair wind, he issued out his warrants for levying money upon his subjects, on account of the order of knighthood he had conferred on Henry, it being a Norman custom to make their prince presents when he knighted any of his sons; and this custom was too flattering to William's avaricious disposition not to be introduced by him into England on the very first opportunity: and, indeed, it was no difficult matter for him to lay what burthen he pleased on the English, since he had only to command and be obeyed.

When he set sail for Normandy, he took Edgar Atheling with him, whom he still looked upon with a jealous eye, notwithstanding the conduct of this prince plainly shewed him to be divested of every spark of ambition, and fitted, both by talent and inclination, for the humble state of a private nobleman, rather than the exalted dignity of an English monarch. Edgar, on his side, could not forbear entertaining some suspicions of William; and knowing his fiery and revengeful temper, trembled for his own safety, in case his lordly keeper should take it into his imagination that he was engaged in designs against his person or authority; he, therefore, applied to him for leave to go to the Holy Land, in company with Robert, the son of Godwin, to fight the infidels. This request was music to the ears of William; he immediately consented to his proposal, and, to cover the joy he conceived at his removal, under a shew of regard to his person, he loaded him with presents; and Edgar set out with a splendid equipage, and accompanied by two hundred English gentlemen, who, having been deprived of their estates in their own country, resolved to try their fortunes in other climes. At the same time Edgar's unmarried sister, Christina, who had all along lived with him, in order to remove every cause of jealousy from William, took the veil in the monastery of Bermonsey.

* About the middle of the year 1085.

† That of Croyland, according to Ingulphus, was obliged to maintain six knights and twenty-eight archers; and the others in proportion to their opulence and extent.

‡ This prince seems to have had very ill success in his designs upon this island, for when he resumed them in the time of William Rufus, and every thing was ready for the expedition, he was assassinated by his own brother Olaus, at the foot of the altar, as he was recommending himself and his cause to heaven before he embarked; upon which all his armament was dispersed. Chron. Mailros. Chron. Saxon.

The year 1087 was marked by a dreadful famine which raged in England, and was one of the melancholy consequences of that general despondency which had seized on the oppressed English, who, having no longer any property they could call their own, lost the spirit of industry, neglected the culture of the lands, as they knew they worked only for others, and thought that scarcity was at least as tolerable an evil as slavery: this universal neglect begat famine, famine diseases, and both of them jointly mortality; so that an incredible number died in the space of a few months. To add to their calamities, almost all the chief cities in England were, at different times, partly consumed by fire, amongst which the greatest part of London, together with the cathedral of St. Paul, were reduced to ashes*.

These disasters, however, seem to have made little impression upon the heart of William, for we do not find him remitting any part of the burthens he had laid upon his people; on the contrary he began to make preparations for invading the dominions of Philip, king of France, on some disputes which had happened between them†. Raising, therefore, a great army, of such who chose rather to die by the sword in any country, than perish by want in their own, he entered the Isle of France, which he wasted for some time in a furious manner; but finding himself oppressed with years and corpulence, he accepted certain proposals of peace made to him by Philip. But soon after falling ill, he was constrained to keep his bed at Rouen: the news of this being carried to Philip, he, who had so lately spoke the language of a suppliant, now gave a loose to the most unmanly exultation; and William having been advised to go through a course of physic in order to reduce his corpulency, which detained him longer than he either expected or intended, Philip one day asked, in a scoffing manner, "Whether the good woman of England was still in the straw?" which unseasonable sarcasm being reported to William, it raised all his indignation, and he swore by the brightness and resurrection of God, that, as soon as he was on foot again, he would present the taunting Frenchman with such a number of candles‡ as should make his residence too hot for him.

And now anger and resentment getting the better of his distemper, about August William was able to take the field; and putting himself at the head of a great army, he entered France, where he left no kind of ravage uncommitted, in order to fulfil the promise he had made: towns and churches, the nobleman's palace, and the labourer's hut, alike felt his fury; and death, desolation, and flames, marked his progress wheresoever he went. The city of Mantes, in a particular manner, experienced his vengeful rage; for having made himself master of it, he gave orders to burn it to the ground; and while the conflagration was raging, he rode up and down the streets as it were in triumph, to glut his eyes with this sacrifice to his resentment: but as he was passing amidst the smoaking ruins of the houses, his horse happened to set his feet on some hot ashes||, and plunging forwards with great violence, threw the king almost over his head, and bruised the lower part of his belly so much against the pommel of his saddle, that he contracted at once a rupture and a fever; and being unable to bear the pain, he was forced to return to Rouen.

There finding himself grow daily worse, he was, by his own orders, removed in a litter to the priory of St. Gervais, belonging to the monks of Felchamp, where he was attended by two of the most able physicians of those days; but his disorder proving beyond the reach of their skill, he was given to understand that nothing remained for him but to prepare for his latter end.

Upon this awful admonition he sent in all haste for Anselm, abbot of Bec, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, a man in great repute for his learning and exemplary piety, fondly thinking to obtain that by his prayers, which he found he must not hope for from medicine: but herein he found himself disappointed, Anselm being at that time sick in bed himself, and not able to attend him. William then ordered his treasures to be distributed among the poor, as some atonement for the miseries he had made them suffer. He confessed his sins, he took the sacrament, he left nothing undone, that, in the opinion of that bigotted age, was most likely to bribe heaven in his behalf. Among other acts of mercy, he ordered Morcar, Roger Siward, son of Siward Bearn, and Ulnoth, brother to Harold (who had been an hostage in Normandy ever since the year 1052) to be set at liberty, together with all other persons that were imprisoned either in England or Normandy. Those who were about him, taking advantage of this lenient disposition, made application to him in behalf of his brother Odo, then in confinement; but William, whose intellects were not impaired by his bodily infirmities, knew too much of the temper and character of that prelate, easily to comply with this request: at length, however, overcome by the solicitations of Odo's brother Roger, count of Mortain, he consented to his enlargement.

Perceiving now that his last moments were approaching apace, he betook himself to settle his worldly concerns: he called together his friends and sons, but two only of the latter were present, Robert and Henry; he then, according to Ordericus

* Would it be deemed uncandid, if in this place we were to offer a suggestion, that some of these conflagrations might have been owing to the oppressed, who took this way, the only one in their power, of being revenged on their oppressors?

† Some historians impute the cause of this rupture to a trifling incident, which they thus relate: Henry, the youngest son of William, is said to have had a quarrel with Philip's eldest son, surnamed Lewis le Gros, at Conflans Honore, as they were playing at chess. Lewis, having a run of ill-luck, was so out of humour that he made use of ill language, called Henry the son of a bastard, and threw the chess-men at his head. Henry, enraged at this affront, threw the chess-board in Lewis's face with such violence as laid him bleeding on the ground, and would have killed him if he had not been prevented by his brother Robert, who thought it adviseable to make their escape. The two brothers immediately mounted their horses, and were closely pursued by some men sent out for that purpose. Luckily for them, they were met on the road by Baldwin de Harcourt, and Fulk, count of Beaumont sur Oyse, who, being apprized of their danger, had advanced with a party to their relief, and repulsed the pursuers to the very gates of Conflans.

Philip resented his son's wound so highly, though he had been the aggressor, that he ordered his troops to pass the Oyse, and ravage the province of Normandy.

‡ Alluding to the custom of those days, in which women presented wax tapers at the altar, upon their being churched after lying-in.

|| Wace's MS. history. Matthew Paris asserts, that he received this injury as he was leaping his horse over a ditch: his words are, "Præruptam fossam equus regis transiliens, interiora disruptuit infidentis." Matt. Paris. Hist. Maj. p. 11.

Vitalis, made a long speech*, in which, after lamenting his manifold acts of oppression and bloodshed, most of which he seems desirous to have attributed rather to the circumstances of the times, than to his own inclination, he proceeds to bequeath the dukedom of Normandy and the province of le Maine to his eldest son Robert, as his inheritance by birth-right†. As to the succession to the crown of England, he confessed that he could not pretend to bequeath it as any part of his patrimony or inheritance, but wished that his son William, who had always behaved the most dutifully to him of any of his children, might inherit it after his decease‡. To his third son, Henry, he left no more than five thousand marks||; which appearing to the young prince so inconsiderable a portion in respect to what his father had bestowed on his other brothers, he could not forbear bursting into tears, and demanding of the dying king what he had done to offend him, that he had thus scantily provided for him? William endeavoured to comfort him by prophetically foretelling that he should one day succeed to the whole, and surpass his brothers both in power and riches; a prediction which the event indeed fulfilled, but that we may easily believe to have had its rise solely from William's knowledge of the dispositions of his own children, and that of the English nation, and not to any supernatural foresight.

William having thus settled his temporal concerns, and being now desirous to go out of the world as quietly as possible, ordered himself to be removed to a village called Hermantrude, lying on the river Seine, over against Rouen, where he expired soon after, viz. on Thursday the ninth of September, A. D. 1087§, in the sixty-first year of his age, after having reigned fifty-two¶ in Normandy, and one-and-twenty in England.

Some accidents attended his corpse after his death, which have been deemed sufficiently curious to entitle them to a place in the historic page. No sooner was it rumoured abroad that William had paid the last debt of nature, than every one about his court immediately deserted the lifeless body of their prince, and fell to plundering his coffers and what other valuable effects were about him; nay, to such a height did they carry their rapaciousness, that they even stripped the carcase of the rich mantle which covered it, and left this mighty Conqueror, whose nod had decided the fate of thousands, naked and exposed, like the meanest outcast of the world, whom poverty and hunger had stretched breathless in the highways. At last, one Hurlieu de Conteville, a country gentleman, was generous enough to have the body embalmed and prepared for interment, at his own expence, in the church of St. Stephen, at Caen, where the deceased monarch had, by his will, desired it might be deposited.

There the abbot and the monks of the convent came out to meet it, and the procession was increased by great numbers of citizens and others, desirous to do honour to the deceased, whose favourite town this had been, adorned by his care, and enriched by his munificence: but in the midst of the solemnity, a fire breaking out in the town, every one ran to assist in quenching it, and the royal body was again left to itself.

The fire being happily extinguished, the obsequies were resumed, and a funeral oration was pronounced by Gilbert, bishop of Evreux, who, with six other prelates, attended on the occasion. And here, as if every thing relating to the latter end of this prince was to be out of the common order of things, just as they were going to lay him in the grave, one Ascelin Fitzarthur, a vavasor (or Norman gentleman), pushing through the crowd, and standing upon a high stone, called with a loud voice to the prelates that attended, forbidding them to inter the body in that place, which had been the area of his father's house, unjustly seized by William, whom he now summoned before the divine tribunal, to answer for that act of oppression. The bishops, startled at the solemnity of this invocation, agreed to give him thirty sols for leave to bury the dead for the present; and his son Henry promised to make him satisfaction for his estate, in case his claim should be well grounded.

When the corpse was to be put into the ground, the grave being either too narrow, or the stone coffin too straight, in trying to force it down, the belly of the deceased burst, and occasioned such an intolerable stench, that the people all quitted the church, leaving the prelates to hurry over the service as fast as they could.

Thus lived and died William I. commonly called the Conqueror, to give whose character with that partiality which becomes every just historian, would be to blend truth with contradictions. As to his natural parts, envy itself must allow them to have exceeded most of the age in which he lived; nay, perhaps of many antecedent or subsequent: he had a genius which was continually prompting him to the greatest actions, and a resolution fitted to carry him through the most arduous enterprizes. Inured to hardships from his earliest youth, the toils of war were to him familiar; and those changes of fortune which would have deterred others from their pursuits, were to him but so many incentives to a more powerful exertion. In politics he appears

* Some represent this as a will, committed to writing by notaries; but on account of its great length, and that it is of doubtful authenticity, we have thought immaterial to insert it.

† From Wace's MS. history, and Fragment. Will. Conq. in Walsingh. p. 30.

‡ Before his death, William is said to have delivered to his son a letter, signed with his own signet, and addressed to archbishop Lanfranc, soliciting his interest in his behalf; and having kissed him, and given him his blessing, ordered him to make the best of his way to England, in order to prevent any commotions that might arise.

|| Authors are a good deal divided with regard to this legacy left Henry; some say that he had five thousand marks a year; others, among whom is Vitalis, that he had only five thousand marks in all; which last is the most concurrent opinion.

§ The dying king (for kings must die) having raised his weak body upon the pillow, heard the sound of the great bell in the metropolitan church of St. Gervais, near Rouen, and demanding the cause, one replied, that it did then ring prime to our Lady; whereupon, with great devotion lifting his eyes towards heaven, and spreading abroad his hands, "I commend myself (said he) to that blessed Lady Mary, Mother of God, that she, by her holy prayers, may reconcile me to her most dear Son, our Lord Jesus Christ." And with these words yielded up the ghost. J. H. Life of Will. I. Harl. Miscell. vol. ii.

¶ And not forty-two, as Rapin mistakenly has it; for it is evident his government of Normandy commenced from the death of his father Robert, which happened on July 2, A. D. 1035.

 Wanting thirty-five days, computing from the death of Harold; but if we reckon from his coronation on December 25, 1066, it will be found to want almost four months of that time.

to have had more craft than wisdom, and his avarice frequently got the better of his attempts towards popularity; for while, in the disposal of those lands of which he deprived the English, he considered only the merits of the highest bidder, he even created himself enemies among those of his Norman followers, whom he, by this distribution, affected to oblige. In some instances he was superfluously generous, in others penuriously economical. With respect to his government, he was guided by his natural disposition, which seems to have been haughty and vindictive: averse to controul, he looked upon every opposition to his will as an unpardonable crime; and yet we find him easily forgiving the most flagrant outrages upon his person and authority. With all the exterior of submission to the clergy, no king ever confined their power within more narrow limits: a professed subject to the church of Rome, no monarch ever made a more glorious stand against any attempt of that see to dictate, in ecclesiastical matters, to the people over whom he ruled; and the reply he made to the insolent demand of pope Gregory, will be a lasting monument of his resolution to maintain the independency of the English church. The measures which he followed to maintain himself on the throne, were such as must render his memory justly abhorred by every son of liberty; for he not only dispossessed the natives of this island of their birth-rights and lawful inheritance, but even attempted to annihilate their customs and language, that, by introducing the manners of his Norman subjects, he might the more easily bend their noble minds to the yoke of arbitrary power. Friend as he affected to be to the monks and their manner of life, he likewise subjected them to the same rigorous exactions which he imposed upon the rest of his subjects; he stripped them of those privileges which had been given them by the devout race of the Saxon kings; he changed or abrogated many of their charters, and subjected their lands to military service. In a word, his lenity and severity, for which he has been execrated or praised, according as historians have favoured or disapproved his cause, seem to have been the result of the immediate circumstances in which he found himself at different times, and to have proceeded more from political considerations, than from any particular disposition or turn of mind in himself. A partiality to his own country appears to have been his prevailing passion; to that he often sacrificed justice and the paternal care which every king owes to the people over whom he rules, whether called to the government of them by election or the right of inheritance; and if, with some, we allow him to have been a tyrant, he certainly was a glorious one. In his private character he appears to have been the affectionate husband and the indulgent parent. And as a legislator, though he was in many respects partial and oppressive, yet in others he shewed a great regard to private property, an invincible hatred to every vice, and a thorough detestation of corruption and partiality, as will appear from the tenor of his laws, that will be found in their proper place.

As to the external qualifications of this prince, we find them thus described by Malmesbury: "In his stature he was graceful, though not, as some report, exceeding the ordinary proportion of men*; he had great dignity in his aspect, though the protuberance of his belly somewhat abated the majesty of his person: his constitution was fitted to bear the greatest hardships: and he enjoyed so perfect a health, that he never had any dangerous illness till that of which he died. His bodily strength was so great, that it is said hardly a man could be found to draw his bow, which he used with great ease to bend on horseback, stretching out the string with his foot."

His offspring was as follows:

By his queen Matilda, daughter to Baldwin, earl of Flanders, he had Robert, surnamed Courthouse, from his wearing short boots or hose, or, according to some, on account of the shortness of his legs and thighs. This prince experienced amazing vicissitudes of fortune, as will be seen in the sequel of this history. He was married twice; first, when both parties were but very young, to Margaret, daughter to the earl of Maine, who died before she came to the years of puberty: secondly to Sibylla, niece to Guiscard, count of Apulia, in Italy. He had issue Richard, a prince of great expectations, who was killed as he was hunting in his grand-father's New Forest. Most of our modern historians have mentioned this Richard as a son of the Conqueror's, and that he was born between Robert and Rufus; but, by ancient records, this appears to be a mistake.

William Rufus, his successor on the English throne, was another son; the appellation of Rufus he got from the red colour of his hair and florid complexion; and was educated under Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, his father's favorite minister and counsellor.

His third son was Henry, surnamed Beauclerc, for his extraordinary proficiency in the literature of those times. He was born at Selby, in Yorkshire, A.D. 1070; a circumstance which afterwards proved of great service to him against his brother Robert, when the latter set up a claim to the crown of England, and lost it by not being a native of this country.

We read of five daughters that William had:

Cicely, the eldest, took the veil, and was first a nun in the monastery of Feschamp, in Normandy, and afterwards abbess of the convent of the Holy Trinity, at Caen, where she died in the year 1027.

Constance, the second daughter, was given in marriage to Alain Fergant, count or duke of Brittany, to cement the peace between him and her father; and William gave with her the great manor of Richmond, in Yorkshire, as a dowry.

* In the year 1562, when Castilleau took the city of Caen, with those broken battalions that escaped the battle of Dreux, some of the mercenary troops, headed by their officers, broke down the monument of king William, which his son Rufus had built to his memory, and which was extremely valuable, being adorned with great quantity of gold and precious stones: not contented with this, they violated the sacred repository of the dead, in hopes of finding a valuable treasure concealed; but being disappointed in their rapacious views, they, out of malice and resentment, took his bones out of the stone coffin in which they lay, and scattered them about with a barbarous contempt. As there were a number of English soldiers in the town at that time, they could not bear to see the remains of a king, who had ruled over their nation, thus ignominiously exposed, and therefore gathered together his bones, which were afterwards brought to England. This at once refuted the superstitious report, that his body was found uncorrupt after lying more than four hundred years in the ground; as also that his body was eight feet in length, the bones so found not being proportionable to that stature.

Margaret, the daughter who was promised to Harold, appears to have died before William's expedition to England. And a fifth daughter, named Eleonora, mentioned by Gemitecensis, after being betrothed to Alphonso, king of Castile, not relishing a married life, died a nun.

WILLIAM II. surnamed RUFUS. A. D. 1087.

VARIOUS have been the portraits of this prince's character, as the pencil has been guided by the hand of affection or dislike; but when the pallet comes into the possession of impartiality, the colouring will wear a different appearance: the horrible vices with which he has been stigmatized, will be found to sink into the milder shades of human frailty; and the daubings of gross adulation will be expunged, and in their room that natural contrast substituted, which forms the true picture of humanity.

In point of genius he rivalled most that had gone before him. At the time of his father's death he had many, and those not small, difficulties to struggle with: the natural courage he was possessed of, would never have been sufficient of itself to have made head against them, had he not added an address peculiar to himself. We have already seen that his father William was desirous to fix him as his successor on the English throne; but the right of primogeniture was undoubtedly vested in his brother Robert, a prince who had rendered himself exceeding popular, and, perhaps, from that motive which ever did, and ever will, weigh greatly with the compassionate spirit of the English, the dislike his father had shewn to him, and the sufferings he had sustained, on that account. On the other hand, Rufus's second brother Henry was a prince of great bravery, nobleness of sentiment, and consummate policy. His succession to the kingdom of England might be disputed: the subjects over whom he was to reign did, in one sense, owe a priority of allegiance to his brother Robert, and the military tenures of many of them were equally due to that prince, as duke of Normandy, as to William.

Such were the rubs in William's way to the crown of England, and these he got over in the manner that shall be shewn in the succeeding pages.

The news of his father's death reached him while he was waiting for a fair wind at Witsand; but this event he was too politic to divulge as yet, well knowing the English were not sufficiently attached to the Norman government, to submit to a successor of that race without having their minds properly prepared; and this, indeed, seems to have been the opinion of his dying father, when he advised him so strenuously to make archbishop Lanfranc his friend. Keeping in mind this prudent counsel, he no sooner landed in England, than he, taking with him Bloet, the deceased king's chaplain, repaired to Lanfranc, and delivered him the letter which his father had given him for that prelate. The archbishop, whose pride was tickled by this immediate application, from that instant devoted himself to the service of young Rufus; and the sequel will shew that his interest was of no small advantage in raising him to the crown, for Rufus's natural roughness would not suffer him to endeavour at a conquest over the minds of the people by the time-serving arts of adulation.

But notwithstanding the affection which Lanfranc bore to Rufus, whom he had educated from his earliest youth, and the gratitude he owed his father's memory, honour and a regard to justice were powerful considerations with him, and he would not absolutely promise to espouse his cause till he had first given him his oath, in the most solemn manner, "that, in case through his agency he should obtain the throne of England, he would govern with equity and moderation, maintain the liberties of the people, and behave like a dutiful and obedient son to mother-church." This promise being agreed to on the part of Rufus, the archbishop set himself heartily to work, in order to remove every obstruction in his way to the diadem.

So great was the esteem and credit in which Lanfranc stood with the English, that in a short time he gained over to his party the leading men of both nations; and, effectually to work upon the minds of the populace, a report was industriously spread, that William had resolved upon a plan of government entirely different from that of his father; that he had a natural affection for the English, whose sufferings he had often commiserated, and was determined to alleviate, if ever it was in his power; and, in particular, that it was his intention to abolish the very rigorous laws relating to the game, then in force; in fine, that he would be the restorer and defender of those rights and privileges which his predecessor had wrested from them. Thus much for the English. As for the Normans, they were taught to believe that their interests were inseparably connected with those of Rufus, and that they had no other chance for continuing in possession of what they had got in England, but by supporting the cause of the young prince to whom his father had, in his dying moments, bequeathed the succession of his new acquired kingdom.

But, perhaps, all those measures, however politic and well contrived for conciliating the minds of all parties to William's succession, would have fallen short of their desired end, had it not been for the indolence or vanity of Robert, who made himself so sure of the affections of the English, and their hearty concurrence in favour of his claim, that, when he was advised in a friendly manner by many noblemen, both Norman and English, his adherents, to make all possible speed for England, in order to prefer his right of primogeniture, he answered, with a haughtiness that bordered upon insanity, "that there was no need for such precipitation, since if he was at the farther end of the globe, he was sure that the English would not dare to fill the throne in his absence." The event proved him the dupe of his own vanity; being absent, he had but few friends to solicit his cause in England, and Lanfranc's pains in behalf of Rufus were attended with such good success, that this prince was, in a great council of the kingdom (convocatis terræ magnatibus, saith Brompton) declared king of England, and crowned the seventh of September, eighteen days after the death of his father, William I. the ceremony being performed by Lanfranc, in the presence of the archbishop of York, most of the other prelates in the kingdom, and a considerable number of the temporal lords.

William*, on his first accession to the throne, endeavoured, by every popular measure, to win the affection of his new subjects; and the English, whose natural honesty and openness of disposition, ever did and ever will render them the dupes of ambitious or designing men, began to hug themselves in the imagination that golden days were dawning upon them, and that in the mild administration of Rufus they should find a balm for those wounds which his father's arbitrary government had given to their privileges and constitution; besides, they found their nationality not a little flattered by the particular attention which their new monarch affected to shew them on all occasions.

When Robert and his party heard of the popular methods that William was pursuing, they thought it high time to rouse from their inactivity. Robert repaired to Rouen from Abbeville, where he was at the time of his father's death, took possession of Normandy without opposition, and was invested with the sword of that duchy, a ceremony, at that time, and in those parts, tantamount to that of coronation.

Odo, bishop of Bayeux, his half-uncle, was his chief minister and favourite, and had the direction of the affairs of his duchy. This prelate harboured a secret animosity against Lanfranc, and flattered himself, that if he could, by his interest and connection, place his master Robert on the throne of England, he should find no great difficulty in supplanting his adversary in his dignity. With this view he went over to England, but under the specious pretence of soliciting the restitution of his estate there, as earl of Kent, which had been confiscated by William I. as we have already shewn. William Rufus gave him the most cordial reception, and reinstated him in his former possessions; a conduct which was sufficient to have won the heart of a less ambitious person than Odo, and have fixed him in the interest of so generous a benefactor: but here it caused a very different effect, and the ambitious prelate looked upon William's generosity as the pure effect of weakness, and doubted not of being able to compass his treacherous designs with all imaginable ease. The great credit in which he found Lanfranc, was, indeed a severe mortification to him; however, the chagrin he felt on this occasion, served only as a more powerful incentive to pursue his purpose.

He wanted not a pretence to countenance his enterprize, Robert's primogeniture furnished him with as plausible one as he could wish. Having resolved upon his plan of operations, he communicated his designs to Eustace, earl of Boulogne, and Robert de Belesme, and, by the most artful arguments, drew them into his party, together with several other Norman lords, with whom Robert's birth-right had a weight, or who were in hopes that, by stirring up commotions in the state, and making themselves necessary, they should reap considerable advantages.

Odo finding his intrigues attended with such success, sent an account of his projects to Robert, in Normandy, assuring him that nothing was wanting but his presence, and a respectable body of Norman troops, to recover that throne from which the unjust caprice of his father had excluded him.

Robert, though of an irresolute disposition, had a soul not insensible to the spur of ambition; he received this news with unspeakable satisfaction, and sent word to Odo in return, that as soon as ever his friends were disposed to make a rising in his favour, they might depend upon being heartily seconded by him; and that he would, at an appointed day, invade England†. In the mean time, to dispose his Norman subjects to act vigorously in his behalf, he observed the most scrupulous exactness in the distribution of the pious legacies which had been left by his father; and set the two sons of the usurper Harold, who had been so long hostages in Normandy, at liberty, as likewise Duncan, natural son to Malcolm, king of Scotland, a prisoner there at that time, and also knighted them.

As soon as the conspirators in England had received Robert's assurances of joining them, they began to stir. The bishop of Coutances, and his nephew, Robert de Mowbray, struck the first blow by seizing upon Bath, Berkeley, and Bristol, from whence they made excursions, and ruined the estates of all those noblemen who were of William's party. Their example was quickly followed by Roger Bigod, who got together a party in the county of Norfolk; while Hugh de Grentemesnil made himself master of most of the fortresses and strong holds in Leicestershire. The earls of Hereford and Shrewsbury raised the Welsh and all their own tenants, at the head of whom they over-ran the whole country between the borders of Wales and Worcester. The behaviour of the good bishop Wulfstan, on this occasion, was such as deserves to be transmitted to posterity. Notwithstanding that he had many personal causes of dislike to archbishop Lanfranc and his clergy, he made private pique give way to the love and duty he owed to his country: he refused to admit the forces of the malecontents into Worcester; and when at length obliged to yield to superiority of numbers and abandon the town, he retired into the castle, where he made such a glorious defence, that he obliged the rebels to raise the siege, and retire with great precipitation.

William could not but be greatly alarmed at these steps taken in favour of his brother Robert; but, with a presence of mind that he observed on all occasions, he shewed not the least signs of apprehension or uneasiness, but set himself to take every prudent measure to suppress the insurrection; in all which he consulted and implicitly followed the counsels

* William found in his father's treasury sixty thousand pounds weight of silver, besides gold, jewels, vestments, and other things of inestimable value, the greatest part of which he bestowed on the churches and religious houses, and distributed the rest in largesses to the soldiery, in order to fix them in his service. Gul. Gemet. interpol. lib. viii. cap. 2. Ord. Vital. p. 664.

of Lanfranc, in whom he knew he could confide, and who, in this exigence of affairs, admirably well seconded the prudence and resolution of his royal master, and no one act of severity was practised on this occasion. Both the king and his minister endeavoured, on the contrary, to stifle the rebellion by the gentle ways of conciliation, and rather to argue than terrify the insurgents into submission. With this view he brought about an interview with the earls of Arundel and Shrewsbury, the most considerable of the chiefs of the opposition, with whom he so effectually wrought, by the most lavish promises of bounty and protection, that they deserted Robert's party, and became the fast friends and adherents of Rufus. Lanfranc, on his part, bestirred himself with so much success, that he soon gained over a considerable number of the most powerful conspirators, who abandoned the enterprize they had undertaken, so that William now found himself at leisure to prosecute more vigorous measures, and to attack the enemy in that quarter whence he had most to fear.

Accordingly he made an attempt to surprize Rochester, where he had been informed Odo, with a chosen band of the malecontents, had taken up their station; but, on his arrival before the place, he not only found it in an excellent posture of defence, but also that Odo was removed to Pevensey, another of his castles. This was no small disappointment to William, who thought if he could secure the person of that arch-rebel, he should strike at the very root of those commotions that disturbed his reign: he therefore, leaving Rochester, marched to Pevensey*, where Odo had fortified himself, expecting the arrival of succours from Robert. The king, without losing a moment's time, closely invested the place, and carried on his attacks with such fury, that Odo, seeing no probability of relief, and dreading the fatal consequences that might follow an obstinate resistance, made an offer to capitulate; but William would hearken to no other terms than those of sparing his life, and that only on condition that he should abjure the realm, and prevail with the garrison of Rochester to surrender. Hard as these conditions were, Odo was glad to comply with them: he gave the king admittance into Pevensey; and then, going along with an escorte, appointed by William for that purpose, he presented himself before the gates of Rochester, summoning the town and those within to surrender to the king at his request. The garrison of Rochester was at this time composed of the flower of the Norman party in England, with many other of the principal French and English nobility: Eustace, count of Boulogne, was there also, who guessing the state of affairs from the countenance of Odo, and that he acted only upon compulsion, got together a strong party, and making a sudden sally, took prisoner Odo and his escorte, and carried them with him into the town.

William, thus deceived in his hopes of becoming master of Rochester by the means of Odo, determined to effect that by force, which he could not compass by treaty, marched his forces thither, and sat down before the city, which was so vigorously defended that he began to despair of success; but an epidemical distemper having got among the besieged, which carried off great numbers, they were at length compelled to propose terms of surrender, offering to take an oath of allegiance to William, and to serve him ever after with all duty and submission; but William, with a stroke of policy, affected for a while to treat these offers with great disdain, by which he had an opportunity of obliging those of his party who petitioned for their friends and relations in the town: at length, suffering himself to be prevailed on by their intreaties, he gave the besieged leave to enjoy life and limbs, but no manner of hopes that they should ever be reinstated in their fortunes. As to Odo, he found means to escape by shipping to Normandy, where Robert made him lieutenant of his duchy; but all his great estates and possessions were seized upon by Rufus, who distributed them amongst those who had distinguished themselves by their fidelity and services to him in the course of the rebellion.

Every unsuccessful attempt to overturn a government, reverts with tenfold loss upon the authors, and strengthens in proportion the hands of those in power. Robert's party was now entirely broken; and William, having no longer any thing to fear, thought himself at liberty to dispence with the performance of those promises which the former exigence of his affairs had prompted him to make; and the honest English ("Anglos probos," to use the words of Malmesbury), who, from their late services, thought themselves justly entitled to every reasonable mark of favour from a king whose throne they had so loyally and bravely upheld, found themselves cruelly disappointed, by his enacting several rigorous laws concerning forests. Lanfranc could not behold such proceedings in silence, but, with a becoming boldness, remonstrated to him how very inconsistent they were with the sacred promise he had made to him, when only a candidate for the crown. William's haughty soul was stung to the quick with this freedom of the archbishop's; but not judging it politic to break with a person of his great influence in the kingdom, he affected to laugh it off, by saying in a jesting manner, "Pish! man, dost think kings can keep all their promises?" It was not long, however, before William was delivered of this too honest counsellor, who died within a few months afterwards, justly regretted by the good men of both nations, who revered him as the most able and upright prelate and statesman that had for many ages adorned those high posts.

The presence of this venerable man being no longer a check to the king's inclinations, he began to indulge himself without restraint in that thirst for money-getting, which seems to have been the prevailing passion of his father and himself, but with this difference, that the first William always took care to keep his coffers well supplied against any sudden emergency; whereas this prince, avaricious without frugality, squandered the immense sums he drained from the subject in idle expences, to gratify his own vanity, or satisfy the cravings of his favourites. And here he put in practice a method before unknown in England; he seized into his own hands all the vacant benefices, which he kept so for a number of years, collecting their revenues for his own use; the first fruits, to which he was legally entitled, appearing to him too small to satiate his avarice: nay, when he had for some time enjoyed the profits of their income, he afterwards set them up to public auction, to be purchased by the best bidder, without the least regard to the merit or capacity of the intended purchaser.

A.D. 1089, by the advice of Ralph Flambard, one of the chief justices of the kingdom, he ordered a new survey to be taken of all the lands in England, on a pretence that the inquest made by his father, and on which Domesday Book had been formed, was incomplete, and the assessments unequal: this gave him an opportunity of raising the taxes considerably. The part which Flambard acted on this occasion, and the rigour with which he exercised his new office of inquisitor, rendered him so odious to the people in general, that a plot was laid to assassinate him, which by some accident miscarried: but this attempt seemed to be a signal for many of the nobility to combine against William himself, who had countenanced these illegal proceedings in his favourite. Matters, however, were not so secretly conducted but that Flambard came to the knowledge of the plot that was hatching, and took such effectual steps, partly by flattery, and partly by menaces, that he quashed the conspiracy in its infancy, and procured Ivo de Taillebois, the chief of the party, to be sent into banishment.

And here we will stop a while, and cast our looks towards Normandy and its duke Robert, who had not as yet taken any one material step towards the support of that claim which he had pretended to set up to the English succession. His natural indolence had so far got the better of him, that even in his own duchy matters were in the greatest confusion; the state was over-run with banditti, who exercised the most outrageous ravages upon the defenceless part of the people: add to this, that Robert, when he had first formed the design of supporting his party in England by making a descent in their favour, a design which in the end came to nothing, Robert I say had, on this occasion, from a scarcity of money, mortgaged the whole country of the Contantin to his brother Henry, for the loan of three thousand pounds: now Henry, apprehensive that Robert might seize that country into his hands as soon as opportunity should offer, had trained up the inhabitants to martial discipline; but still fearful that these precautions might prove ineffectual to secure to him his property, he entered into a private correspondence with his brother William, whom he advised to attack Robert's territories, in which attempt he, from his knowledge of the state of affairs in Normandy, promised him certain success.

Rufus, however, was too politic a prince to engage in any enterprize of that nature without being well assured of support; he therefore convened a council of his states, and laid before them the state of Normandy, and the motives upon which he was determined to attempt an invasion of that country, requesting at the same time their sanction to his proceedings.

The council concurring with his views, he made the necessary preparations for carrying his enterprize into execution; and in the spring of the year 1090, he landed in Normandy, and, before his brother Robert was able to make head against him, carried the towns of St. Vallery, Albemarle, and several other places, without meeting with the least opposition.

Robert, thus pressed, applied with great earnestness, to the court of France for relief; but William had by some means attached the French king to his interest, and Robert found himself deserted by the very person on whom he had placed the most assured dependence, and left exposed to all the calamities of war; he saw his towns falling one after another into the hands of William, and received certain advice that Rouen itself, the capital of his duchy, was on the eve of being surrendered to the king of England by its governor Conon, who had carried on a secret correspondence with the enemies of his sovereign and his country.

At this juncture Henry, who equally distrusted both his brothers, but feared the designs of William most, as being the most powerful, deserted the party of the latter, and resolved, on this occasion to throw the weight of his interest into Robert's scale: marching, therefore, with a body of forces to join him, he arrived just in time to prevent the execution of the traitor Conon's scheme, whose person he seized and ordered him to be cast headlong from the top of the castle, after which he took possession of the city in the name of his elder brother. By this bold stroke he quashed the conspiracy, which, had it succeeded, would not only have deprived Robert of his capital, but in all probability of his whole dominions; and Henry wisely foresaw, that in such case his ruin also would follow as a natural consequence.

This union of the two brothers, and the miscarriage of the enterprize upon Rouen, put a stop to William's progress for this year, and he returned to England; but he resolved to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour the ensuing campaign. Accordingly, as soon as the season of 1091 admitted of beginning military operations, he crossed the sea with a strong fleet and a numerous land army; and coming upon Robert, who was then engaged in the siege of Courcy, he obliged him to decamp with great precipitation. After this he marched to a place called Ville d'Eu, where he encamped, and was visited by many of the Norman nobility, whose own interests made them desirous to bring about an accommodation, between the two brothers; their labours were attended with such happy success that a peace was shortly after concluded, on condition that Robert should resign the county of Eu, the castle of Aumale, the abbey of Feschamp, Cherbourg, and all the other places he had reduced on the coast of Normandy; in lieu of which William was to assist the duke in subduing the province of Maine which had revolted, and restore to the confiscated English estates all Norman noblemen who had been deprived of them. Moreover, it was stipulated, that in case of the death of either of the two brothers, the survivor should inherit the other's dominions.

In all this treaty not the least notice was taken of Henry, who could not but be greatly chagrined to see himself thus contemptuously and unjustly passed by; and resolving to revenge himself upon Robert in particular, from whom he thought his late services called for some degree of attention, he, by force of arms, made himself master of Mount Michael. Robert could not quietly see a place of that consequence wrested out of his hands, and therefore engaged his brother William to assist him in recovering it again. The two brothers began by taking possession of the Contantin; after which they advanced to the siege of Mount Michael.

Michael. The place was strongly fortified by nature, being situated on a rock washed by the sea, and surrounded with water at the flood tide, consequently they had no hopes of reducing it in any other manner than by blockade.

While the two brothers lay before the place, a remarkable accident happened, which, as it gives us a strong light into one part of William's character, we shall here deliver as related by Knyghton.

One day, as the king was riding alone at some distance from the camp, he saw two horsemen advancing in full gallop from the castle, and being naturally brave even to an extreme, he, despising the odds, rode to meet them, determined to take one or both of them prisoners, hoping thereby to get some material intelligence relating to the condition of the besieged. The soldiers finding themselves attacked by a single man, could not for shame but stand on the defensive, and in the encounter one of them had the good fortune to run William's horse through with his spear, who instantly falling drew his rider with him to the ground; the fellow perceiving his antagonist in this situation, and not knowing him, was on the point of putting an end to his life, when the monarch called out to him in a commanding tone, "Hold, villain, I am the king of England." The soldier, struck with veneration, stopped his uplifted hand, and, together with his comrade, assisted to raise the king, and mounted him on one of their own horses. William vaulting into the saddle with great agility, called to the man who had got the better of him, saying, "Follow me, my lad, and you shall henceforward be my soldier."

Although the besiegers had nothing to boast of in point of success, the siege going on very slowly, yet at the same time those within were driven to great distress, and Henry's people were greatly put to it for want of water; which, when Robert came to understand, he, with a humanity and brotherly kindness which must ever do honour to his heart, gave leave for the besieged to fetch as much water as they wanted, and not only so, but sent Henry a ton of wine for his own drinking; and when William remonstrated to him, that such a conduct was counter to all the rules of true policy, "It may be so (replied he), but is our dispute then so deadly, that we shall suffer our own brother to perish for thirst? Alas, there are many kingdoms in the world, but where shall we find another brother, if we cruelly destroy this?" This act of generosity, however, appeared so ill-timed to William, that he would no longer act in conjunction with Robert, but quitted the siege and returned to England. Nevertheless Robert prosecuted it with such vigour, that in a short time he brought his brother Henry to surrender upon terms; after which the unfortunate Henry wandered up and down for some time, without knowing where to fix his residence.

About this time Edgar returned to Normandy from his Palestine expedition, and was generously received by Robert; but Rufus, who entertained some disagreeable apprehensions of that prince, made it a point with his brother Robert that he should oblige him to quit his dominions, which he accordingly did; and William having seized upon the estates he held in England, Edgar found himself once more obliged to have recourse to his old friend and protector, Malcolm, king of Scots, to whom he made such an affecting representation of the hard treatment he had received from William, that the Scot resolved to avenge him on his oppressor, and to march a powerful army into England, in order to place him on the throne of his ancestors. And accordingly, taking advantage of William's absence in Normandy, he entered Northumberland, in May, ravaged the whole country, which was in a defenceless state; and, having made a considerable booty, retired again into his own country.

Upon the news of this invasion, Rufus immediately made preparations to attack the Scots, both by sea and land; but the success of the war was far from being favourable to the English, for the fleet, which had been destined to make a descent on the Scottish coast, was mostly destroyed by a tempest, so that it could effect nothing of any consequence. In the mean time, Robert, at the invitation of Rufus, came over from Normandy, to assist him in his land expedition against the enemy; and both brothers advanced with their joint forces as far as Scotwater, where they were met by an envoy from Malcolm, with this message to William, "That as he neither did nor would acknowledge him as king of England, consequently he could look on him only as the invader of his kingdom; but that if his brother Robert was with him, he was ready and willing to do that prince homage for Cumberland, as the eldest son of William I. his lord paramount."

Upon the receipt of this message, William called a council of war, to consult upon the most proper measures to be pursued; when Robert de Mowbray, earl of Northumberland, a wise and experienced general, represented the necessity there was of coming to an accommodation, as the English was greatly weakened and distressed for want of provisions, the enemy having ravaged the country so entirely, that there was neither forage for their horses nor food for the men. These sage remonstrances had the desired effect, and Robert was pitched upon by the council to go to the Scottish camp with proposals to Malcolm, by whom he was received with the greatest complaisance; and his offers being seconded by the persuasions of Edgar Atheling, whom Mowbray had secretly found means to persuade that he would get him restored to his estates in England, and who had none of the ambition of a crown about him, Malcolm consented to a peace with Rufus, on the following terms: that William should restore to Malcolm twelve manors, which the latter had held under the first William, and pay him annually twelve marks of gold; and that Malcolm should do homage to William in the same manner as he had done to his father. At the same time William was obliged to receive Edgar Atheling into favour, and reinstate him in the possession of the lands he had taken from him.

Matters being thus amicably adjusted between the two sovereigns, though, it must be confessed, in a manner not very glorious to William, this latter retired, with the shattered remains of his army, to England. And now Robert thought it was a seasonable opportunity to remind his brother William of the treaty that had been made between them, and to require to be put in seizin of the estates which were to be given him in England by virtue of that treaty. William, however, only amused him with flattering promises, without shewing the least inclination to perform his contract; upon which Robert, in a pique, quitted England, and took took Edgar Atheling along with him into Normandy.

William, on his return home, received the agreeable news, that, during his absence in Scotland, the county of Glamorgan, in Wales, had been entirely conquered by Robert Fitzhamon, a Norman and his subject. The history of this conquest is a melancholy proof of the fatal effects that arise from civil dissensions, and at the same time affords an useful lesson to princes, how they attempt to assert their rights by calling in a foreign aid.

Wales being divided into several little principalities, and the princes thereof being continually at variance with one another, had never been able to make head against the power of England; all that these princes could do being only to carry on a piratical war, in which they derived some advantages from the woody and mountainous situation of their country. To prevent the depredations they so frequently committed in that part of the English territories bordering upon theirs, William I. had prudently given large possessions to his Norman barons on the marches of Wales, investing them with extraordinary privileges and royalties, so that they had always a great number of dependents ready to take up arms and oppose the Welsh whenever they attempted any incursions. About the year 1090, Rees ap Tudor, prince of South Wales, had fallen upon Jestyn, lord of Morgannue, or Glamorgan, whose family had ruled that country for many ages. This latter, finding himself too weak to oppose the invader of his territories without foreign succours, applied, by the means of Eneon, a Welch nobleman, who had been in the English service, to Robert Fitzhamon, earl of Gloucester, for assistance. Robert, associating with him twelve valiant knights, marched with a considerable force to his aid, and coming to an engagement with the enemy, near Brecknock, Rees was slain, and with him fell the principality of South Wales. Jestyn seeing himself thus happily freed from his old enemy, neglected to perform the conditions he had made with the English, or to reward the services of those who had so successfully assisted him. He shewed the like disregard to Eneon, whom he, from time to time, put off on frivolous pretences. This breach of faith so incensed both parties, that they joined together to attack him; and the whole country of Glamorgan being soon reduced, Fitzhamon took possession of the fertile part lying on the sea-coast, and left the mountainous and uncultivated tract to Eneon.

Fitzhamon, thus become master of the country, rewarded the twelve knights*, who had assisted him in the conquest, with several valuable fiefs, which they were to hold of him as their lord paramount. It will appear by the note, that many families of their names are still settled in their estates there.

Robert, on his return to his own dominions, found his brother Henry in possession of Donfront, a strong sea-port town in Normandy, which had been delivered into his hands by Roger de Bellefme, together with the whole of the Contantin. On this occasion, William's policy had dictated to him to support Henry underhand, so that Robert found it impossible to reduce that young prince, or dispossess him of those territories he had seized; nor was this the only instance of his brother Rufus's insincerity and disregard to treaties that Robert had to complain of; for, notwithstanding the signal services he had rendered him in the Scottish war, William was continually endeavouring to draw off the Norman lords from their allegiance to Robert, hoping by degrees to weaken that prince so effectually as to make himself master, with little or no opposition, of the duchy of Normandy. While he was thus giving his own brother such just cause of complaint, his subjects had not much better to expect from his hands; and, in short he exercised his authority at home in the most illegal and arbitrary manner, by imposing new taxes upon corporations, and grinding the faces of all those under him in the most relentless manner. By these methods he did indeed fill his coffers, but at the same time he entailed upon himself the curses both of the English and Normans, who were equally sufferers by his rapacious exactions.

About the year 1093, William found himself, much against his will, obliged to fill up the long vacant see of Canterbury, in order to stop the outcries of the clergy, whom he knew to have a great influence with the common people. Accordingly he listened to a proposal they made him of electing Anselm, abbot of Bec, into that see, a man of the most unexceptionable character. But while this proposal was under consideration, William felt dangerously ill at Gloucester: and as none but the truly virtuous are truly brave, William on this occasion betrayed all the signs of pusillanimity; he had recourse to the prayers and counsels of that set of men, for which he had always affected to shew the greatest contempt: and they, true to the grand principle which actuates all of their order, laid hold of this opportunity to work the mind of the death-affrightened king to their own purposes. The archbishopric of Canterbury was bestowed on Anselm, who was at that time in England, on a visit to his friend the earl of Chester, then on a sick-bed; the bishopric of Lincoln was given to Robert Bloet, William's own chaplain; the clergy also gained several other material points during the king's sickness; in particular, Anselm demanded a full restitution of every part of the revenues of his see, that had been granted away at the death of Lanfranc, for lay uses; all which Rufus faithfully promised to comply with. But no sooner had his disorder taken a favourable turn, and he found himself freed from the immediate terror of dissolution, than he repented him heartily of the concessions he had made, and forgetting in his recovery all the promises of his sick-bed, gave the clergy to understand that he thought they had taken undue advantages of his late weakness: he countermanded several orders he had issued in their favour; and, which was still more unpardonable, he commanded the prison doors to be shut again upon those whom he had ordered to be set free, and resumed his former arbitrary manner of governing. These proceedings occasioned a quarrel between him and Anselm that proved the source of manifold mischiefs. Moreover, William finding that many of his subjects daily quitted the kingdom, unable to subsist under his rule, he issued an edict, prohibiting any one to go out of it without especial licence first obtained of the king.

And here the adversaries of William seem to indulge themselves in the most bitter invectives against him: he is represented as a monster of tyranny, profligacy, and perjury. It will not be difficult for the reader to guess from what quarter this flood of censure chiefly proceeds; but as his enemies speak only in general terms, and do not bring us any particular authentic instances of civil oppression, candour will not permit us to subscribe our assent to detraction in gross: besides, history undoubtedly furnishes us with many examples, where kings have been imposed upon by the artifices of a designing and ambitious set of men, and afterwards becoming sensible of the folly of their concessions, have, with great justice, and with honour to themselves, recalled those grants, which, however they might be beneficial to individuals, were a tax upon the community.

Thus much, however, is certain, that William, in general, regarded his promises no longer than the performance of them appeared agreeable to his interest: of this he gave a remarkable instance at this period; for Malcolm, king of Scots, having sent ambassadors to him, to demand the performance of that part of the late treaty which regarded the cession of the twelve manors in his favour, William desired that he would repair in person to him at Gloucester, promising that he should there have all justice done him. Malcolm, upon this invitation, immediately repaired to the king's court, but was received with so much haughtiness by Rufus, that he returned to his own country in a transport of indignation*.

No sooner had he set foot in his own dominions than he assembled a powerful army, with which he entered Northumberland, ravaging the country as far as Alnwick, to which place he laid siege, and carried on his operations with such vigour that in a short time the besieged were obliged to capitulate, notwithstanding that Robert de Mowbray had marched to its assistance with all the forces he could raise. The governor of the place, whose name was Morel, having demanded a capitulation, on pretence of presenting the keys to Malcolm on the point of a spear, thrust the weapon into his eye, and killed him on the spot. Edward, Malcolm's son, seeing his father fall, called out, Treachery! and prepared with his followers to revenge his death; but, being at some distance from their camp, they were all cut to pieces by the besieged, who immediately on seeing the fate of Malcolm, and the motions made by Edward, sallied out furiously upon him and his party. Thus fell the gallant king of Scots and his son, by one stroke of unexampled treachery. This is the story as we have it related by the Scotch historians; but the English writers say, that Robert de Mowbray, coming by night with a strong force, surprized Malcolm in his camp, and that in the heat of the action both the king and his son were slain, and the Scots army was routed with great slaughter. However this might have been, the event happened on St. Brice's day, the thirteenth of November, and the dead body of Malcolm was buried at Tinmouth, from whence it was afterwards removed to Dunfermling, and interred in a church which he himself had founded. His queen Margaret was so afflicted with his death, that she survived the news of it but three days. His loss was also sensibly felt by such of the English who lived under his protection in Scotland, and to whom he had been a father and a friend, and who now suffered a cruel reverse of fortune under the reign of his brother and successor, Donald Bane, who, as soon as he ascended the throne, expelled all the English whom the late king had so remarkably favoured.

Rufus being thus freed from a powerful and dangerous enemy in the person of Malcolm, found himself at leisure to invade the territories of his brother Robert, whom he could never forgive for the peremptory manner in which he had insisted upon his performance of the articles between them.

Accordingly, in the spring of 1094, he passed over to Normandy with a strong army: but, in order to give some colour to such unnatural hostilities, he sent to propose an interview with his brother, at which Robert made some proposals that were rejected with great disdain by king William. Robert then proposed a second conference, at which were present all the barons and great men who had sworn to guarantee the treaty; but numberless difficulties being started in the course of the negotiation, it was finally broke off, and both sides prepared for action.

Hostilities being commenced, William soon made himself master of several places, the governors whereof he had bribed, and flattered himself with the hopes of quickly subduing the whole duchy. But the king of France, whose interest it was ever to keep the two brothers at variance, without suffering either to become too formidable, marched with an army to the assistance of Robert, and immediately changed the scene. The towns and castles which Rufus had gotten possession of, were reduced one after another, and garrisoned with a mixture of Normans and French: and the affair became so serious, that William found himself under the necessity of sending to England for a reinforcement of troops.

Upon the receipt of William's mandate in England, levies were made, and twenty thousand men being raised, a general muster was appointed at Hastings; and as the men were to be employed in foreign service, the several barons or knights, under whom they had been raised, furnished each man, in compliance with an ancient custom, with ten shillings towards defraying their expences during the campaign; this made in all the sum of ten thousand pounds of the money of those times, equal to nearly two hundred thousand pounds of the present currency. William, who had expended vast sums in corrupting Robert's officers and governors, began to find his coffers almost exhausted, and therefore put in practice an expedient to recruit them, that must call the blush upon the face of any private man of the least honour, but stamps indelible infamy on the character of a king. He, either by the persuasions of some of his favourites, or of his own advisement, dispatched directions to Ralph Flambard, his prime minister and high-treasurer, to get this money, if possible, out of the hands of the foldiers, and transmit it over to him in Normandy. The minister meanly complied with this order; and having caused the troops to be drawn up on the sea-side, he there made a speech to them, in which he told them that the king his master having more occasion for money than for recruits, every man might be excused from the expedition upon paying the bounty-money he had received into his hands, for the king's use. The men, whose livelihood and that of their families depended chiefly on their labour, readily embraced the composition, and having paid their money to the treasurer, the whole body was disbanded.

The money thus collected was immediately remitted over to William, who applied it to a purpose perfectly agreeable to the manner in which he had obtained it. He well knew that the prevailing passion of Philip, the French king, was avarice, and he therefore thought, that by a proper application of a handsome sum, he might induce him to desert the party of his brother Robert: the issue proved the truth of this opinion, and Philip, having touched the stipulated sum, threw so many delays in the way of the operations that had been concerted between him and Robert, and with whom he had actually advanced as far as Longueville, in their way to Eu, where he intended to besiege William, that no transaction of consequence happened during the remainder of the campaign; and William, in a short time, was called off from the prosecution of the war by an insurrection in Wales, and the advice of a conspiracy formed against him in England.

The reader may recollect in what manner Robert Fitzhamon, earl of Gloucester, had made himself master of the county of Glamorgan, after having routed Jestyn: much about the same time, Roger, earl of Shrewsbury, reduced Montgomeryshire; and the king had given a grant to this nobleman's son, Arnulph, of the county of Pembroke, in consequence of which the latter had built several fortresses therein, and in particular the castles of Pembroke and Cardigan, to secure his acquisitions. And as power is not, in general, a softener of the manners, it may naturally be supposed that Arnulph and his dependents might behave to the neighbouring Welsh in an haughty and overbearing way, and not have attended very scrupulously to the tenets of property. However this might have been, these people, either from real or imaginary oppression, had taken such a distaste to their new neighbours, that they resolved to risk a desperate effort in order to remove them to a greater distance from their borders. Accordingly they entered Arnulph's territories with a strong force, and expelled the Normans from all their settlements thereabout, excepting the castle of Pembroke, which they were not able to reduce. After this the insurgents took Montgomery by assault, and put the garrison to the sword; and then, pouring like a torrent upon the counties of Chester, Salop, and Hereford, they spared neither age nor sex, burnt to the ground all the towns they met with in their way, and made the whole country one scene of carnage and conflagration.

William did not rest an instant after his arrival in England, before he marched against these merciless invaders; but the Welsh, on receiving tidings of his approach, did not think proper to hazard a battle against an army of veteran troops, but retired to their fastnesses in the mountains, from whence they detached flying parties over the country, which frequently surprized small bodies of William's army, and in fine so harrassed him that he was glad to quit the country ingloriously, after having made himself master of Montgomery castle, which he ordered to be repaired and strengthened with new fortifications.

Towards the latter end of the year, indeed, he made some further attacks upon the enemy, but with the like ill success; so that despairing of reducing them by the operations of a regular campaign, he left orders with the wardens of the marches to guard the borders with the greatest care, and, by building strong forts in proportion as they gained ground on the enemy, to prevent their making farther encroachments.

While he was engaged in giving these orders, and resting his harrassed troops in winter-quarters, about the beginning of the year 1095, he received intelligence of the revolt of Robert Mowbray, who having been disgusted at the little notice William had taken of him, after the important services he had performed in the defeat of the Scots at Alnwick, had, in revenge, entered into a conspiracy to depose William, and set the crown on the head of Stephen, count of Aumale, nephew to the late king. The great interest and connections of Mowbray had engaged many discontented noblemen to join his party, and they had conducted matters with so much secrecy, that although the plot had been begun during William's absence in Normandy, he had not the least intimation of what was transacting till he was in winter-quarters in Wales.

But no sooner did the disagreeable news of this confederacy reach his ears, than he took such precautions as plainly evince him to have been a prince of consummate policy. He wisely considered that the most effectual means to disconcert this dangerous combination, was to come at the bottom of it, or to force the conspirators to declare themselves before they could take all their measures, or fix a convenient time for the execution of their designs.

Previous, therefore, to any other step, he returned in person to England, and summoned Mowbray to attend him in his court, held at Winchester in Easter-week, and at Windsor in Whitsuntide, to answer for his plundering four merchantmen that had put into an English port under his jurisdiction, embezzling their effects, and not restoring them according to the king's order, who, on his neglect, had paid the value to the owners out of his Exchequer. Robert, either conscious of his guilt, or vain of his services, refused to obey the summons, unless hostages were sent him, and a safe-conduct for his security in going and returning; the stale demand which all bold rebels, either before or since, have used to cloak their rebellion, and which had Rufus granted, he would, in effect, have divested himself of all power over a disobedient subject.

Upon this William found he had no other course left but to take the field against the rebels in person.

son, which he accordingly did, and directed his march towards the North, where Mowbray's estate lay; who, upon hearing of his approach, retired into Bamborough castle, where he fortified himself. In his route the king was very near falling into an ambuscade, which the rebels had prepared for him, had not Gilbert de Tunbridge, one of the nobles engaged in the conspiracy, repented of his treason, and gave William notice of his danger. Rufus then proceeded for Bamborough castle, to which he laid siege; but finding it impregnable, on account of its situation †, he changed the siege into a blockade, and run up a tower opposite to it, which he called Malvoisin (or the Bad Neighbour.) Having put a strong garrison into this tower, he himself set out for the southern parts, where his affairs now demanded his presence. Upon his departure, Mowbray, leaving his trusty friend Morel to command Bamborough castle, went towards Tinmouth castle, one of the strongest fortresses in that age, when the use of cannon was unknown, and when the situation of a place was alone a sufficient safeguard. This castle, according to Camden, was seated on an high rock, inaccessible steep, and washed by the sea to the eastward and northward, and in other places of so narrow access that a very small garrison was sufficient to defend the passes to it against a whole army. Here Mowbray knew very well that he had no prospect of success but by the methods of corruption; accordingly he began to tamper with the governor, in order to bring him to deliver it into his hands. But while he was employed in this negotiation, the governor of Malvoisin fort marched out with the greatest part of his people, and getting between Mowbray and the castle of Tinmouth, thereby cut off all possibility of a retreat from the earl, who finding himself thus beset, was obliged to surrender at discretion, and was carried back to Malvoisin, where he was put under close confinement.

William, upon receiving news of this lucky capture, sent orders to have Mowbray brought out and presented before the walls of Bamborough castle, and that his keepers should at the same time give notice to those within, that unless they would instantly deliver up the castle, the earl's eyes should be put out before their faces. This threat struck such a panic in the minds of the besieged, who revered Mowbray as their father and leader, that they instantly capitulated: and Morel, the governor of the castle, being brought before William's commissioners, there publicly impeached divers of the clergy and nobility of being confederates in the late rebellion; upon which most part of the accused were seized, their persons imprisoned, and their estates confiscated: some, for political reasons, were dismissed; and others, of inferior rank, were put to death; as in all attempts of this nature, the weakest are ever made a sacrifice for the rest.

† Hoveden, who lived near that time, thus describes it: "Bablec, or Bamborough (saith he) is a very strong city, not exceeding large, but containing about two or three acres of ground. It has one hollow entrance into it, which is admirably raised by steps. On the top of the hill stands a fine church, and on the western point of it is a well, curiously adorned, and of sweet and clear water."

* This method of trial was in practice among the Frisians, Alemanni, Franks, and Burgundians; and, being introduced by the Normans, was allowed in cases where the proofs were defective for want of witnesses or other circumstances. A piece of ground, about eighty paces long, and forty broad, was enclosed with rails, or lists, within which the combatants fought;

Mowbray was confined for life in the castle of Windfor.

William, earl of Eu, was also impeached by Geoffrey Baynard of high treason, and being privy to the late conspiracy. As there was no other witness to this pretended guilt of the count, he demanded permission to vindicate his innocence by single combat*, which was accordingly granted him; but happening to be overcome by the impeacher, he was held as sufficiently convicted, and, by William's order, his eyes were put out, and he was deprived of his virility. His cousin, William de Alderi, being accused at the same time as concerned in the conspiracy, was sentenced to be publicly whipped, and afterwards hanged upon a gibbet thirty feet high. The first part of his sentence he suffered with the greatest magnanimity, protesting his innocence, in which he also persisted in the very last moments of his life; and the nation in general, from his known character, believed him guiltless, and that Morel had, to ingratiate himself with Rufus, made a random sacrifice of all those persons in power, whom he thought most distrusted or disliked by the king. Be that as it may, we must offer thus much in William's vindication, that, considering how complicated an affair this was, and in which so many different interests clashed, it was not to be wondered that one innocent person might suffer amidst a crowd of those who were really guilty. Odo, earl of Champaign, and Philip, son to Hugh earl of Shrewsbury, having been, upon the fullest evidence, convicted as accomplices in the late conspiracy, were deprived of their English estates; and the earl of Chester was dismissed, after a very severe reprimand.

This year, 1096, teemed with an event that makes a considerable figure in the history of this period, namely, the great difference between William and Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury; though, indeed, the dispute may rather be said to have been between the pontiff of Rome and the king of England. We have already had occasion to observe, that the monks were almost the only persons who wrote history in those early times, and therefore we are not to wonder that in any matters that related to any attempt to lessen the authority of the church, they should be outrageously rancorous in their censure, and wilfully false in their representations; hence it is that we find them making the cause of Anselm that of God and religion, whilst they represent the king as the most abandoned and profligate miscreant, who placed his glory in spurning all things sacred and praise-worthy: whereas the dispassionate reader will, from the following state of the facts, readily agree with Mr. Guthrie in his just observation, that, through the whole of this affair, William acted like a king and a man; the archbishop, like a priest and a traitor ‡.

previous to which they were both to make oath, one to the truth, and the other to the falsity of the accusation; the event determining which was right, the vanquished was condemned and the victor acquitted. Women, ecclesiastics, sick or infirm people, and all under twenty-one, or above sixty years old, were excused from fighting in person, and might have their champions to fight in their stead, whose fate determined theirs. These duels were attended with great solemnities, and abundance of ceremonies. That mentioned in the text was in presence of all the barons of England, on the octave of the Epiphany, 1096, and was the first instance in our annals of the trial of a person's guilt or innocence by the method of single combat.

And here, before we enter upon this story, it will be necessary to inform the reader, that in the times we are now treating of, it was customary for every man, when raised to a higher dignity, to make the king a present, by way of free-gift, in proportion to the value or rank of the post to which he was preferred. William, as we have seen before, had, during his illness, been prevailed on to make Anselm archbishop of Canterbury; and as this was the highest rank to which any subject could at that time be raised in England, the king expected he would advance a considerable sum; but was greatly surprized when he found that the prelate would give no more than five hundred pounds. He represented to him, that so trivial a gift from one of his rank, would be a bad precedent to the rest of his subjects, and that the present exigence of his affairs required much larger supplies than he could hope to raise, if matters took this parsimonious turn. Anselm, who knew that what he had already offered was purely extra-foedal, and that William durst not attempt to use compulsion, obstinately refused to advance a greater sum; upon which the king, in a passion, bid him get out of his sight, and take his pitiful offering with him. The priest took him at his word, and could never after be brought to furnish any money towards the necessities of government.

About this time a schism happened in the church of Rome, the pontificate being pretended to by two prelates; Odo, bishop of Ostia, who was owned as pope in Italy and France, under the name of Urban II. while his competitor, Gilbert, archbishop of Ravenna, under the name of Clement III. was abetted by several other powers, and among the rest by the king of England. The haughty Anselm would not let such an opportunity escape him of mortifying William, and therefore, with an unparalleled effrontery, he demanded leave of him to go to Rome, in order to receive his archiepiscopal pall from the hands of Urban II. whom he declared that he looked upon as the true head of the church. This behaviour so exasperated William, that he could not forbear telling the archbishop, in the heat of his resentment, that he was a rebellious traitor, in presuming to acknowledge any other pope than was owned by his sovereign: adding, that none of his predecessors had ever been guilty of such a piece of presumption; and that to acknowledge a pope, without his licence, was the same as if he should attempt to tear the crown from his head. To this spirited remonstrance, well worthy an English monarch, Anselm returned for answer, in the hypocritical cant of those days, that he resolved to render unto Cæsar what was Cæsar's, and unto God what was God's; and therefore requested of the king to call a convention of the states, both spiritual and temporal, who would determine, whether the duty he owed the pope, and that to his prince, were compatible or not.

William took him at his word, and a meeting of the states was held at Rockingham, in which Anselm finding that he could not gain his point, and that the nobles, both secular and ecclesiastical, were highly offended against him for his arrogance, and refusal to acknowledge the authority of his lawful sovereign, resolved to retire out of the kingdom, and accordingly desired leave of William to go to Rome. This request the king at first denied; but at length, being glad to get rid of so troublesome a subject, he gave his consent: however, not to let him go off without some farther marks of his displeasure, he sent an officer to him, who overtaking him just as he was going to sail, ransacked his baggage, and took away all the money he could find, pretending that it was against the law to carry the coin out of the kingdom. This, it must be owned, was rather a low revenge in William, who had already sufficiently shewn this haughty prelate that he was well able to maintain the sovereign authority against any encroachment of the church of Rome or her ambitious adherents.

After Anselm's departure, the king seized upon the temporalities of his archbishopric, and kept them as long as he lived; a step sufficient to damn his fame everlastingly with the priesthood, who accordingly have not failed to pay off the score with every invective that can blacken the memory of a man and a king.

As for the pious archbishop, he repaired to Rome, where he exerted all his efforts to stir up the pope to excommunicate the king, and lay the English nation under an interdict: a charitable and truly Christian attempt! in which, however, the success fell far short of his expectations; and at length finding that Urban did not care to espouse his quarrel, he retired to a monastery at Lyons, where he remained till William's death.

It may appear somewhat surprizing that Urban should so totally neglect a person who had sacrificed every thing for his quarrel; and still more so, that he should pass by so favourable an opportunity of asserting the authority of the Romish see, in opposition to William and the clergy who sided with the king against the archbishop; but this surprize will cease, when we consider that Urban II. was just then at the point of disclosing the grand design which he had for some time conceived, I mean the famous crusade, or holy war, which, as it affects the history of England, and was productive of great consequences with regard to this nation, must not be omitted here.

This most extraordinary expedition was first stirred up by a pilgrim of Amiens, then known only by the name of Coucoupetre, or Cucupietre, as we are told by the daughter of the emperor Comnenus*, who saw this hermit at Constantinople; he is known to us by the name of Peter the Hermit. However, this man, who was a native of Picardy, and had all the obstinacy of his countrymen, was so incensed at the exactions which he had met with at Jerusalem, whither he had gone on a pilgrimage, that he talked of them at his return to Rome in such strong terms, and painted them forth in so striking a light, that Pope Urban II. thought him the most proper person he could pitch on to second the grand design which the popes had a long time conceived of arming Christendom against the Mahomedans. Accordingly he dispatched Peter through all the provinces, to communicate, by the force of his strong imagination, the warmth of his sentiments, and to sow the seeds of enthusiasm.

Urban II. at length held a council, in the year 1094, in the open fields near Placentia, at which were present upwards of thirty thousand seculars, besides ecclesiastics. This council was to deliberate on the most proper methods for avenging the cause of Christianity on the Infidels. The project of carrying the war into Palestine was universally applauded by the members of the council, but none of them chose to engage in it, having as much business on their hands in regard to their own private interests as they could well manage. Urban, therefore, found it necessary to call another council the ensuing year, at Clermont in Auvergne, where he made a speech in the market-place, representing the great power of the Saracens, and how destructive it was to Christianity, with the merit that would attend a general attempt among all Christians to humble them. This speech, exactly set to the meridian of the humour of those times, had a wonderful effect upon the hearers; and, to clench his argument, the artful pontiff concluded with a promise of remission of all their sins, who should engage in this holy expedition, and to open to them the gates of heaven, only imposing upon them as a penance the indulging of their favourite passion for war and plunder. Upon this they strove who should be foremost to enlist under the sacred banner of religion. They assumed the badge and name of (Croisés, i. e. the Crossed, or) Crusaders, having a red cross sewed or embroidered upon their cloaths, and worn upon the right shoulder: their motto was, VOLONTE DE DIEU, or, "It is God's will." The spoils were to be divided according to the rank and expences of the crusaders; this occasioned some disputes, but at the same time it proved a powerful motive to proceed, and religion, avarice, and restlessness all concurred to spur on the adventurers. This crowd of crusaders was to rendezvous at Constantinople: monks, women, merchants, victuallers, mechanics, all set out, imagining that they should find the roads lined with Christians, ready to gain indulgences by furnishing them with subsistence. Upwards of eighty thousand of these vagabonds assembled under the standard of Coucoupetre, or Peter the Hermit, who himself walked bare-footed at the head of this fanatical army, with a rope tied round his waist: a new species of vanity! But to come nearer home.

Urban having taken care to have his doctrine industriously propagated throughout all Europe, a prodigious number of princes were instigated, by his promises, to engage in the pious enterprize, and among the rest Robert, duke of Normandy was extremely desirous of having a part in this war, which made such a noise in the world. But money was wanting to enable him to make a figure equal to the rest of the adventurers of his rank*; and as his finances were too low to defray the expences he must necessarily be at, he mortgaged his duchy to his brother William, for three years, for ten thousand marks†.

Rufus gladly embraced the proposal, as he looked upon a mortgage on such terms as next to property itself; but the grand difficulty was how to raise the money. His subjects, both Norman and English, he had already fleeced to the utmost they could be supposed to bear, and therefore he clearly saw that there was nothing to be done by the way of taxation. At length he applied for a loan to the richest of his subjects; and the monied men, not willing to run the hazard of losing all by refusing a part, complied, though not without great reluctance. The good churchmen set up the usual plea of poverty; but being given to understand that this would not avail them when the laity came into the proposal, they, to preserve the appearance of truth to their assertions, melted down the gold and silver ornaments of their churches. When what could be got together of ready specie and bullion was collected, there was still found a considerable deficiency, to supply which a tax of four shillings was laid upon every hide of land throughout the kingdom, from which not even the ecclesiastics themselves were exempted.

William having at length raised the sum required, took possession of Normandy, and Robert set out on the crusade, in the course of which he distinguished himself above all the other princes that embarked in the expedition, by his courage and conduct. Rufus thinking this new acquisition of territory made him a match for the French king, made a demand of all the French Vexin‡, together with Pontoise, Chaumont, and Mante, as appurtenances to the duchy of Normandy. Philip's refusal of this demand occasioned a war between the two princes, which lasted the space of a year, without any remarkable occurrence.

Having kept his Christmas in Normandy, William, in the spring of 1097, arrived in England; where the first thing he did was to call a court, or parliament, at Windsor, to consult on the most proper measures for reducing the Welsh, who, about this time, had made several incursions, and committed great ravages on the borders, under one Cadogan ap Blethyn, whom they had chosen for their principal leader. These depredations so incensed the king, that he formed a resolution to extirpate all the males of that nation: and with this view he raised a prodigious army, with which he thought to make the entire conquest of the country. But this honour was reserved for another; for the Welsh, finding themselves an unequal match for Rufus, betook themselves to their mountains, carrying with them every thing upon which the king's troops could subsist; who, by this precaution of the enemy, were driven to great distress, insomuch that although William, by the means of some deserters, had made himself master of the passes, yet his men daily perishing with hunger, he found himself obliged, sore against his will, to retire ingloriously home, about the end of July.

In this year, likewise, a new revolution which had happened in Scotland, by the usurpation of Donald Bane, who had been driven out of that kingdom, made him determine to send an army thither, in support of Edgar, the eldest son of Malcolm,

* The heads of the crusaders were Hugh, brother to Philip king of France; Godfrey of Boulogne; Raymond, count of Toulouse; Robert, earl of Flanders; Baldwin, earl of Hainault; Bohemond, prince of Tarentum, and Tancred his nephew.

† Robert was not the only one who had recourse to this expedient, which folly dictated, and knavery took the advantage of; for Godfrey of Boulogne sold his estate of Boulogne to the chapter of Liege, and Stenay to the bishop of Verdun; and

Baldwin, this Godfrey's brother, sold to the same bishop the few possessions he had in that country: and then the churches and religious orders purchased, for a trifling consideration, many of the estates of the lords, who supposed they should want only a very little money and their own arms to conquer kingdoms in Asia.

the late king: and on this occasion he permitted Edgar Atheling to raise a body of troops to effect the restoration of his nephew young Edgar. By the help of this army Atheling defeated the usurper, and placed his nephew on the throne of his ancestors. Rufus himself had thoughts of heading this expedition in person, but was prevented by the revolt of the Mançeaux, which obliged him to pass over the sea, and lay siege to Maine, the capital of that province.

During William's absence, Wales was again exposed to a most dreadful calamity, through the treachery of one of their own nobles. Owen, a Welsh lord, father-in-law to Griffith ap Conan, and Cadogan, kings of Wales, having conceived some dislike to his sons-in-law, privately invited the earls of Chester and Shrewsbury into his country, promising them a great booty. The two earls, having levied some troops, were received by Owen into Wales, where they committed unspeakable cruelties. The two kings, being thus surprized, were forced to fly over to Ireland for refuge, and leave the country to the mercy of the English, who, continuing their progress, made themselves masters of the Isle of Anglesey, which they laid waste with fire and sword. Whilst they were exercising these cruelties, Magnus, a Norwegian pirate*, being at sea with a small squadron of ships, in quest of booty, made a sudden descent upon the Isle of Anglesey; and the earl of Shrewsbury, attempting to oppose him with his forces, was himself slain, and his people put to the rout; and the pirate carried off all the spoil that the English had amassed in their late ravages.

England at this time (A. D. 1098.) suffered greatly by scarcity and inclement seasons. A bridge had some years before been built over the Thames, but being of a slight structure, had been washed away by the violence of the floods; William therefore gave orders for building a new one in the same place where London-bridge now stands, in so durable a manner as not to be subject to the like accidents for the future: this cost an immense sum, which was raised by a tax upon the people, who, from the dearth which prevailed, were ill able to bear fresh impositions. About this time likewise Westminster-hall was built, and remained till the days of Richard II. a noble monument of William's idea of grandeur and taste for architecture, it being the finest Gothic room in the world†. He likewise gave another instance of his magnificence, in surrounding the tower of London with new walls. These great works were, however, very badly timed; and although they adorned the kingdom, they impoverished the subject.

Rufus spent the year 1098 entirely in Normandy, in reducing to his obedience the city of Mans and the province of Maine. This business finished, he returned, a little before Whitsuntide, in the year 1099, to England, and kept the holidays in a sumptuous manner in his new-built hall at Westminster: after which he went into Hampshire, in order to indulge his favourite pastime of hunting, in the New Forest. As he was thus amusing himself one day, a messenger came in great haste, and told him that the city of Mans was beleaguered by Henry, count of la Fleche, and that the castle could not possibly hold out, unless it was immediately relieved. "Ha! (replied William, sternly) is it so? Haste thee then back, and tell the besieged, that I will be with them in eight days time. They may depend upon it, and therefore let them continue to defend the place like men." And turning about to his attendants, he asked whereabouts the castle of Mans stood from the place where he then was: being shewn, he turned his horse's head, and calling with a loud voice to those that were about him, "Let him that loves me follow me," he rode directly for the sea-side. Dartmouth was the next sea-port town; being arrived there, they found an old vessel, on board which he embarked with his attendants, in spite of all their entreaties, who pressed him to wait till suitable provisions were made for his voyage and enterprize, and the remonstrances of the master of the vessel, who declared, that, on account of the roughness of the sea, and the tempestuousness of the weather, he could not set sail without almost unavoidable destruction. William, who never could brook delay in any scheme he had once conceived, chid the fellow for his fears, saying, "Didst thou ever hear of a king's being drowned?" and made him instantly weigh anchor: the next morning they arrived safe at Barfleur, from whence he posted to Bonneville, where he assembled his forces, and marched to the relief of the garrison in le Mans.

The enemy, surprized at this unparalleled dispatch, raised the siege, after a few skirmishes, and made a precipitate retreat, in which Hely was taken prisoner. Being brought into the king's presence, William behaved to him with an air of triumph bordering upon insult, which so nettled the count, that he fiercely told him, "That he had but little cause for triumph, since he had taken him unawares; but if he was at liberty again, it would not be found so easy a matter to overcome him in a fair contest." This speech roused all the warrior in the soul of William, who instantly ordered his captive to be set at liberty, bidding him be gone, and do his worst; "and by St. Luke's face (added he) if thou hast the good fortune to conquer me, I will not ask the smallest return at thy hands for the freedom I now confer on thee." This act undoubtedly shews William to have been a person of great magnanimity: and though some will have it, that herein he only followed a similar instance of generosity recorded of Julius Cæsar, by Lucan; yet, as Malmesbury, with no less truth than elegance, observes, William was too much taken up, in the course of his life, with military matters, to have had leisure for the study of letters, consequently this seems to have been the pure effect of his own generous disposition.

This year was distinguished by the taking of Jerusalem by the crusaders, who, on the reduction of that city, made an offer of the sovereignty of the country to Robert, duke of Normandy, who, for certain reasons, variously represented, refused it: but it appears most probable that this refusal arose from the expectations he had of succeeding

* Rapin, in his History, calls him king of Norway.

† This noble structure is computed to be two hundred and seventy feet long, and seventy-four feet broad. But how spacious soever this hall might appear, William, at his return from Normandy, found fault with its being so small, saying, it was scarce fit to be a bed-chamber, in comparison of the pile he meant to erect. And Stow tells us, that a diligent searcher might yet find the foundations of the hall which he had proposed to build, reaching from the Thames-side as far as the common highway.

to the crown of England after the death of his brother Rufus. Be that as it might, his declining this honour was attended with fatal consequences to his interest ever after; and that dignity was conferred on Godfrey of Boulogne, whose bravery had contributed not a little towards the success of the expedition.

In the year 1100, the rage of crusading having seized upon most of the princes in Europe, William, who heartily laughed at these follies, found another opportunity of aggrandizing himself, by extending his possessions on the continent; for William, earl of Poitou, who was infected with the common malady, offered to mortgage his duchy of Aquitaine, and his other possessions, for a sum sufficient to enable him to become an adventurer. These dominions lay extremely convenient for Rufus; and as he had been hoarding immense sums, while his brother potentates had been exhausting their treasures in this enthusiastic expedition, he gladly accepted of the earl's proposal, and agreed to pay down the sum demanded, on condition that he should be immediately put in possession of the estates. The bargain being made, a great army was raised, and a mighty fleet fitted out from England, in which the king in person was to carry over the money, and take possession of the mortgaged territories.

Whilst these preparations for his voyage were making, he daily amused himself with the diversion of stag-hunting in the New Forest, where an unforeseen death put an end to all his mighty projects, in the following dark and doubtful manner*.

Sir Walter Tyrrel, a French knight, a native of Pontoise, drawn by the fame of the king's bounty, had lately come over to his court; and having the reputation of an excellent archer, William took him out to hunt with him in the forest; and a priest bringing him six arrows, he gave two of them to Tyrrel, who kept close by him all the day. Towards sun-set the king found himself alone with Walter, and at a distance from all his other attendants; upon which he alighted to wait their coming up, when a stag rushing out of a thicket, and passing close by the king, he snatched up his bow and let fly an arrow at the beast, which wounded him slightly; whereupon William mounting his horse followed him in hope of seeing him fall: as the sun shone full in his face, he held up his hands before his eyes, and remained some time in that posture looking at the wounded deer, when another starting from a covert, and crossing the path between Tyrrel and the king, the former let fly an arrow, which, either glancing from a tree or striking the horns of the stag, struck the king full in the breast, and piercing his heart, he instantly fell down dead without uttering a word. Upon seeing the fatal accident, of which he had been the innocent cause, Tyrrel galloped away to the sea-side, unheeded in the confusion occasioned among the attendants, who were now come up, and who beheld their monarch speechless and weltering in his gore; and getting over to Normandy, he from thence retired to France.

William's corpse underwent the same fate as that of his father had done; it was abandoned by every one, but some countrymen passing by, and seeing it lie in the forest, put it into a cart, and carried it to Winchester, where it was buried the next day, in the cathedral, without any funeral pomp, or the lamentations of any of his subjects.

Such is the common relation of this prince's death: and although it may be of no consequence to posterity to know the direct manner in which he came by his end, yet, as the fact concerns the memory of a person who is looked upon as the common ancestor of all that numerous family, both in England and Ireland, of the same name, I hope it will not be deemed impertinent if I dwell a little longer on it.

William of Malmesbury, Florence of Worcester, and Simeon of Durham, authors of the best credit, who flourished and wrote their histories within less than forty years after this accident, seem all to agree, not only in the time and place, but fix upon Tyrrel as the person from whom the king received his death. Yet there are also authors of that very age, and of unquestionable credit, who are not only doubtful whether it happened by chance or design, but some of them positively deny that Tyrrel had any hand in it. Eadmer, in speaking of it cursorily, only says, "that whether the arrow was shot at the king, or (as most affirm) flew him by his stumbling and falling down upon it, were needless to enquire, it being sufficient to understand that, which way soever it happened, it was by the just judgment of God, who thus revenged thousands of oppressed people, who had been deprived of their habitations and all means of subsistence, to make this a place of pastime for the late king his father." Dr. Brady, without sufficient authority, cruelly endeavours to raise a suspicion that Tyrrel killed the king designedly. Sugar, abbot of St. Denis, in France, and a contemporary and a companion of Tyrrel, furnishes us with a remarkable anecdote, in his Life of Louis le Gros, or the Fat, which entirely exculpates his friend; "William Rufus's death (says our author) was laid by some upon a noble person named Walter Tyrrel, who, they say, shot him through the body with an arrow; whereas we have often heard him affirm upon oath, when he had no occasion either to hope or fear, "That he neither came that day into that part or side of the forest where the king hunted, NOR EVER SAW HIM THERE†." And here we beg leave to observe, that Tyrrel, after his escape, lived in France unquestioned and unpunished.

Thus fell William Rufus, on the second of August, A.D. 1100, in the forty-fourth year of his age, after a reign of twelve years, ten months, and twenty days. In his person he was of a middle stature, but appeared shorter than he was, by reason he was very fat: he had a florid complexion; his hair yellow, inclined to red; one of his eyes was spotted, which made it look unlike the other. In bodily strength he exceeded most men of his time; his manner of speaking was ungraceful and

* It is reported, that the morning before this catastrophe, as William was taking horse, he was dissuaded from following the chase by Fitzhamon, on account of an odd dream a monk had told him that morning, which seemed to presage his death. Rufus, who paid little regard to superstitious opinions, smiled at the simplicity of his attendant, and ordered him to give the monk a hundred shillings for his dream, saying, "The poor fellow is a monk, and, like a true one, has dreamt purely to get something: give him a hundred shillings for his dream, that he may not have dreamt for nothing."

stammering. His countenance was severe, and his voice strong, which he would frequently exalt in order to intimidate those to whom he was speaking; though it is said he was remarkably affable in private conversation among his courtiers.

As to his character; while we praise his courage, which was such that he thought it a stain on his honour if, on any warlike occasion, he was not the first who had a sword in his hand, or gave place to the meanest of his subjects in the time of danger; while we admire his magnanimity, which displayed itself, on many occasions, in a manner becoming the greatest of kings; while we record him as the professed patron of men of merit of all professions and degrees, to whom his court was always open, and whom he always encouraged according to their merits and abilities; while we acknowledge him generous even to a degree of profusion, in loading his soldiers with favours, and never laying a tax without a view of bestowing part of it upon them for their services: in a word, while we cannot deny that he had the highest ideas of grandeur, and a noble contempt for the fopperies of religion and disregard for superstitious opinions, and an extraordinary genius for architecture, equally useful as magnificent; while we subscribe to all these good qualifications, I say, it is to be wished that truth, which ever ought to guide the historian's pen, would permit us to cast a veil over his failings, instead of compelling us to own that every virtue was in him contrasted with its opposite vice; that his behaviour towards the English manifested his ingratitude, and shews him to have had no regard to his word or oath; that he made no scruple of violating the most sacred repositories of religious wealth to compass his ends, or gratify his avarice; that he oppressed his people in every form of tyranny and insult; that he made a scoff of God and religion; that he affected a ridiculous parade in regard to trifles about his own person; that he was haughty, passionate, rapacious, and dissolute: in a word, that the few actions of his life worthy commendation, were totally obscured by deeds that would have deservedly consigned a private person to the most ignominious punishment the insulted laws could inflict, and which when found in a king transmit his memory with never-dying odium to posterity.

The ordinary revenues of this king were probably the same with his father's; but as he ran into many more needless expences, he increased them oftentimes by extraordinary impositions and taxes, which were very frequent in his reign. To those he added the profits of the vacant fees, which brought him in very large sums: at the time of his death he was possessed of the archbishopric of Canterbury, the sees of Winchester and Salisbury, twelve rich abbies, and a great number of other smaller benefices; and therefore we cannot wonder to find the monks amongst the number of his most virulent accusers. By them we are told, that after having retained vacant benefices for several years, he set them up for sale to the highest bidders: however, it is related, that upon an occasion of this kind, when two priests were bidding against each other, he perceived a third who stood silent; and asking what he would give for the living in question, the man replied, that he had nothing to give, or if he had, that his conscience would not allow him to be guilty of so flagrant an act of simony. The king, pleased with the honest boldness of his reply, swore by St. Luke's face that he was the most honest of the three, and should have it for nothing.

Having thus considered this prince on all sides, I shall here close his history with an account of the remarkable occurrences which happened during his reign: a method that has been adopted by some of our best historians, and which we shall continue to observe through the course of this work, as often as any such are found worthy the notice of the curious or philosophic reader.

In the second year of Rufus's reign there happened a dreadful earthquake throughout the whole kingdom, which was followed by a great scarcity of fruit, and so late a harvest that corn was not full ripe at the end of November.

On the fifth of October, in the year 1091, there fell a violent storm in several parts of England, especially at Winchelscomb, in Gloucestershire, where the steeple of the church was thrown down by thunder and lightning, and the crucifix, with the image of the Virgin Mary, was broken to pieces. The hurricane was followed by a noisome stench in the air. Holingshed.

Sir John Hayward adds, that there was also a thick smoke that darkened the sky.

On the seventeenth of the same month there happened a storm of wind, which was then south-west, the same point from which it blew in that tempest, so dreadful to the nation, in the reign of queen Anne; and yet this we are about to mention, seems to have been more fatal in the city of London, where it threw down above five hundred houses, and blew off the roof of Bow church, in Cheapside, by the fall of which two men were killed: the top of the steeple at Salisbury, and many houses there were blown down. Holingshed.

Sir John Hayward says it threw down six hundred and six houses in London, and that some beams of Bow church, twenty-eight feet long, were driven so deep in the ground by it, that not above four feet remained in sight. The Tower of London also received much damage. He farther adds, the next year, Osmund, bishop of Salisbury, finished the cathedral church of Old Sarum, and the steeple was fired by lightning the fifth day after the consecration of the church: which perhaps gave occasion to Holingshed's saying that the damage was done to Salisbury church at the same time that the roof of Bow church was blown off.

The year 1094 was very remarkable for so great mortality of men and beasts, in England and Normandy, that the ground lay untilld in many places, which caused a severe dearth. Ghastly and hideous sights were seen in England, as hosts of men fighting in the air, stars falling from heaven, and other such wonders. The ignorance and superstition of those ages have, we suppose, heightened the terror of the usual accidents in the phenomena of nature.

HENRY I. furnamed BEAUCLERC. A. D. 1100.

ON the death of William Rufus, the crown of England undoubtedly devolved by right to Robert, duke of Normandy; for although this prince was never declared successor by his father to the kingdom of England, yet it is certain that he was declared eventually so by the peace of Rouen; and it is positively asserted by the best historians, that Henry himself had taken an oath to him as heir apparent, agreeable to the established customs of those times, and of which this very reign produced an instance; for all free men of England and Normandy, of what order and dignity soever, and of whatsoever lord they held or were feudatories to, were forced so to do homage and swear fealty to his son William, though then not above twelve years of age: add to all this the high degree of estimation in which Robert stood at this time, not only with the English nation, but almost with all Europe, on account of the matchless valour and conduct he exhibited during his taking part in the expedition against the Infidels, and for that noble disinterestedness he shewed in refusing the crown of Palestine when offered to him, being satisfied with having fulfilled his vow in assisting to reduce the another-city of the Christian world; so that there is no room to doubt, that, had he been present at the demise of his brother William, he would have succeeded, with little if any opposition, to the English crown; but, unhappily, his passion for knight-errantry lost him that throne to which he had a natural right, after he had so nobly refused one which he had merited by his great actions; for instead of returning home immediately after the reduction of Jerusalem, he loitered by the way in Apulia, where he married Sibylla, daughter of William count of Conversana, a lady renowned for her beauty and qualifications; and while he was indulging himself in the enjoyment of his fair bride, he lost an opportunity which never after occurred. His friends here hardly knowing where he was, did not dare bestir themselves; besides, that slothfulness and negligence, of which he had given but too many instances, and the great charge he had been at in making this voyage, made them apprehensive that at his return he would be in no condition to support those who should make an effort in his favour, nor to dispute the crown with his brother.

Henry, on hearing of the accident that had befallen his brother William, posted immediately to Winchester, where the royal treasures were kept, in order to make himself master of them; but William de Bretueil, a Norman nobleman, and eldest son to William Fitzosbern, the favourite companion and general of the Conqueror, who was keeper of the treasury, flatly refused to give Henry admittance, pleading in excuse, that as he had sworn fealty to Robert, who had the right of primogeniture, he looked upon himself as much bound in duty to own him for his liege lord, as if he was personally present; intimating at the same time, that this demand of Henry carried with it strong marks of a treacherous design. The altercation was on the point of becoming very serious, and might have had fatal consequences, had not Robert de Meulant arrived in a lucky minute with a number of the late king's attendants, and declared in favour of Henry, obliging Bretueil to deliver up to him the treasures, the possession of which was to him almost as desirable an object as the crown itself.

Having now a sufficient fund to reward the services of those who should espouse his cause, he soon found his party considerably increased; and in less than four days after his brother's death, his friends having assembled a council in London, of the principal nobility that could be gotten together at so short a warning, Henry was, by the majority of voices, declared king; and the ceremony of his coronation was performed the following day (Sunday, August 5), by Maurice, bishop of London, who had been one of the first William's chaplains. And thus, by a most surprising and unparalleled dispatch (if not previously concerted) a total revolution was brought about in the affairs of the nation: a king in the flower of his age, and in the zenith of his power, was cut off by an instantaneous death, the cause of which was never judicially enquired into; the true succession was set aside, the treasures of the kingdom seized by a person who had not the least claim to them; and all this in less time than is commonly taken up to deliberate upon affairs of the most private concern.

As the coronation-oath had been, in many instances, violated by the late king, Henry thought he could not do a more acceptable act in the eyes of the whole nation, than in shewing a readiness and intention to secure their liberties to them; accordingly he caused a charter to be published and proclaimed, as soon as the ceremony of his coronation was over, which he ordered to be made out under his great seal, and which, on account of its importance, and being the basis on which the people afterwards obtained many advantageous grants from succeeding kings, I shall here set down, as it is to be found in bishop Wilkins.

I. HENRY'S Charter to all his faithful Subjects.

“ Henry, by the grace of God, king of the English, to all his barons and faithful subjects, both French and English, greeting.

“ Know ye, that by the mercy of God, and by the common counsel [with the assent*] of the barons of the kingdom of England, I am crowned king of the said kingdom; and because the kingdom hath been oppressed by unjust exactions, I, from the love of God, and the regard I bear you [all], in the first place, free the holy church, so as that I will neither sell nor farm out, nor, upon the death of an archbishop, bishop, or abbot, will I accept any of the church's property, nor aught from any of its tenants, until a successor enters upon the same. And I banish all the evil usages with which all the kingdom of England has been [unjustly] oppressed; part of which evil usages I here set down.

* This important word is wanting in one copy of this charter in the Red Book of the Exchequer, and interlined in another; it is likewise wanting in both copies exhibited by Matthew Paris.

"If any of my barons, earls, or of my tenants, holding of me, shall die, his heir shall not be obliged to redeem his land, as was the custom in the days of my brother, but shall relieve the same by a just and lawful relief*. In like manner shall the tenants of my barons relieve their lands from their lords by a lawful [certain] and just relief.

"And if any of my barons, or other my subjects, have a mind to give a [their] daughter in marriage, or sister, or niece, let him treat with me; but I will neither accept any part of his fortune for such licence, nor will I prohibit his disposing of her, unless it be to my enemy. And if any of my barons, or other my subjects, should, at his death, leave a daughter his heir, I will dispose of her with the advice of my barons, together with her lands. And if, upon the death of her husband, a wife shall survive without children, she shall have her [own] dower and marriage-portion; neither will I give her to a husband but with her own consent: but if the wife be left with children, she shall then have her dower and marriage-portion, nor will I give her to a husband but with her own consent, provided the wife shall keep her body in chastity, and either the wife, or some other relation, who is to deal justly, shall be guardian of the children and of the estate. And I command my barons that they act conformably hereunto towards the sons, daughters, and wives of their tenants.

"The common mintage money† which was taken throughout cities and counties, and was not in use under king Edward, I absolutely forbid to be taken for the future. If any minter, or other person, be taken with false money, let right justice be done upon him.

"All fines‡ and debts due to my brother I forgive, excepting my just farms, and those bargains which concerned the inheritance of others, or for those effects which justly concerned other persons: and I forgive all bargains which any man has made with regard to his right of inheritance.

"And if any [of my barons or tenants] shall lie ill, so that he dispose of, or give his money, I will that such disposition stand good; but if he, prevented by war or sickness, shall not give or dispose of his effects, let his wife, children, or parents, or his lawful tenants, divide it among themselves as shall seem best to them.

"If any of my barons or tenants forfeit, he shall not give a pledge for favour of the [whole] fine, as he did in the time of my father or brother; but according to the measure of the forfeit so shall he be fined, in such manner as fines were laid on under those my predecessors who reigned before my father and brother: but if he shall be convicted of treason, or wickedness, let him make satisfaction as shall seem just."

II. Concerning the Confirmation of King EDWARD'S LAWS.

"I do hereby pardon all murders committed before my coronation; and those which shall be committed hereafter shall be satisfied for, according to the law of king Edward.

"I have, by common consent of my barons, retained to myself the forests, in like manner as my father held them.

"I grant, of my own free gift, to my knights (i. e. tenants by knights service), who defend their lands by their habergeons||, that their demesne lands shall be free from all unjust guilds, or taxes, and all works; [that their fidelity may be in proportion to my kindness] that since they are eased of so great a burthen, they may the better provide themselves with horses and arms, and so be made fitter and more ready for my service, and for the defence of the kingdom.

"I restore to you the laws of king Edward, together with these amendments, made by the advice of my barons.

"If any one has taken any thing from me, or from any other person, he shall forthwith restore the same, without making satisfaction; and he upon whom any such thing is found, shall make strict satisfaction to the owner.

"Given in presence of the archbishops, bishops, barons, earls, sheriffs, and nobles of all the kingdom of England, on the day of my coronation."

N. B. The words inclosed within brackets, thus [], are the supplements taken from Matt. Paris, the Red Book of the Exchequer, the Rochester copy, and others.

There were as many copies of this charter as there were counties, and one of them was lodged in the most eminent abbies in each county; nevertheless, there was scarce one to be found in the reign of king John, whose Magna Charta was founded upon it. There is a copy at this day in the Red Book of the Exchequer, and Matthew Paris has given us a transcript of that which was sent into Herefordshire, which has been translated by Mr. Tyrrel.

Henry followed this popular act with another equally calculated to win the affections of the people, and give them a good opinion of his sincerity and intention to observe what he had promised by his coronation-oath; for immediately after publishing the edict above-mentioned, he issued a very severe one against all offenders in general, but particularly against adulterers. As for those who abused their power by oppressing the people, he ordered them to be put to death without mercy: some great men who were notorious for having used their authority in an illegal manner, were driven from court; and Ranulph or Ralph Flambard, bishop of Durham, the detested minister of the late king, was thrown into prison. No measure could have endeared Henry more to the nation, who looked upon this prelate as the instrument of all the exactions with which it had been burthened in the preceding reign. If these proceedings caused the English to have a good opinion of the new king and his government, what he did soon after was no less acceptable to them, I mean the restoring to them the use of fire and candle, by abolishing the curfew-bell, that had been instituted by his father William I. This public favour was followed by another of a more particular tendency: the citizens of London having been greatly instrumental in putting the crown upon his head, by giving their voices for his election, he resolved to bestow on them a distinguished mark of his acknowledgement and regard by granting them a new charter, containing very ample privileges. This is still preserved under seal in the archives of Guildhall, recited by *Inspeximus, and confirmed by the charters of succeeding kings, particularly king Charles the Second, and published by sir Roger Twyſden, in his additions to Lambard's Archæologia.

By this charter Henry granted to the citizens of London, and their heirs male, the farm of Middlesex at three pounds a year, and the power of chusing one of their own body, whomsoever they pleased, as well for sheriff as for their justiciary, to hold pleas of the crown, within the walls of this city; all other justiciaries being expressly prohibited from exercising any authority over the citizens, or forcing them to plead without the walls of the city, in any case whatsoever. The citizens were likewise exempted from scot, danegelt, trials by combat, lodging the king's retinue, and the pecuniary mulcts for murder, to which other towns as well as hundreds were subject. Besides which, both the citizens and their goods were declared free from toll, passage, lastage, and all other customs throughout England. No Londoner was to be fined or amerced beyond his Were, which was an hundred shillings; and as to debts, the citizens might recover them by suits within the city, and make good their titles to lands by city customs. The privileges of the court of hustings, which sat every Monday, as well as those of their wardmotes and common-halls, were confirmed; together with their ancient right of hunting in Middlesex, Surry, and the Woodlands on the edge of Buckinghamshire and Hertfordshire, called the Chiltren.

These just and mild beginnings gave the English great hopes that they should taste the sweets of ease and liberty under the rule of a prince, who had commenced his reign with acts of such a favourable tendency: nevertheless they still wished for one thing more, which was the recall of Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, who had rendered himself exceedingly popular by the vigorous opposition he had shewn to the measures taken by the late king to curb the power of the clergy, which, in those days of superstition and darkness, were looked upon as little less than sacrilegious. Here too Henry fell in with the humour of his subjects, and, in order to gratify them as much as possible, he wrote a letter with his own hand to Anselm, who was then at Lyons, inviting him, in the most affectionate and cordial manner, to come over to England and take possession of his see, of which he had been so long deprived.

The truth of the matter is, that Henry stood in need of Anselm's advice and assistance towards the effecting a design which he had conceived of marrying Matilda, daughter of Malcolm, king of Scots, by Margaret the sister of Edgar Atheling.

This young lady had ever since her father's death resided in England, and had been educated in the monastery of Wilton, where she had put on the veil. It is true, she alleged that she had not vowed virginity, but had only made use of this expedient as a safeguard to her honour during the troublesome times when William I. took possession of the English crown; however, as it was known to all the world that Matilda had lived as a reputed nun, neither Henry, nor Edgar king of Scotland, of whom the English monarch had demanded his sister in marriage, chose to take any further steps in an affair which appeared so delicate, till it had first received the sanction of a general council. It was this consideration then that chiefly prompted Henry to send the invitation already mentioned to Anselm.

That prelate no sooner received the agreeable summons than he set out for England on the wings of ambitious expectation, and landed at Dover on the twenty-third of September. Immediately on his arrival, the affair of the king's marriage with Matilda, together with all the circumstances relating to that princess's having taken the veil, were laid before Anselm for his decision; but he would do nothing of himself therein. A synod was then convened at Lambeth, and the archdeacons of Canterbury and Salisbury were sent, with a true state of the young lady's case, as given in by herself, to the monastery of Wilton, where she had resided, there to enquire into the truth of her allegations, and then to make a report to the synod; which was accordingly done, and the report appeared so favourable for the lady, that she was declared liberated from her monastic state, which she had assumed only from the exigence of circumstances, and adjudged free to marry. This opinion of the assembly was confirmed by the archbishop, who himself performed the ceremony of the marriage, about the middle of November, A. D. 1100. to the infinite satisfaction of the people, to whom this alliance could not but be very grateful, especially the old English party, who looked upon their new queen with eyes of love and regard, as the only remains of the Cerdic race, from whom they hoped to see a renewal of the ancient Saxon line on the throne of this kingdom.

During these transactions duke Robert had returned from abroad, and taken possession of his dominions in Normandy without opposition, notwithstanding the mortgage of them which he had granted to the late king; Henry not thinking it politic to have any dispute with his brother on that head, at a time when he himself expected to have his right to the English crown called in question. But Robert, far from thinking himself obliged by this forbearance, openly shewed his discontent in having been supplanted in his birth-right, and resolved to attempt the recovery of what he had been deprived of, during his absence, exclaiming at the same time, with great justice, of the violation of the compromise so solemnly made between him and William at the peace of Rouen, by which the survivor was to succeed to the other's dominions.

Robert was not a little encouraged in the resolution he had taken to do himself justice by the arrival of Ralph, bishop of Durham, who had made his escape out of the Tower by letting himself down with a rope, brought him in a tub of water.

* Letters patent, so called because they began, after the king's title, with this word, Inspeximus.

The bishop was received with all imaginable marks of respect by Robert, who entrusted him with the management of his intended expedition against England. And now having received advice that Robert de Belleme, earl of Shrewsbury, with his two brothers Roger and Arnulph, Robert Mallet, Ivo de Grentesmevil, Robert de Pontefract son of Robert Lisois or Lacy, William de Warren, earl of Surry, and several other Norman and English noblemen of great property and influence, were ready to declare openly for him, as soon as he should set foot on English ground, he began to make preparations for invading this kingdom; and about Whitsuntide, A. D. 1101, publicly declared his intention of asserting his right to the crown of England.

On this occasion Henry found it necessary to exert all his abilities to counteract his brother's interest, which was every day growing stronger in the kingdom; and a misunderstanding which had, about this time, broken out between Henry and archbishop Anselm, on the subject of investitures, seemed not a little favourable to Robert's affairs; for the people, who were always ready to side with the clergy, who had gained a total empire over their minds, began to look with an evil eye upon Henry for the endeavours he used to support the royal prerogative against the encroachments of the church: in fine, a general discontent at this time took possession of all minds, and the nation was split into different factions.

Henry perceiving that his subjects fluctuated in their obedience, thought it most prudent to make up matters with Anselm, and to engage him to act as mediator between him and his people. Anselm, on his side, fearing that if he carried the contest with his sovereign to too great a length, he should find himself the loser in the end, readily struck in with the proposed accommodation, and set heartily about assisting Henry, who had faithfully promised to be a generous and affectionate patron to the church, and also declared himself ready to grant the people all the security they could desire for the preservation of their liberties, and a due observation of their rights and privileges, on the side of the crown. The archbishop either was, or affected to appear, so fully convinced of the sincerity of the king's intentions, that, in a solemn meeting of the states of the kingdom, he offered to become surety for the king, plighting his faith that he would, in all matters, religious and civil, rule agreeable to the laws of equity and justice.

This intervention of Anselm's proved extremely favourable to the king's affairs, and fixed the English in Henry's interest, who declared themselves ready to stand by him with their lives and fortunes. And here truth obliges us to declare, that the archbishop at that time kept the crown on Henry's head. But notwithstanding these fair promises of attachment and fidelity on the part of the nobles, it was no sooner known for certain that Robert was on the point of embarking, than the majority of the lords, and a part of the fleet, declared for him.

Robert, laying hold of this seasonable defection, put to sea with a fine fleet, and landed at Portsmouth, about Midsummer, 1101. Immediately upon the news of his debarkation, Henry, who had a strong army posted at Pevensey, on the Suffex coast, advanced to intercept him in his march to London, and prevent him from being joined by such of his adherents as had already shewed themselves inclinable to espouse his cause. Nothing could at this time have kept up the drooping spirits of Henry but the fidelity and steadiness of Anselm, who attended him step by step, and, with unwearied assiduity, harangued, flattered, and threatened by turns those of whose attachment he was most doubtful, representing in so lively a manner the heinousness of breaking their oath of allegiance, that all the principal officers swore to a man to stand by their sovereign against all invaders. To crown his labours in Henry's behalf, Anselm publicly declared his intention to excommunicate Robert, in case he persisted in his design of driving his brother from the throne. Ecclesiastical censures were, at that time, more formidable to the priest-ridden vulgar than the most powerful armed force; and Robert soon found that his party, instead of increasing upon his arrival in vigour and numbers, daily grew weaker and dropped off. However, both armies continuing to march forwards, they came in sight of, and encamped over against each other on a plain not far from Winchester.

In this situation they remained for several days, without either side offering to come to action; Robert declining the battle on account of his not being joined by the reinforcements he expected from his friends on this side the water, and Henry from an apprehension that his soldiers would fail in their fidelity in the day of battle, and, by going over to his brother, put him in danger of losing his life and dignity.

Things standing thus, and the two brothers being equally desirous to come to a treaty, many messages passed between them, and many proposals were made and rejected on both sides; at length, by the mediation of Anselm, and some of the most prudent of the nobles in each army, an accommodation was effected on the following terms*.

I. That the king should resign to the duke the Contantin, together with all the other places and strong holds he was then in possession of, in Normandy, excepting Donfront, which he could not cede without violating the oath he had given to the inhabitants when they admitted him into their town, that he would never give it up but with his life.

II. That the friends of each party should have full restoration of all their lands and estates, both in England and Normandy.

III. That Henry should pay to Robert the yearly sum of three thousand marks of silver; and that if either of the two brothers died without lawful issue, his demesnes should be inherited by the survivor, as well in England as Normandy.

This agreement being signed and sworn to by twelve lords on each side, as guarantees for its faithful execution, both armies were disbanded, and Henry carried his brother Robert with him to court, where they lived together in the greatest apparent harmony for the space of two months, at the end of which term duke Robert took his leave, and embarked for his own duchy.

* Guthrie says, but without bringing his authority, that an interview was agreed upon, to be held by both brothers, without any attendants, in sight of both armies; and that, after a little consultation together, they made up the peace on the above terms. Guth. Hist. Eng. vol. i. p. 429.

Henry, being now delivered from his formidable rival, and firmly established on the throne by the late accommodation, resolved to take severe revenge on such of the great men who had shewn themselves most zealous in the cause of his brother Robert. Opportunities of being revenged are seldom wanting to those who have the power in their own hands: accordingly, soon after the departure of his brother, he seized on the estates and persons of Hugh de Grentemesnil, Robert de Pontefract, and Robert de Mallet, on various pretences; but it was plainly perceived that their chief guilt lay in the good-will they had expressed towards the duke of Normandy.

But of all those who had espoused his brother's cause, no one was so particularly the object of his indignation and revenge as Robert de Bellesme, earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury, on account of his having openly (and, indeed, with an unpardonable imprudence) declared, "that Henry was an usurper, and that it would be an eternal disgrace to all, of the Norman or English nations, who should permit, much more assist, him in holding the crown in prejudice of his elder brother." Accordingly Henry summoned this young nobleman to appear before him at his court, and answer to five-and-forty articles of impeachment which he published against him, the least of which was sufficient to bring him to the block. The earl, conscious that, by his unguarded behaviour, he had given the king too fair a handle to ruin him, asked leave for time to prepare his answer; which being granted him, he made use of the interval to fortify his castle of Shrewsbury, determined to defend himself to the last rather than, by a tame submission, to encounter that fate which he knew was unavoidably prepared for him: at the same time he had recourse to his friends in Normandy, where he had a great estate, and sent his brother Arnulph to solicit aid from the Welsh, upon whose borders the greatest part of his English lands lay.

This overt-act of rebellion gave Henry the most plausible excuse for effecting his total ruin. Accordingly he ordered him to be publicly proclaimed a traitor, for having refused to appear before his peers in the king's court* when duly summoned; and issued out commissions for a general array of all the militia in England; and taking the field in person, went and laid siege to the earl's castle of Arundel, in Suffex: but he found it so strongly fortified, that he was obliged to turn the siege into a blockade. While this was doing †, he ordered the bishop of Lincoln to besiege Teckhill, another strong fortress of the earl's, lying a few miles from Doncaster, while he himself advanced into Shropshire, the greatest part of which belonged to Robert de Bellesme. Here he attacked Bridgenorth, accounted the strongest place in England, the earl, who was the most excellent engineer of his time, having exerted his utmost skill in fortifying it. This siege cost Henry some time and trouble, and it is more than probable that he would have found himself baffled in his attempt had he not had recourse to money to bribe the garrison, which consisted of a body of Welsh, under Cadogan and Gervith, the two chief princes of Wales. This method proved effectual, and the Welsh surrendered the place after having defended it three weeks. Almost at the same time Henry received advice, that the officer he had left before Arundel, had compelled that castle to surrender; and that the bishop of Lincoln had proved no less successful in his operations against Teckhill.

Shrewsbury was now the only place of any consequence left in the hands of Robert: the roads to it were bad, narrow, and very fatiguing to an army in its march, the country being over-grown with thick woods, which the enemy had lined with archers to gall the soldiers in their passage; but Henry, with an admirable presence of mind, employing his men in cutting down the woods and opening the roads, soon got over these difficulties.

This desperate situation of his affairs struck Robert with dismay; he plainly saw it would be impossible for him to make head against so powerful a force as Henry was bringing against him; and therefore, as the king drew near the town, he went forth to meet him, acknowledged his crimes, and, presenting him with the keys of the place, threw himself upon his mercy. The king accepted his submission, and thus this dangerous insurrection was quelled in little more than a month from its first breaking out. The earl and his followers were disseized of all their estates in England, and obliged to quit the kingdom, and most of them died in exile.

By the ruin of the great family of Bellesme, Henry saw himself absolute master of his kingdom: before this time he had never considered himself as a real king; he now resolved to be so, by making himself independent of all powers abroad, and of every class of his subjects at home.

The most considerable power now left in the nation, distinct from that of the crown, was lodged in the bishops and abbots; and Henry could not, without a mixture of indignation and apprehension, perceive the attempts they were continually making to circumscribe the regal prerogative: the insolent and ambitious disposition of Anselm, not a little heightened by conscious merit of the late services he had done the crown, threatened Henry with little less than an annihilation of all his authority in ecclesiastical matters. That haughty prelate had two favourite points in view; the one was to oblige the clergy to celibacy, and the other to wrest from the crown the right of giving the investiture to bishops and abbots. In the midst of his ambition he had, however, sufficient discernment to know that the compassing his designs could not fail of being attended with many and great difficulties; but, nothing daunted at the prospect of the obstacles in his way, he convened a synod, in which

* It may not be amiss here to inform the reader, that when we speak of the king's court at this time, and of the peers, that there was a material difference between the peers of the king's court, or baronial peers, and commoner peers. The former were peers as they stood in relation to each other, as peers (pares) in the same court, and under one lord: all commoner peers were so to one another, but might be of different courts, and were peers only as they stood in relation to the community. The earl of Shrewsbury, therefore, being required to submit to the judgment of his peers in the king's court, would not venture to stand his trial: and it must be confessed, that the methods taken by Henry to form the impeachment were both mean and ungenerous; for he had set certain spies about the earl's person, who were ordered to incite him to treasonable expressions; and he being naturally of an unguarded and impetuous temper, they soon found ample matter for an accusation, and had circumstantially set every thing down, ready to give in evidence had he stood his trial.

he procured a sentence of excommunication against all the married priests.

Having thus gained his end in one point without meeting with any opposition from the king, he thought he might securely set about the other; and proposed that the bishops which had been invested by the king should immediately resign their sees, or stand excommunicated de facto. This gross insult upon the royal prerogative touched Henry too near for him to suffer it to pass unrepented: accordingly the archbishop was summoned to appear at the king's court; to which he repaired, and was commanded instantly to do homage to the king, and to consecrate such prelates as the court had nominated to the vacant sees or abbeys, or else to depart the kingdom; the king declaring in express terms, "that no person should reside within his dominions, who denied him the allegiance due to a sovereign." But Anselm as resolutely replied, "that he was not to be intimidated by threats from his duty; and that he would retire to Canterbury, where he should continue to exercise his archiepiscopal functions, and wait the issue." Henry, finding the archbishop so resolute, began to wish he had not carried matters so far, more especially when he found that several of the bishops, who had received their investitures from him, could not be persuaded to continue in their bishoprics, out of fear of being excommunicated; however, as he was determined not to give up his prerogative, and the archbishop insisted as strenuously upon his point, all hopes of an accommodation seemed to be in vain, when at length an expedient was proposed and accepted by both parties, namely, that a deputation should be sent to Rome, to lay the whole affair before the pope; which was accordingly done. But the result of this embassy, together with the consequences of this dispute between the king and Anselm, which continued on foot several years, belongs more properly to that part of our history which treats of ecclesiastical matters in particular, to which we shall accordingly refer it, and proceed in our narration of the civil events of Henry's reign.

This ecclesiastical dispute did not divert Henry's attention from his own interest in other particulars. One of his principal aims was to reduce the exorbitant power of the nobility. He had acquired prodigious riches by confiscating the estates of the great barons who had adhered to his brother. Among the sufferers on this account was William de Warren, earl of Surry, who, having retired into Normandy after the accommodation between Robert and his brother, never ceased importuning the duke to use his good offices with Henry, in order to get him reinstated in his lands. Robert, whose heart glowed with the benign warmth of humanity and compassion, and was, besides, strongly tinged with the spirit of knight-errantry, thought his honour concerned in granting the boon of one who had suffered for his sake: accordingly, this year, 1103, he came over to England in person, to solicit a restitution of the possessions of the earl of Surry, and some others of his friends. Henry, who had been previously informed of the design of Robert's visit, though made under the pretence of applying for the payment of his own pension, was fully prepared for his reception, and, immediately on his arrival, affected to be highly displeased with him for thus entering his kingdom without licence, and bringing with him in his retinue persons whom he knew to be enemies to him and his government, charging him, at the same time, with breach of the late treaty, by giving refuge and encouragement to the rebellious earl of Shrewsbury, and putting him in possession of his father's demesnes in Normandy. This sharp recrimination made Robert perceive that he had taken a wrong step in thus heedlessly putting himself in the power of Henry; but it was too late to recede, and therefore he pressed his brother warmly upon the subject of reinstating the earl of Surry; upon which Henry flew into such a passion, and let fall some hints of such dangerous tendency to Robert's safety, that this latter was glad to desist from his application, and endeavour to regain the king's good graces. In this ticklish situation he had recourse for advice to the count de Meulant, Henry's prime minister, the most dissembling and artful man of his time, who, having been properly prepared beforehand by his master, worked so effectually upon the duke's fears, by suggesting the danger he was in from having roused the king's resentment, that at length he prevailed on him to make the queen a present of the three thousand marks annually, which he received of her husband, in consideration of which she engaged to interpose her mediation and reconcile Robert to his incensed brother. This weak prince gave into the snare, and no sooner had he made over a formal resignation of his pension, than Henry's countenance cleared up, he treated his brother with the warmest caresses, the earl of Surry was restored to all his possessions, and Robert was left to return home the dupe of his own good-nature, and the contempt of those who had been his warmest friends, who plainly saw that nothing was to be expected from supporting a prince who was so little able to take care of his own interests†.

The ensuing year, 1104, afforded another remarkable instance of Henry's perseverance in his design of ruining the great nobles, and of wreaking his vengeance on all he suspected to be his enemies, or, what was the same thing, favourers of his brother Robert. William, count de Mortaigne, in Normandy, and earl of Cornwall, in England, the king's own cousin-german, claimed the earldom of Kent, as heir to Odo, bishop of Bayeux, who had accompanied the duke of Normandy in his expedition to the Holy Land, and died at Palermo, in Sicily. This claim he pressed in a manner that appeared to Henry rather too peremptory for a subject; but as it happened in the time of the public commotions, and that Henry suspected him of favouring the rebellious earl of Shrewsbury in his heart, he was not willing to weaken his own interest and strengthen that of his enemy by the defection of a nobleman of so great power and interest, therefore he amused him with specious promises, which kept him quiet; but as soon as Henry found himself securely established on the throne, he thought it high time to take down

† Ordericus says of him, that he never refused any thing that was in his power to grant. He lavished away his money in such a manner, that he was continually in want; and so extremely careless in what immediately concerned himself, that he was frequently unable to appear in a garb commonly decent, much less in such a dress as became his station, his domestics abusing his lenity to such a degree as to steal his very cloaths.

his towering spirit, and make him an example to other of his subjects, who, presuming too far on their weight and importance, might be tempted to fly in the face of majesty. Accordingly, when the earl, upon finding the affairs of the kingdom settled upon a quiet footing, took an opportunity of repeating his claim, and demanding to be put in possession of the whole county of Kent, the king not only gave him a flat denial, but also exhibited against him a charge for divers malversations in the government of those counties committed to his care, and at the same time with several misdemeanors against the state; and the several articles being proved to the satisfaction of the judges, the earl was declared guilty, upon which he immediately fled over to Normandy.

And here I think it is pretty apparent that the justiciaries were the king's creatures, and ready to give any sentence that they thought agreeable to his ambition or avarice; for, upon the earl's withdrawing himself out of the kingdom, they condemned him not only to lose the lands which it may be presumed he had, like other rapacious Normans, usurped, but (what is utterly inconceivable) the earldom of Cornwall and all the great estates in Suffex and other counties, of which his forefathers were justly possessed, according to Domesday Book, and which he inherited from them by an undoubted title.

From Florence of Worcester and the Saxon Chronicles we learn that William, who had retired to his estate of Mortaigne, in Normandy, hearing of these transactions, and incensed at the ingratitude, perfidy, and avarice of king Henry, fell upon those lands belonging to him and his partizans, that lay contiguous to his own, and had not been delivered up to Robert pursuant to the first article of the peace concluded between the two brothers. In these operations he was soon joined by a number of the exiled noblemen, who were all greedy of plunder; but what greatly strengthened his party was the alliance between Robert de Bellesme and him. This latter nobleman was in possession of no less than thirty-four strong castles in Normandy, in which he had placed all the wealth he had amassed, and which were provided with good garrisons; so that these two turbulent chieftains and their adherents harraided their native country with continual devastations, while Robert, either despising the world and given up to devotion, or, as Eadmer observes, amusing himself in plays and feasting, took not the least step to oppose their progress; and his indolence seeming to increase in proportion to the calamities of his country, he at length, without the privity or consent of his brother Henry, clapped up an infamous peace with the rebels, which exasperated his subjects to such a degree, that they determined to throw themselves into the arms of Henry, for the protection of their liberties and properties.

All this time Henry had been acting the most crafty part. Ever since he had found himself in peaceable possession of England he began to look with a wishful eye upon Normandy, and was greatly desirous of annexing that duchy to his crown. Robert's ill conduct had confirmed him in the hopes of one day compassing his end, and he waited only for a favourable opportunity to put his design in execution. With this view he made not the least effort towards chastising the rebels for their depredations on his Norman lands, either in person or by application to his brother. He knew full well that Robert's power was more to be feared than that of the malecontents, and therefore, with an unnatural and detestable policy, he suffered them to oppress his brother without offering the least assistance. This neglect of Henry's concurring with Robert's natural indolence, had been the chief inducement to the latter's having concluded the late disgraceful peace with the rebels.

That opportunity which Henry had been impatiently waiting for, now offered itself, and he did not fail to make the most proper use of it. Salo, bishop of Sens, and Robert, abbot of the same place, were the first who broke forth into open discontent (A. D. 1105), and publicly declared themselves; by excommunicating Robert, and flying over to England, where they were received with open arms by Henry, who now saw himself on the point of having his secret wishes fully satisfied. However, he had not as yet any justifiable pretence for coming to a rupture with his brother Robert; and moreover, he was fearful that if he should too prematurely declare himself, it might be a means of making the duke and the rebels join together for their mutual security, in which case it was past all doubt that they would prove an over-match for him, and prevent him from effecting his darling project.

Sensible of the blackness of his design, he thought it necessary to give it the face of justice, by yet appearing to act from a motive the very reverse of what really inspired his proceedings. With this view he wrote a letter to his brother Robert, representing in the strongest terms, that his conduct lately had given just ground of complaint to all degrees of his subjects, who could not, without great concern, behold the indolence and inactivity of his disposition, and the little care he took either to redress their grievances, or secure their properties; and that the late infamous peace he had made with the enemies of the public, and the despoilers of his country, had given those under his rule but too strong reasons to believe that they had little cause to look to him for protection. He entreated him in the most pressing manner to resume the sentiments of the prince and the common parent of his people, and instantly to set about redressing the grievances of which his subjects complained, or otherwise not to think it strange that, in case he turned a deaf ear to these remonstrances, he himself should be obliged to espouse the cause of the distressed Normans, if they should think proper to apply to him as their protector.

This artful letter, however it might be varnished over with the pretence of love and kindness, was in fact intended only as a libel to inflame the minds of the Normans to a greater pitch of discontent against their duke. Henry took especial care to have it made as public as possible, and the issue fully answered his expectations; for, in a very short time afterwards, he received a general application from the Norman nobility, beseeching him to have compassion on the miseries of their church and state, and take them under his protection.

This was precisely what Henry aimed at; and accordingly he no sooner received the invitation, than he hastened to comply with it; and, about the autumn of the same year, he passed over to Normandy, with a powerful armament, both naval and military.

Normandy

This conduct of Henry must appear to every unprejudiced person a downright violation of every civil and political tie; and there is no doubt to be made but that Henry would have loudly complained of, and severely resented, the duke his brother's attempting to intermeddle in his government of the English, which, indeed, there seems to have been an equal reason for, since we find Henry, at the very time he was thus rebuking his brother for mal-administration, and assuming the character of protector of the distressed Normans, saddling his own subjects with an exorbitant imposition, in order to defray the expences of his expedition to Normandy, in which this country certainly could have no concern; and this tax was levied with all the aggravating circumstances of rigour*. But, indeed, we seem to have been fated, ever since our existence as a people, to be the dupes either of quarrels or alliances with the continent, for the most part equally frivolous and disadvantageous, notwithstanding that nature, by our insular situation, designed us to be exempt both from the one and the other. But to return.

No sooner was it known that Henry had landed at Barfleur than his court was filled with the Norman nobility, who all represented their real or fancied grievances in the most specious manner, imploring the king of England to take them under his protection. It required no great rhetoric to persuade Henry to gratify the principal wish of his ambition; but as the season of the year was too far advanced to admit of any military operations, he contented himself with having an interview with his brother Robert, which passed in recriminations on both sides: Robert, on his part, accused Henry with a design to stir up his subjects against him, and deprive him of his dominions. Henry charged his brother with having not only given asylum to rebels and the betrayers of their king and country, but with having made allies of those very pests to society, by agreeing to an infamous peace with them. This altercation would have grown very warm, had it not been for the interposition of some of the most moderate noblemen on each side, who pacified matters so well, at least in appearance, that Henry and his brother parted seemingly good friends; and the former returned to pass the winter in England, after having first made a kind of progress through those parts of his own estate in Normandy which he thought required his presence, and which he put in the best posture of defence he could against the ensuing spring. However, before he quitted Normandy, he, against all the laws of nature and nations, seized into his hands the strong towns of Bayeux and Caen, belonging to his brother Robert, and garrisoned them partly with his own English troops, and partly with Norman malecontents; he likewife made an attempt upon Falaise, but here he miscarried.

During his stay in Normandy he appears to have entered into a private negotiation with Roger de Bellefme, earl of Shrewsbury; at least there can be no other plausible reason for a man so obnoxious daring to enter his territories, which he did soon after Henry's return to England, and staid with him part of the Christmas holidays; but whether the king was not able to bring him wholly over to his purpose, or it was thought proper to cover the secret convention between them for the earl's betraying his lord, they parted, in appearance, greater enemies than ever. Nevertheless, Robert seems to have taken the alarm at this interview; for in the very beginning of the year 1106 we find him making a visit to his brother Henry, who was then keeping his court at Northampton. On this occasion, Robert, with great mildness, though with a resolution that seems to have been inspired into him by the desperate situation of his affairs, expostulated with the king on his late unwarrantable conduct in Normandy, and peremptorily demanded restitution of the towns he had unjustly taken from him in the course of his expedition. Henry as peremptorily refused to do him the right he applied for; and Robert, who now plainly saw that nothing less would satisfy this ambitious and unnatural brother than the reduction of all the rest of his duchy, left him soon after, and returned home full of resentment, to prepare in the best manner he was able to repel force by force.

Although Henry had all the preceding winter before him, and the whole of this spring, to levy an army for this year's campaign, yet he met with such retardments in his operations, and especially in collecting the great sums wanting on this occasion, that he was not able to pass over into Normandy till the latter end of July. But before he left England he called an assembly of his states in London, in order to have the sanction of their opinions to his proceedings. At their meeting he harangued them in an eloquent and premeditated speech, in which he set forth the justice of his undertaking, "which was, he said, wholly inspired by that regard he did, and ever should, pay to the liberties of the subject, having received certain informations that his brother Robert, in conjunction with the arch-rebel Bellefme, and others of his confederates, had entered into a design to wrest from him all the territories he possessed in Normandy, and to subject his faithful Normans there to the same cruel sway under which the rest of that duchy groaned. He reminded them of the contempt that Robert had shewn to Heaven itself in refusing the crown of Jerusalem when it might have been put upon his head. He pointed forth his brother's foibles in the most odious light, and expatiated with a malicious prolixity on every exceptionable part of that prince's character; adding,

* Among other taxes raised on this occasion, we read of one imposed upon priests, by way of fine in his courts, for keeping wives or concubines. These prosecutions were founded upon the Vth, VIth, and VIIth articles of a synod held at Westminster, in the second year of this king's reign, which we shall have occasion to treat of in the ecclesiastical part of this history. There is the greatest reason to believe that some of the heaviest taxes were collected merely by the strength of prerogative, without the least regard to the privilege of the subject: and we are told, that those who were unable to pay, had their houses plundered, and their effects confiscated; and that if these were not found sufficient to pay the assessed sum, the persons of the insolvents were imprisoned. But of all the oppressive exactions none was more vehemently complained against than a tax that was laid upon all parish-churches, the incumbent of each church being made answerable for the payment of the rate imposed upon his parish. It is further related, that Henry coming to London during the rage of this oppression, was met by two hundred parish-priests in their surplices, who, on their bare knees, petitioned for some relaxation of their miseries, but without the least effect, Henry not being a person who would suffer pity to get the better of his interest.

that it was well known to the assembly, and to the nation, that his brother had ever expressed the most insulting contempt for the English people in general. He next passed on to himself, assuring them that he wished to live and reign over them no longer than he religiously observed the oath he had taken at his coronation, to maintain their ancient liberties, and preserve inviolable the wholesome laws of the holy king Edward; and referred them for a proof of his sincerity to that charter with which he had begun his reign. He also pretended to have received letters from pope Paschal II. with whom he was now on better terms than formerly, inciting and directing him to rescue Normandy from the ill government of his brother, promising him his apostolical benediction, and prayers to heaven for his success, who was about to engage in the cause of God and an oppressed people. In fine, he concluded with this expression, "If my brave English stand by me, I shall ever despise the threats of my brother and all his Norman adherents." This artful and dissembling discourse had all the effect he could desire from it: the lords, flattered with the shew of confidence he reposed in them, and suffering themselves to be led away by a specious eloquence, without comparing his flowery promises with his past actions, they unanimously concurred in assuring him that they would stand by him in this and all his enterprizes.

The example of the English parliament had a powerful influence with the Norman nobles, few of whom adhered to the interests of Robert, except the earls of Shrewsbury and Mortaigne, who, with their dependants and an inconsiderable number of others, were determined to exert their utmost efforts to oppose the unnatural invasion.

Henry's first attempt was against Tinchebray, a strong fortress belonging to William, earl of Mortaigne, which he invested in form of a blockade, on finding it too well provided for defence to be reduced by a common siege: he therefore built a strong fort over-against it, as was the custom of those days, in order to be a curb upon the besieged, and prevent them from making any successful sallies, and sending out in quest of provisions; but here his precaution proved ineffectual, for the earl of Mortaigne soon after surprized this fort, put its garrison to the sword, and opened a communication with the town. Henry, though enraged at this check, was far from being cast down with these unsuccessful beginnings; on the contrary, he resolved to venture every thing in order to make himself master of the place in defiance of the enemy, and therefore assembled his army, and renewed the siege; but the place being well provided with all necessaries, it held out long enough to give time to Robert to come to its relief with a powerful army, which had been raised with the assistance of the earls of Shrewsbury and Mortaigne, and reinforced by a supply of French troops which the king of France had sent to the assistance of the duke: several Norman lords had also come over to his party, on perceiving that Henry was acting less for their sakes than for his own.

Robert, on reviewing his army, found it nearly equal in numbers to that of his brother, and therefore determined to give him battle. This battle, which was fought under the walls of Tinchebray, began by a furious onset on the side of Robert, who attacked the main body of the English with so much fury that he broke their ranks. The earl of Mortaigne at the same time seconding the efforts of the duke, attacked one of the enemy's wings, consisting chiefly of Welsh, so bravely, that he obliged them to give way; but Robert de Bellesme, who commanded the left wing of the duke's army, either out of cowardice or treachery, suffered the body under him to be put to flight, with little or no opposition, by the count de Maine; and Henry advancing at the same time with a fresh body of troops to sustain his centre, which had been so roughly handled by his brother Robert, the fortune of the day was entirely changed. The duke's army, overpowered by numbers after the defection of the left wing, was entirely routed. Robert de Bellesme, flying early from the field, escaped; but duke Robert himself, the count of Mortaigne, Robert de Stotenville, William Crispin, and William de Ferrieres, with a great number of the common soldiers, were taken prisoners. Among other illustrious personages who were made captives by that day's misfortune, was Edgar Atheling, who appears to have lived for some time before at the court, and in the closest connection with duke Robert, their parity of dispositions having formed them for each other. However, Henry immediately ordered Edgar to be set at liberty, who afterwards came over to England, where he retired into the country, and ended his days in a peaceful retirement, worn out with age, and without marriage or issue.

The duke of Normandy and the earl of Mortaigne were less favourably dealt with; the latter was shut up in the Tower of London, and the duke in Cardiff castle, in Wales, where he remained a prisoner till his death, which did not happen till twenty-seven years after his defeat, and the loss of his dukedom†. William de Ferrieres fared better, through the bravery and fidelity of the garrison and inhabitants of Falaise, who having bound themselves by an oath not to deliver the place to any one but him or duke Robert, the politic Henry was glad to give him his liberty on condition that he would put him in possession of it, rather than it should fall into the hands of Robert de Bellesme, from whom he knew it would be no easy matter to recover it: besides, he looked upon the surrender of this place of the greater consequence to him, as it would put into his hands William the only son of his brother Robert, whose being in his power would necessarily secure to him the undisturbed possession of that duchy, which had all along been the main spring of all his motions.

The victory of Tinchebray had, in effect, made Henry sole master of Normandy, and nothing now seemed wanting to place him on the pinnacle of his hopes but the submission of Robert de Bellesme, earl of Shrewsbury; and here fortune, which seldom

† We are told by Mezeray and Matth. Paris, that this unfortunate prince having attempted an escape, Henry ordered his sight to be taken away, by a red-hot copper basin applied to his eyes. And hence, says Mezeray, in his Orig. de la Langue Italienne, came the Italian word abacinare, to blind. However, the silence of most of the best historians in regard to this unnatural deed, renders the fact doubtful; and, indeed, humanity will hardly give us leave to suppose that Henry could be so far lost to every sentiment of gratitude and brotherly affection, however actuated by ambition, as to inflict so cruel a punishment upon a brother, who had so generously saved his life at the siege of Mount St. Michael.

dispenses her favours or frowns by halves, gratified the wishes of the king of England to their fullest extent; for the earl, who had the good fortune to escape out of the battle, as hath been already observed, and who bore an implacable resentment against Henry, as soon as he got over to Normandy, used all his endeavours to persuade the count of Maine to take up arms for the deliverance of Duke Robert; but not finding the earl inclinable to his proposal, and perceiving no possibility of supporting himself alone against the victorious monarch, he resolved to submit to the current of the times, and made some overtures to Henry for a reconciliation, which was readily agreed to on the part of the latter; and in consequence thereof the earl was reinstated in most or all of his paternal inheritance.

In Lent, 1107, Henry returned in triumph to England, where he distinguished his arrival by acts that were highly pleasing to the nation in general. He had too much good understanding not to know that the sovereign power is ever most firmly established in the hearts of the people; and, indeed, we seldom find him exerting any arbitrary methods of oppression, but when his particular exigencies pushed him upon them. He now called an assembly of his states at Windsor, in which he rectified many abuses, and in particular issued a severe edict against the coiners of false money, who were of late grown very numerous and bare-faced; by this edict, every person found guilty of these practices for the future, were to be punished with the loss of sight and virility. He also made several other useful regulations at this time, a concise account of which, we believe, will not be disagreeable to the reader, as they are not to be met with in every historian.

The inhuman custom, which still continues to be a scandal to this country, then prevailed, of the proprietors of lands on those shores where a ship happened to be wrecked, seizing on the wreck as their own property, and knocking the unhappy wretches on the head who had escaped the fury of the sea, or suffering them to perish with hunger and misery. This barbarous custom Henry abolished, decreeing, at the same time, that in such cases, if one single soul remained live, both ship and cargo, if saved, should belong to him. But this excellent edict was repealed under his successor, to the reproach of his reign.

He also made a regulation for measures throughout the kingdom. All these acts of reformation were highly agreeable to the English people: but, by a strange contradiction, he at the same time revived the detestable tax of Danegelt, at the rate of two shillings for every hide of land; and likewise enforced several rigorous laws relating to the forests made by his father and brother †.

The year 1108 threatened Henry with a storm about to break upon his foreign dominions. Philip, king of France was dead, and had been succeeded by his son Lewis, surnamed le Gros, or the Fat. This monarch looked upon Henry as a very formidable neighbour, since his becoming master of Normandy, and therefore resolved to leave nothing undone to retrench his over-grown power. With this view he had recourse to William, surnamed Crito, son to the unfortunate duke Robert, a prince of great hopes, but in his non-age. Henry, however, who had his emissaries in every place where it was his interest to know what was transacted, quickly received information of the proceedings of the French king; and fearing he might inspire the young prince with a design to claim his father's dominions, in which case he foresaw an infinite deal of trouble would necessarily ensue, he prudently resolved to be beforehand with Lewis; and accordingly, about the beginning of August of this year, he passed over to Normandy, but without suffering the least particle to transpire that could give his opponent reason to believe he was advised of his machinations. On the contrary, he gave out that the sole motive of his journey was to visit his strong holds in Normandy, and put them in a proper posture of defence. However, on a sudden, he detached Robert de Beauchamp, with a party of horse, to seize the prince, who was then in a castle belonging to Elias, count of Sedan, and convey him to a place of security; but William and his governor, having got notice of his intentions, made their escape into France; and Lewis, finding his designs were discovered, laid them aside for the present. Henry having thus, by his vigilance and activity, frustrated the schemes of those who sought to disturb him in the possession of his new-acquired dominions, returned to England in the summer of 1109; and, about Whitsuntide, held a general council of his states at Westminster, where ambassadors appeared from Henry IV. emperor of Germany, to demand his daughter Matilda in marriage, which was agreed to, and the terms adjusted in the presence of the council. Henry laid hold of this opportunity to lay a tax of three shillings on every hide of land, by way of raising a marriage-portion for his daughter, grounding his demand on a custom which had subsisted time immemorial in all countries where the feudal system was established, for the subjects to furnish an extraordinary subsidy on the marriage of the king's eldest daughter; a custom of which we have still the remains amongst us to this day. The sum raised by Henry on this occasion is said to have amounted to nearly eight hundred thousand pounds of the present sterling currency.

This year is distinguished by the death of Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, a prelate of great learning for the age he lived in, but ambitious, haughty, and bigotted to the last degree, as will more plainly appear when we come to give his history as a churchman, in its proper place.

Much about this time we also find the seminary of learning at Cambridge restored, and put upon a more respectable footing, after having for many years lost all its lustre, insomuch that its professors could find no better accommodation to give their lectures in, than an old barn.

In the beginning of the year 1110, the princess Matilda was sent over to her husband, with a noble retinue. But the pleasure Henry received from this alliance was not a little damped by hearing of the steps that were taken by several great noblemen of Normandy, in conjunction with the king of France, to place his nephew William on the throne of that duchy. Amongst those who espoused the cause of the young prince, none exerted themselves so strenuously as Robert de Belleſme, the reſtleſs earl of Shrewſbury, and Fulk, earl of Anjou, the latter of whom had engaged the city of Conſtance, in Anjou, to revolt from its allegiance to Henry. This determined the king to paſs over to Normandy, in hopes that his preſence would ſurprize the inſurgents, and awe them into ſubmiſſion.

Accordingly he repaired thither in Auguſt, 1111, and continued two years abroad, during which time he proſecuted the war againſt the favourers of his nephew with various ſucceſs, and had no ſmall difficulties to encounter; however, by a perfeverance which would have done honour to a better cauſe, he at length ſurmounted all obſtacles. He found means, towards the end of the year 1112, to detach the earl of Anjou from the party of William and the French king, upon a promiſe of marrying his eldeſt daughter to him, and beſtowing on him the earldom of Maine, for which he was to do homage. As to the earl of Shrewſbury, who was his moſt inveterate enemy, having been ſent by Lewis on an embaiſſy, about a treaty or conference in order to come to an accommodation, and coming to Bonneville on the Tonque, Henry cauſed him to be arreſted †, and ſent to Cherbourg, and from thence into England, where he was condemned to perpetual imprifonment at Wareham, in Dorſetſhire.

This ſeizure of the perſon of Robert de Belleſme was attended with the moſt ſalutary conſequences to Henry's Norman affairs; for the court of France, thus deprived of, or abandoned by, its moſt powerful friends, found itſelf too weak alone to ſupport prince William's pretenſions; and ſoon after, to the amazement of all the world, Lewis and Henry had an interview at Giſors, which was followed by a treaty of peace, in which the former agreed for ever to renounce his pretenſions to the dukedom of Maine and the ſovereignty of Bretagne, and Henry thereupon received the immediate homage of that duke.

The young prince of Normandy, thus deſerted, was obliged to take refuge in the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who generously gave him protection, and a ſubſiſtence ſuitable to his birth and rank.

Theſe troubles being thus happily terminated for Henry, he returned to England in July, 1113. Before he had undertaken his Norman expedition, he had admitted into England a great number of Flemings, who, by the inundation of the ſea on their own coaſts, had been obliged to emigrate in queſt of new habitations. They were kindly received by Henry, and firſt of all ſettled in the more barren parts of Yorkſhire ‡; but were afterwards tranſplanted into Roſs and Pembrokeſhire, where they formed a ſtrong barrier againſt the neighbouring Welch, who were every now and then diſturb- ing the frontiers between the two nations by their invaſions. Theſe latter, enraged to find themſelves thus bridled by a ſet of vagabonds, became ſo troubleſome, that Henry was reſolved to march againſt them in perſon, and make the entire conqueſt of their country. Accordingly he entered Wales in the year 1114, with a numerous army; but, after many vain endeavours to bring them to a general engagement, which they always eluded by retiring to the mountains on the king's approach to give them battle, he found his army ſo embarrassed by the fatigues of their march through an almoſt impaſſable country, that they were in the greateſt diſtreſs; and as there appeared no likelihood of drawing the enemy out of their holes and lurking-places, he thought it moſt politic to liſten to terms of accommodation, a peace was made with them, and thus the expedition ended, with little advantage, and leſs honour to the Engliſh arms.

As ſoon as he returned to London, he yielded to the intreaties of ſeveral of his nobles, both eccleſiaſtical and ſecular, and filled up the vacant ſee of Canterbury, the revenues of which he had kept in his hands for five years. Ralph, biſhop of Rocheſter, was on this occaſion unanimouſly choſen archbiſhop, to the great ſatisfaction of the people, by whom he was highly eſteemed; and Thurſtan, one of the king's chaplains, was nominated to the ſee of York. At the ſame time all other vacancies were filled up, but with ſuch glaring partiality to the Normans, as made the Engliſh in general murmur loudly, and indeed not without juſt cauſe.

The latter end of September, in this year, Henry went over to Normandy, in order to get his ſon William, then only twelve years of age, recognized as his ſucceſſor in his Norman dominions. This point he effected, and all the great barons ſwore an eventual fealty to the royal minor; and Henry returned to England, where the year following he did the ſame, in order that nothing might be wanting, that human prudence could invent, to ſecure a long continuance of the ſceptre in his own line. In the month of September, he called a great council of his peers, both ſpiritual and temporal, at his palace of Weſtmiſter, where ſeveral matters relating to the preſervation of the peace of the kingdom were diſcuſſed and provided for. This, and ſome little diſputes between Henry and the princes of South Wales, are all the tranſactions that we have of the year 1115.

The following year, 1116, proved more fruitful of events; for Lewis of France, ſtill jealous of Henry's riſing power, had reſumed his engagements with prince William of Normandy, ſon to duke Robert; and claiming, as ſovereign lord of Normandy, a right to diſpoſe of that duchy, he gave the inveſtiture of it to the young prince, and promiſed to aſſiſt him with all his power: he alſo found means to bring ſeveral of the French princes to join his army; and affairs put on ſo ſerious an aſpect, that Henry found it abſolutely neceſſary to paſs over into Normandy. But before he ſet out on that expedition, he ſummoned a great aſſembly of the ſtates at Salisbury, on the thirteenth of March, in which he got his ſon William to be publicly acknowledged as his ſucceſſor, and all preſent took an oath to defend his right againſt all pretenders whatever. Some hiſtorians, and among others Polydore Virgil, and from him Stow and Speed, have dated the beginning of our parliaments from this assembly, probably on account of the fullness of it, and the great number of leading men of the nation mentioned as being present: however, this council seems to have been nothing like a parliament; but of this elsewhere.

After the breaking up of the council, Henry went over to Normandy, where he found that Lewis had entered that duchy with a powerful army, declaring his intention to place young prince William on the throne, and that he had been joined by several French and Norman lords, who had entered into a confederacy with the French king to reduce Henry's exorbitant power in France. The chief of these were Baldwin, earl of Flanders, the duke of Burgundy, the earl of Blois, and the earl of Nevers. Having notice of Henry's arrival, they marched with their forces to meet him, as far as the river Epte, where they found him safely encamped on the opposite side. While the two armies lay in sight of each other, neither party daring to force its passage, Lewis sent a challenge to Henry, offering him to decide the dispute between them by single combat; but Henry very wisely declined it, giving for reply, "that true valour was best proved by the conduct in the field; and, to shew Lewis that his not accepting his challenge did not proceed from fear, he offered to give him battle whenever he should chuse it." Lewis, fretted to the soul at being thus disappointed of his romantic revenge, resolved to lay hold of the first convenient opportunity to try his strength with the king of England in the day of battle; but it was some time before he found the opportunity he desired. However, several skirmishes happened while the two armies remained so near each other; but the Normans being constantly supported by detachments from the castle of Gisors, then in their possession, the French were generally worsted; and in one of those petty battles in particular, they met with so severe a check as prevented them from making any farther progress this campaign, and they were obliged to retire to their winter-quarters.

The ensuing year, 1117, Henry found himself greatly distressed, for the spirit of disaffection to his government grew so strong among the Normans, and his brother Robert's interest gained such ground every day, that he knew not whom to trust. The city and garrison of Evreux had been traitorously delivered into the hands of Amaury de Montfort, by its governor Pointel; nor could any offers made by Henry to that nobleman bring him over to his interest. The French had taken l'Aigle; and the king, with the earl of Blois, attempting to recover the place, had like to have lost his life, and was forced to raise the siege. The earl of Anjou had invested Alençon, of which he had made himself master, together with several other strong holds in that neighbourhood. Baldwin, count of Flanders, made such terrible havock in the county of Eu and Pais de Caux, that the king was provoked to send him a message, "that if he continued his ravages in that manner, he would march in person at the head of an army, and reduce all his territories to a general desert as far as Bruges." The count, in return to this menace, sent him back for answer, "that he would save him the trouble of so long a march by meeting him at Rouen:" in which he was as good as his word; and advancing under the walls of that place, challenged Henry to a battle, which the latter durst not accept, nor even to make a sally, but quietly suffered the suburbs of the town to be plundered and burnt, and the count, who had thus insulted him, to retire with his forces unmolested. On this occasion, some of his courtiers took the freedom to represent to him how much he wronged his own reputation, and that of the troops under his command, to continue thus inactive, while the enemy was daily making fresh progress, and taking his towns from him under his very eye: "Tush, man (replied Henry), I know the French well! and the king my father has often told me, that the best way to defeat them, is to let them spend their first fire."

The year 1118 was ushered in with a truly melancholy event, not only to Henry, but to the English nation in general; I mean the death of the excellent queen Matilda, who had been greatly instrumental in preserving the peace of England during the absence of her royal consort in his Norman expeditions, by her many virtues and exemplary justice and moderation. Her death happened on the thirteenth of April; and she was interred in Westminster abbey †. This year also died Robert, earl of Meulant, Henry's first minister: he was a foreigner by birth, and, considering England only as a conquered province, he had put his master upon many oppressive measures, which had hurt him greatly in the good-will of the English.

During the course of this year some lucky circumstances fell out in favour of Henry's affairs; and one in particular was the death of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, the most implacable of all the king's enemies, who was mortally wounded at the siege of the castle of Eu, which he took from Henry. He was succeeded in his earldom by his nephew Charles, son to the king of Denmark; who, being of a more pacific disposition, quitted the party of the allies to govern his dominions in peace and independency. Much about the same time also died Enguerraud de Chaumont, the most active and brave commander among the confederacy, who had surprized the castle of Andeli, and, while alive, kept the whole county of Rouen in continual alarms.

But nothing proved of so much real advantage to Henry as the gaining over Fulk, earl of Anjou, to his party. The reader may remember, that it had been agreed that the prince-royal of England should marry this earl's daughter ‡, but as both parties were then too young for the connubial state, the marriage had been delayed; but now that nobleman gave Henry to understand, that he was ready to espouse his cause, provided he would fulfil the contract between them, and send over for his son Henry to consummate the nuptials. Henry joyfully accepted the proposal; and the young prince arriving about Easter, 1119, the marriage was celebrated in the presence of the parents of the royal couple the June following.

Thus freed from the diversions that had employed the greatest part of his forces on the side of

† I cannot omit a singular circumstance relating to the burial of this princess, which concerns the antiquities of our country, viz. that the sheriffs of London had the care of her funeral, as appears by a famous roll in the Exchequer, where, in their accounts passed in the said roll, they charge the crown with fifteen shillings and two pence half-penny for oil expended in burning upon her tomb.

Anjou, Maine, and Flanders, Henry seemed to rouse on a sudden from his lethargy, and, uniting all his forces, rushed like a torrent upon those countries which had been taken by the allies, spreading slaughter and desolation wherever he came.

The French, from Henry's late inactive behaviour, had entertained notions very little favourable to his courage and abilities. He now taught them that they had been greatly mistaken in him, and that what they had imputed to fear, or want of military skill, had been the effect of refined policy; while all those of his own party were fully convinced of the truth of his remark* concerning the French. He now also took an opportunity of severely chastising those barons who had busied themselves against him in the course of the war; after which he laid siege to the castle of Evreux, which he took and burnt to the ground, not even sparing the churches or religious houses.

Having thus vented the first emotions of his long with-held fury, he advanced against the king of France, whom he now challenged to battle, calling upon him to support in the bloody field those imputations he had so injuriously thrown upon his courage. Lewis, who burnt with equal ardour to signalize himself against the king of England, made all the necessary preparations for receiving him, like one who was determined not to be out-done in bravery or conduct. In order to secure the Normans more effectually in his interest, he took all occasions of shewing particular marks of love and respect to prince William, to whom he gave the next post of command in his army under himself, ordering him to advance towards Andeli, upon the river Seine, and make himself master of the castle of Noyon, designing to keep close after him with the main body, in order to support him in case of a battle. Wise as these precautions were on the part of the French king, yet Henry, by his great expedition, rendered them of very little effect; for advancing by forced marches, he came up with the detachment under William so unexpectedly, that it had scarce time to form. The prince instantly sent notice of this situation of affairs to Lewis, who, marching up with all expedition, joined the advanced body of his army, and began to make all the necessary dispositions; but the English pushed on so furiously, that he had hardly time to form his first line when the battle began. Nevertheless, prince William, who had orders to sustain the first shock of the enemy while the rest of the army was getting into order, did it with so much bravery and intrepidity, that he not only made the English van give way, but, following his advantage, pierced their main body, commanded by the king in person. And here Henry had more occasion than ever to exert that courage and intrepidity which seems to have been truly a part of his character. He maintained his ground with surprizing coolness, riding from rank to rank to encourage those who remained steady, and to rally some part of his fugitive troops. While his attention was wholly employed by this business, the engagement became more close, the French seemed every where to gain ground, and Henry himself was on the point of falling a victim to one of those chances of war which make no distinction between the monarch and the private soldier; the brave or the runaway. William de Crispin, a Norman nobleman in the interest of Robert, had, with unparalleled bravery, cut his way to the very spot where Henry was in person, busied in the manner already related, and altogether regardless of his own safety. Crispin seeing him thus alone, and unsupported, thought this a favourable opportunity to gain immortal glory to himself, and crown the cause of his master with success, by the death of the king of England: accordingly riding up to him on a full gallop, he discharged two such furious blows on the king's head, that, had not his helmet been of excellent temper, one of them alone must have finished his life and reign; as it was, Henry remained stunned with the violence of the stroke, and the blood poured forth from his mouth and ears in a stream: but recovering himself suddenly, he, with astonishing resolution and coolness, watched the third stroke that Crispin levelled at him (who now thought himself secure of his conquest, and was therefore less upon his guard) and aimed so well-judged and fortunate a blow at his adversary, that he brought him headlong from his horse, and a body of the royal army coming up just at that instant, he delivered Crispin over to them as his prisoner.

But while Henry gained this small advantage by his personal bravery, the fortune of the day seemed to declare against him, and his Norman troops were all on the point of yielding or being cut in pieces, when the English, of which the third line consisted, and who appear born to decide the fate of battles by a steady bravery peculiar to themselves, hearing of the danger their sovereign was in, fell like demons upon those who stood in their way, and, cutting down all before them, pressed on to the support of the main body. The French, who thought the day their own, stood thunderstruck at finding themselves thus assaulted, and that while they were reaching out their hands for the palm of victory, they had a new battle to fight: a general panic seized upon them; the swords dropt from their hands; unable to stand the more than mortal efforts of these new assailants, they fell into a general rout, the fortune of the day was changed, and the French fled with such precipitation, that it was impossible to rally them; Lewis himself being carried along by the runaways, unhorsed in the press, and forced to trust himself to an unknown peasant, who conducted him from the scene of uproar and confusion, through woods and bye-ways, till he brought him in safety to Andeli.

Such was the fate of this battle, which was fought in the plain of Brenneville, near the castle of Noyon sur Andelle, and which had it gone against Henry, must have dispossessed him of all Normandy. A great many prisoners were taken by the English in the pursuit, among whom were many noblemen. Among other spoils of the day was the French king's standard, which Henry redeemed for twenty marks from one of his own knights, who had taken it from the ensign at the hazard of his life. This glorious trophy Henry took along with him to Rouen, which he entered with great triumph.

All historians allow that the Norman prince William behaved with great gallantry throughout the whole of this action, and scruple not to declare that had his valiant efforts been properly seconded, the French would certainly have obtained a complete victory.

Be that as it might, the loss of this battle proved very fatal to that young prince and his affairs, and did not a little mortify the pride of the French king, who having rendezvoused the remains of his fugitive army at Andeli, and being strengthened by considerable reinforcements, thought himself strong enough to hazard a second battle; and accordingly sent a herald to defy Henry to another engagement, who very prudently declined accepting the challenge at that time: however, to give a proof of his generosity, he dismissed all the prisoners he had taken, except about two hundred and forty knights; and the prince-royal of England sent back the young prince of Normandy's horse, which had been taken in the field, and was superbly caparisoned, with high compliments and expressions of regard for his bravery, attended by a noble present. Some time after the two kings came to a second engagement, the success whereof was doubtful, each side giving out they had the better. In a word, this war proved a very warm one, and found the two monarchs full employment.

Whilst acts of hostility were thus carried on by both sides with equal vigour, Lewis endeavoured to take the advantage of the stay pope Calixtus II. then made in France, to embroil Henry in new troubles. He was in hopes that the pope, who was of the house of Burgundy, would be easily induced to favour his designs. With this view, though without letting him know his intentions, he prevailed upon him to convene a council at Rheims, whereto all the western bishops were summoned, to consult upon restoring the peace of the church and the quiet of Christendom. Henry, mistrusting nothing, permitted the English bishops to be present without any scruple, only ordering them to take heed that they brought not back into his kingdom any innovations in behalf of the court of Rome. The council consisted chiefly of French bishops, some of whom having been properly prepared by their monarch, who himself appeared in this assembly at the head of his most considerable barons, exhibited a long and bitter charge against Henry, whom they represented as a disturber of the public peace, by taking up arms against the king of France, though he was his vassal, and seizing upon Normandy, which held of the French crown; and that he had injuriously and unnaturally dispossessed and imprisoned his elder brother Robert, the undoubted heir not only of that duchy, but of the crown of England, in right of primogeniture; and concluded with a proposal to excommunicate him: which would have been approved of by the majority, had not the pope, who was unwilling to break with Henry, shifted it off by taking upon himself the exhorting that monarch to do justice to his brother.

Upon this the council broke up, without coming to any resolution; and Calixtus, soon after going to Gisors, had an interview with Henry, wherein he affected to plead the cause of duke Robert with great earnestness, concluding, that it was the request of the whole assembly, that he would set his brother at liberty, and put him and his son again in possession of their hereditary dominions. Henry, who knew the pope too well to believe he would pretend to insist upon such terms, listened to what he said with great shew of respect, and replied, "that he had not taken Normandy from his brother, but had only rescued the subjects of that duchy from the oppressive government of a set of rapacious and dissolute persons, who had gained an entire ascendant over Robert, who lavished away all the treasures of his ancestors upon them, and permitted them to lord it without controul over himself and people: that the step he had taken had not been of his own advisement, nor out of disregard to his brother, or an unnatural thirst after his inheritance, but purely in consequence of the repeated prayers and solicitations of the nobles, clergy, and common people of Normandy, who, fearing the total abolition of their ancient privileges both in church and state, had besought him by a solemn deputation to take them under his protection." These specious excuses, backed with a handsome present, brought the pontiff entirely over to his side; and, on his return, summoning together the council again, he declared himself fully satisfied with the reasons that Henry had alleged in defence of his conduct, and dissolved the assembly. Having now entirely given up Robert and his party, the pope set himself heartily to work to bring about a peace between Henry and the king of France; which he at length, by his unwearied labours, effected: and in the spring of the following year, 1120, having managed an interview between the two sovereigns at Gisors, all matters were settled in an amicable manner, and Lewis was prevailed upon to give up the cause of duke Robert and his son, and to acknowledge the prince-royal of England as duke of Normandy, on this latter doing homage to him as his lord-paramount, which being complied with, he received the proper investitures.

Henry having now completed the pacification of Normandy, was impatient to return to England, from whence he had been so long absent: but he was willing to return in a triumphant manner, and accordingly ordered a noble fleet to rendezvouse at Barfleur, there to take him and the prince-royal (now duke of Normandy) on board; but that young prince, whom all historians have represented as stained with the most debauched and dissolute manners, thinking that he could not give a full scope to his riotous and vicious pleasures, if he embarked under the very eye of his father, prevailed upon Henry, under some specious pretence, to suffer him to go on board another vessel, which was to follow the grand fleet in a few days. In this vessel he had taken care to embark most of his loose companions, to render his passage more agreeable.

The king himself set sail, with all his retinue, the twenty-fifth of November, in the evening, from Barfleur, and landed safely in England the next day, where he waited in full expectation of his son's speedy arrival; but Heaven had otherwise ordained, whether as a punishment upon the prince for his horrible crimes*, or in order to deliver the English

* Some authors represent this as a just judgment upon the prince and his followers, for being contaminated, among other vices, with one of the most unnatural kind, and which had first been introduced by the late crusaders. The master of the ship on board of which the prince embarked, was Thomas Fitzstephens, the same person who had carried William the Conqueror over to England, in his expedition against Harold. As he was swimming for his life, after the parting of the ship, he saw English from the future yoke of a tyrant in embryo, who, on all occasions, had professed the highest contempt and hatred for this nation, making no scruple to declare, that, if ever he came to the crown, he would make the English draw the plough like oxen.

As William did not set sail till the day after his father, he had spent all the time that he had remained on shore in rioting and drunkenness; and the master and crew of his vessel having copied his example, there was hardly a person on board in a condition to manage the ship. They were no sooner got out to sea, than the duke, not thinking the vessel made way enough, ordered the pilot to set more sail: his orders were complied with. It blew a fresh gale, and the pilot and mariners, being intoxicated with liquor, mistook their course, and ran the ship upon a sunken rock with such force, that she almost instantly split asunder. The greatness of the danger putting every one upon providing for their own safety, they took to the boats, and the prince among the rest, who by this means seemed out of danger; but hearing the cries of Matilda, his natural sister, who, less able than the rest to take care of herself, had been left unnoticed in the general confusion, he ordered those in his boat to row back and take her in; but no sooner did they approach the ship's side, than some who had been left behind, regardless of every other consideration than that of escaping present death, jumped in such numbers into the boat that it sunk with the over-load, without any possibility of saving the prince: in fine, every soul that had embarked on board perished, to the number of one hundred and forty, most of them young noblemen, besides fifty mariners, none escaping but a butcher. Among those of the greatest quality that perished in this shipwreck besides the prince, were one of his natural brothers called Richard, his natural sister Matilda, who was countess of Perche, the lady Lucia the king's niece, and the earl of Chester.

When Henry, after vainly expecting for three whole days the arrival of his son, received the news of his melancholy fate, it so affected him that he fell down in a fit, yet presently recovering himself, he endeavoured to conceal his grief; but we are told that this unexpected stroke had such an effect upon him, that he was never after seen to laugh. Some advantage, however, accrued to Henry from this accident, melancholy as it was; for the persons, honours, and estates of most of the deceased noblemen were now in his power, by which means he strengthened his interest in England, by marrying their widows, daughters, and sisters to several of his Norman officers and fellow-adventurers, whom he thus rewarded for their long and painful services in the war he had lately finished with so much glory to himself.

The loss of his son, however, and in him of an heir to his dominions, made Henry determine upon a second marriage, in hopes of supplying the deficiency of male issue, and leaving a successor to continue his name and family upon the English throne. With this view, he, in the year 1121, calls a great council of the chief nobles, both spiritual and temporal, at London, wherein he proposed a match with the lady Adelisa, daughter of the duke of Louvain, who, from her youth and amiable accomplishments, seemed the most likely to answer his purpose by rendering the marriage-bed fruitful. This match was unanimously approved of by the assembly; and ambassadors being sent to demand her of her father, she soon after came over to England, and the royal nuptials were celebrated (such expedition was used) in February of the same year, at Windsor; and the day following the marriage, the new queen was crowned by Ralph, archbishop of Canterbury, whose great insolence on this occasion is taken notice of by most historians, and is a striking example of the amazing height to which the clergy in those days carried their power over the minds of those whom enthusiasm, and a mistaken reverence for every thing sacerdotal, had subjected to their arbitrary sway. As the archbishop was preparing to place the crown on the queen's head, he observed the king already crowned, and seated upon his throne; upon which, stopping short in the midst of the ceremony, he demanded, in an imperious manner, who had dared to place the crown on his head? "That did I myself (replied the king with some warmth), is there aught amiss in it?" The prelate, however, not in the least abashed, told him, that it was his office to have put it on, and that he could not, without being wanting to his own character and dignity, proceed in the ceremony while it remained there. Henry, though vexed to his soul at this ill-timed and insolent particularity, had nevertheless the goodness (or, if you please, weakness) to suffer him to unloose the strings that tied it under his chin, and take it from his head; after which, replacing it again, he proceeded in the queen's coronation. The example of their sovereign's submission to this ecclesiastic was so ill digested by many of the nobles present, that they threatened to punish the impudent sacrilege; but Henry interposed in behalf of the priest, whose presumption was not a little increased thereby.

In the course of this year, Henry had some disputes with Griffith prince of North Wales, who, being encouraged by the death of the earl of Chester, one of the unhappy sufferers in the late shipwreck, had invaded that earldom, now without a governor, surprized several forts, and exercised many cruelties. Upon this Henry took the field in person against him, and many skirmishes ensued, in one of which the king was very near being killed by an arrow, and was another time in danger of being cut off by a party of the enemy who had surrounded him as he was reconnoitring a wood, but was saved by the swiftness of his horse. These untoward accidents, and the apprehension of not ending the war in the successful manner he at first flattered himself with hopes of, made him at length clap up a peace with Griffith, who made his submission, gave the king a thousand head of cattle as a temporary tribute, and also hostages for his future peaceable demeanor.

Towards the close of this year Henry made a progress through the North, during which he visited most of the strong places, and ordered Carlisle to be surrounded with new walls fortified with towers, and erected a castle in it, capable of holding out a stout siege. This business over, he returned, about the beginning of the year 1122; which is distinguished by no remarkable event, excepting the death of Ralph, archbishop of Canterbury, who, abating his extreme insolence in all matters where he fancied his prerogative was concerned, was of an unblameable character. His see continued vacant till the beginning of the ensuing year, when Corboil, abbot of St. Bennet's, was elected metropolitan in his room.

The year 1123 produced Henry new uneasinesses in Normandy. He had imagined that by his late treaty with the French king he had removed every obstacle to his quiet possession of that duchy; nevertheless he now found himself under a necessity to go over there, in order to make head against a party which had been formed in favour of William Crito, by Walleran, count of Mellent, or Meuland, lord of Pont Audemer, and supported underhand by king Lewis. The plan had been so well concerted, that every thing was ready for a powerful rising, when the sudden arrival of the king struck the conspirators with amazement and fear, and obliged them to take the field before they were prepared with sufficient forces to carry on the war with any probability of success. Henry in a short space of time made himself master of Pont Audemer, Montfort, and some other places, after which he repaired the old fortifications, and added new ones to the castles of Caen, Rouen, and Arques, whose garrisons he doubled, and took such necessary precautions, that he soon found himself secure from the strongest efforts the rebels could make.

All this time the French king had been very busy in supplying the conspirators with money and troops, though he did not think proper to declare openly for them; but Henry, who was perfectly well acquainted with his proceedings, thought it better to have an open than a concealed enemy, and therefore had, in the beginning of the year 1124, declared war against France. But nothing gave Henry more uneasiness than the behaviour of Fulk, earl of Anjou, who, on some slight pretence of dissatisfaction against the king of England, deserted his party in favour of that of young prince William of Normandy, with whom he now entered into a strict alliance, and gave him his eldest daughter in marriage, together with the strongest assurances of assisting him by force of arms to recover his natural inheritance.

This year was spent in skirmishes on both sides; but no action of any consequence happened till March in the following year, 1125, when, on the twenty-fifth of that month, the army of the conspirators advancing from Belmont to Watteville, in order to force an entrance into William's Norman dominions, William de Fauconville, Henry's general (for the king does not appear to have been then with his army in person), found means to draw the French and Normans into an ambush, in which the counts de Meulant, Evreux, and Montfort, with Hugh Fitzgervas, Almeric the French king's steward, and many Norman barons, besides no less than eighty knights, were all taken prisoners. The count of Evreux afterwards made his escape, by winning over the officer in whose custody he was, and got safe into France, where he lived for some time, without daring to return to his native country. The taking of the count of Meuland was followed by the surrender of all the strong castles of which he was possessed. The prisoners were all sent into England, where Henry caused them to be punished after different ways, according to the heinousness of their offences. And here it will not be amiss to remark, that this prince seldom forgave any one who had taken up arms against him, although he might, according to times and circumstances, be occasionally obliged to dissemble his resentment.

This success seemed to promise Henry certain means of quelling the rebellion; however, he did not think it proper to quit that country for the present.

In the course of this year cardinal da Crema was sent over by pope Calixtus to England, in quality of legate, in order to reform some abuses that had crept in among the clergy. The legate was received in the most pompous manner, but at the same time he was given to understand from the king, that he must not attempt to make innovations in the kingdom, or do aught against the royal authority or prerogative: this intimation, delivered in the most forcible terms, was accompanied by a mollifying present; and the legate finding that nothing of consequence was to be done under so resolute a prince, after having called a synod at London, in which some canons were enacted relative to the clergy*, he thought proper to take leave and depart.

In summer 1126, Henry returned to England, where he found the nation in general discontent, on account of the heavy taxes that had been imposed upon them for supplying the exigencies of the campaigns in Normandy: add to this, that, from a total inattention to executive justice in those who governed the realm during the king's absence, robberies, thefts, and murders were become so frequent, and perpetrated in so daring and open a manner throughout the kingdom, that no one's life or property could be called secure. Henry, therefore, made it his first business to reform these abuses, and enacted several severe laws against all disturbers of the public peace; at the same time he executed no less than forty-four criminals, who were fully convicted, and punished others with the loss of limbs and members. He also gave orders for prosecuting all coiners and debasers of money, that pernicious practice having been carried to such an excess, that a nominal pound would not go for twelve pence real value.

In this year died Alexander I. surnamed the Fierce, king of Scotland, and was succeeded on the throne by his brother David, earl of Huntingdon, who, besides the crown of Scotland, was possessed of several considerable estates in England. Much about the same time death also took out of the world the emperor, Henry's son-in-law, leaving his consort Maud a fair young widow, and the greatest fortune in Europe; who, after performing the last rites to her dead lord's remains, came over to her father in England.

* The most remarkable canon was levelled against the married-clergy, and was introduced by the legate with a great profusion of invective and reproach. Among other things, he asserted, "that it was a sin of the most heinous kind, for a man to consecrate the eucharist when he had just arose from the bed of a strumpet;" for such he deemed the wives of the clergy. But, unfortunately for the character of this zealot, he was caught in bed with a woman of the town, the very next night after he had consecrated the eucharist in the morning, and was obliged to steal away privately on the morrow, in order to avoid the shame of so infamous an action.

Henry had now been married six years to his second queen without Heaven having blessed his marriage-bed with any fruits, so that, despairing of having a male successor of his own issue, he determined at least to secure the crown in his own family, by getting his daughter Maud acknowledged his heir, in which he was sensible he should meet with no opposition from the English, who looked upon this princess with an eye of affection, as being descended by the mother's side from the ancient Cerdic family. He was, however, under some apprehensions concerning Robert, the deposed duke of Normandy, whose interest with the Norman nobility he knew to be still very considerable, notwithstanding that his confinement prevented him from raising any disturbances at present. With the advice, therefore, of some of his trusty counsellors, he ordered that unhappy prince to be more closely imprisoned, and gave the charge of him to Robert, his natural son, who kept him some time in the castle of Bristol, after which he was moved to that of Cardiff, in Wales, where he died of a broken heart.

Having thus taken all those precautions which human wisdom so frequently thinks infallible, and Heaven is as frequently pleased to render ineffectual, to teach vain man the salutary lesson of depending on the Author and Giver of all success, Henry's next step was to call together a great assembly of the states at Windsor, in the beginning of the year 1127, at which were present, among other great barons and persons of distinction, Stephen, earl of Boulogne, nephew to the king, and David, king of Scots, who had repaired to England to pay his homage to Henry in person for the lands he held here. At this council the important affair of the succession was debated with great solemnity; and a proposal was made in the king's name, or by himself in person, that all present should take an oath to receive the empress Maud as queen of England, in case Henry should decease without issue male. This proposal was readily assented to by the members of the assembly; David and Stephen set the example by first taking the eventual oath of allegiance to Maud, which was afterwards done by the spiritual states, and then by the temporal.

If Henry was well pleased with these transactions, and the little opposition he met with in carrying his favourite point, his subjects, both Norman and English, were not less disgusted at the step he took soon after; for having received advice that the king of France had put William, son of duke Robert, in possession of the county of Flanders, on the death of Charles the Good, and fearing that this accession of strength might make the young prince formidable to him in Normandy, he resolved to strengthen his own interest by an alliance with Geoffrey Plantagenet*, son of Fulk, earl of Anjou, who, by the proximity of his territories to those of the king in Normandy, would be always ready to assist in case that duchy should be attacked. Accordingly the young lady was sent over, soon after Whitsuntide, 1127, under the care of Robert, earl of Gloucester, one of the king's natural sons, and was betrothed to the earl of Anjou's son by the archbishop of Rouen; and the August following the nuptials were celebrated, Henry going over to assist at the ceremony in person.

This match proved highly dissatisfactory to the great barons of both nations; in the first place, as the king had concluded it without asking their advice or assent, and purely at the instigation of the earl of Gloucester, and Briant, son of the earl of Richmond; and moreover, as they foresaw that this connection would always keep them embroiled on the continent. In a word, the public discontent ran so high on this occasion, especially among the English, who thought themselves particularly slighted, that it was easy to foresee they would pay little regard to their late oath in case of Henry's death. The king, however, perfectly satisfied with what he had done, gave, or seemed to give, no heed to the public murmurs.

The ensuing year, 1128, in order to prevent the designs of his enemy, Lewis of France, who now openly declared his intentions of putting William Crito in possession of the dukedom of his deposed father, he invaded the French king's territories with a strong army: but, previous to this step, he found means to stir up the Flemings to a revolt against William their new earl, who had rendered himself disagreeable to them by his too great pride and parsimony. On this occasion they sided with Thierry, or Theodoric, earl of Eu, or Alsace, who pretended a title to the earldom of Flanders. Him Henry powerfully supported, and with such success that the earl quickly made himself master of Alost and several other considerable towns, and daily increased his party. This juncture Henry chose as the most proper for entering France as before-mentioned; and advancing as far as Espargne, he offered Lewis battle for eight days successively; but that prince, sensible how much inferior his army was to that of the king of England, was contented with putting himself in a proper posture of defence, so as not to be forced to fight on unequal terms.

During this situation of the two armies, prince William exerted all his efforts to recover Alost out of the hands of Thierry; and a battle ensued between them, in which the earl of Alsace was defeated, and the prince of Normandy would certainly have taken the town, and his rival prisoner, had he not been mortally wounded by the thrust of a lance in a sally from the besieged, which turning to a mortification, carried him off in a few days†.

This unhappy accident, together with the great superiority of the English army in France, obliged Lewis to abandon his projects, and conclude a peace with Henry, who now found himself the undisputed possessor, in point of blood, to the duchy of Normandy, Robert his brother leaving no other legitimate issue. Nevertheless, Henry very prudently determined to remain some time longer in Normandy, in order to settle every thing upon a quiet footing, and it was not till the autumn of 1129 that he returned to England.

Having thus surmounted all opposition, he began now to taste the sweets of ease and tranquility; and during this calm he suffered the milder sentiments of mercy and forgiveness to succeed those of fury and resentment, that had so long occupied his breast. He extended his pardon to all those who implored it, and attached several persons of influence and credit to his interest, by acts of

* So named from a sprig of broom (genet, in French), which he always wore in his cap.

† He died on the twenty-seventh of July, 1128.

generosity and kindness; he released many of the late conspirators, and among the rest Mellent and Fitzgervas, whom he restored to their Norman estates: in a word, Henry now became in great reputation both at home and abroad, and his situation with his neighbours was such as promised his hitherto clouded life a serene close.

It was at this period that Henry altered the revenue of his demesne lands, the rents of which had been hitherto paid in kind. The tenants were so impoverished with taxes and other hardships, from the nature of their tenure, that they totally abandoned the business of agriculture, and hung up their plough-shares in the highways as useless implements. This, and a great scarcity which ensued in consequence of the general neglect of tillage, induced Henry to appoint commissioners to examine the estates, and fix a certain sum of money to be paid yearly, in lieu of the corn, provision, and service which had been usually exacted. This composition was very advantageous to the tenant, the rates of provision being at that time very low, so that the burthen of the rent diminished as the specie increased*.

In the year 1130, after having kept his Easter at Woodstock, Henry went over to Normandy, in order to have an interview with pope Innocent II. at Chartres, in whose favour he and the king of France declared, against his rival Anacletus. He took this opportunity of paying a visit to his daughter Maud, whom he found upon very bad terms with her husband Geoffrey Plantagenet. This lady had ever been averse to the match from the first time it had been proposed to her by her father; her high spirit not being able to brook the debasing herself, who was the widow of an emperor, so low as to marry a simple count; and Henry had been obliged to use some violence to bring her to a compliance. Her behaviour after marriage exactly suited with her sentiments prior to it: she carried herself, on all occasions, with insupportable haughtiness to her husband, and their hours were spent in mutual reproaches, that embittered the marriage-state to such a degree that a separation was at length agreed upon, and Henry returning to England the next year, brought his daughter over with him.

Upon his arrival he called a general assembly at Northampton, in which he got the estates to renew the oath of allegiance to the empress, having by this time clearly perceived the distaste the English had conceived against her second marriage. This council, which sat in the Easter holidays, 1131, was hardly dismissed when the earl of Anjou sent for his wife back again, and received her with all possible demonstrations of a sincere affection; which has given some writers occasion to hint (and not without an appearance of probability) that the separation was nothing more than a political contrivance between the three parties, to engage the English states more readily to concur in renewing their oath of fealty.

The year 1132 was remarkable for the burning great part of London; an accident to which this city seemed particularly subject, in those early times, from the structure of its houses, which were mostly of wood, and the narrowness of its streets and passages.

* See Dialog. Excheq. which also says, in the same place, that a measure of wheat, sufficient to serve an hundred men with bread, was valued at a shilling; a fat ox, five shillings;

This year Henry made a progress to the North, in order, by his presence, to establish the authority of the feudal tenure in favour of the earls and great men, to whose authority the common people were loth to pay a proper respect. During his stay in these parts, he founded an episcopal see at Carlisle, which he had already distinguished by several acts of royal munificence.

The next year, which was 1133, to the unspeakable joy of the king, his daughter, the empress Maud, was delivered of a son at le Mans, who was born about Easter. He was christened by the name of Henry, in respect to his grand-father, and was afterwards king of England. On this occasion a council was summoned at Oxford, where the states again swore fealty to the empress, and eventually to this son as her successor. This important point settled, Henry, about the end of summer, sailed for Normandy, which seems to have been his darling place of residence, and bid farewell, for the last time, to England, which, however, he left in perfect tranquility.

Early in 1134 died that unfortunate prince, Robert duke of Normandy, in his confinement in the castle of Cardiff, after having sustained the most inhuman treatment that brother could offer to brother; and, indeed, the insulting manner in which Henry had behaved to him through the whole course of twenty-seven years confinement, has given but too much reason for several historians, who were no favourers of the king of England, to insinuate that he procured the death of his rival and prisoner, by the most inhuman of all murders, as we have already mentioned in our note to page 213.

However this might be, it is beyond contradiction that Henry's heart was too much filled with ambition and the thirst of undisputed sway, to admit even the smallest portion of brotherly love and pity; and even if we should acquit him of the immediate assassination, the barbarity of his usage will be found little less than murder itself. The remains of this unhappy prince were interred in the choir of the cathedral church of Gloucester, where a wooden monument erected to his memory is still (or was very lately) to be seen.

During the king's stay in Normandy, some dispute arose between him and his son-in-law, Geoffrey Plantagenet, which kept him longer there than he had at first intended; and in the year 1135, he received advices from England, acquainting him that the Welsh had made incursions upon Cardiganshire, where they had committed great ravages, and even defeated a body of forces sent against them. Upon this Henry resolved to pass over into England, to the relief of his subjects there, but was prevented by his son-in-law, who would not admit of his drawing forces out of Normandy. At length he resolved to go alone, and put himself at the head of his English army; when, coming to the castle of Lyons, near Rouen, he, after a fatiguing day's hunting, eat so plentifully of lampreys at his supper, that he caught a surfeit, which proved his end.

When he found his dissolution drawing near, he sent for the earl of Gloucester, his natural son, to whom he recommended, in the most pathetic manner, the interests of the empress his sister, but made not the least mention of his son-in-law Geoffrey, with whom he was greatly displeased. He then disposed of several legacies in charitable uses, and in particular ordered above sixty thousand pounds sterling to be distributed among his domestics. He also provided for the payment of his own debts, and remitted every thing that was owing to himself. Having thus settled his temporal concerns, he resigned himself up to the care of the clergy to prepare him for his final transit, which happened at St. Denis le Forment, on Sunday the first of December *, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and and the thirty-sixth of his reign.

His body was carried, next day, to Rouen, attended by a prodigious throng of people, and being embalmed after the coarse manner of those days (by cutting deep gashes with a knife in the flesh, and filling the incisions with salt), was conveyed to Caen, and from thence transported to England, where it was buried at Reading, within a monastery of his own founding †.

This prince exhibited in his character a striking example of that inconsistency which must ever be the portion of frail humanity; and though he had many amiable qualifications both of mind and person, yet they were sullied with a number of faults, among which cruelty, avarice, and an inordinate love for women, were the most predominant. The first appeared conspicuous in the inhuman treatment of his brother; the groans of an oppressed and fleeced people declared the second; and his numerous illegitimate issue, by different mistresses, were a long time living monuments of the latter. The manner in which he obtained the crown has been the subject of such a diversity of opinions, that I shall not take up the reader's time with entering upon the discussion of that point. The surname of Beauclerc, which was given him on account of his learning, is far from being sufficient to establish his character as a man of letters; because, in those days, few or none, and princes least of all, gave themselves any concern about books, which were left wholly to the ecclesiastics, and therefore if at any time a layman arose, who was but indifferently versed in the reading of those times, he was looked upon as a prodigy of literature. His person has been generally represented as handsome and stately; his manners, in private life, as affable and facetious. We shall now give an account of this prince's issue, as well natural as legitimate, as both will be often mentioned in the course of this history.

His legitimate children were,

1. One son named William, the manner of whose death we have already related.

2. One daughter, generally known by the name of Maud the Empress, on account of her first marriage. Her second husband was Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, by whom she had Henry, afterwards Henry II. king of England; and two other sons, Geoffrey and William, that died without issue.

The natural children of Henry were,

1. Robert, whom he created earl of Gloucester in the ninth year of his reign, by Nesta, daughter of Rees ap Tudor, prince of Wales.

2. Richard, by the widow of one Anskell, a baron in Oxfordshire. He was drowned with his half-brother prince William.

3. Reynauld, created earl of Cornwall in the fifth of king Stephen, by Sibylla, daughter of sir Robert Cabot, of Alcester, in Gloucestershire.

4. Robert, by Editha, daughter of an English nobleman.

5. Gilbert.

6. Henry, by Nesta aforesaid.

7. William de Tracy, so named from a town in Normandy; he died soon after his father.

8. Matilda, countess of Perche, who perished with her brother William in his fatal shipwreck.

9. Another Matilda, married to Conan, earl of Brittany.

10. Julian, married to Eustace de Paiz, natural son of William de Breteuil, eldest son and heir of William, and elder brother of Roger, earl of Hereford, in England.

11. Another daughter, married to Matthew, son of Borchard de Montmorency, from whom are descended the ancient family of that name.

12. Elizabeth, by Elizabeth, sister of Waleran, earl of Meulant or Mellent, married to Alexander I. king of Scots.

The most remarkable occurrences of this king's reign are thus handed down to us by different historians.

In the second year of his reign, being likewise the second of the century, Gloucester and Winchester were burnt. In his fourth, a comet appeared; and four circles were seen about the sun. In his seventh, another comet was seen; and on Thursday night before, two full moons appeared, one in the east and another in the west. In his tenth, a third comet was seen, and an earthquake happened in Shropshire. Sir John Hayward's Hist. of Henry I.

In his eleventh year, the river Trent, near Northampton, ceased to run its course for four-and-twenty hours, and so long the channel was dried up. Hollingshed. There was, this year, a great mortality of men, a murrain among cattle, both domestic and of the field; the fowls also perished in abundance. In his thirteenth year, Worcester city, the church, castle, and many citizens were burnt; and the water of the river Medway failed so much, for many miles, in the midst of the channel, that the smallest boats could not float; and the Thames was so low, between the Tower and the Bridge, that many men, women, and children waded it over on foot, which was occasioned, says our author, sir John Hayward, by reason of a great ebb in the ocean, that laid the sands bare several miles from the shore, which continued so a whole day. The city and chief monastery of Chichester was burnt to the ground: and there were violent tempests, with a comet; Hollingshed adds, that the comet appeared in a strange manner, it rose in the east, and when it was advanced near the mid-heavens, it kept not its course forward, but seemed to go backward, as if it had been retrograde. Most of these accidents he places under the next year; during which almost all the bridges in England, being then built with timber, were broken down by the ice, when it thawed after a severe frost. In Henry's sixteenth year, on the first of November, there fell a prodigious storm of hail, accompanied with unusual claps of thunder and flashes of lightning: in December a great earthquake happened, and the colour of the moon appeared like that of blood. Hollingshed.

In his seventeenth, the cities of Bath and Peterborough were burnt. In his twentieth year, there was an earthquake, in September. In his twenty-second, the city of Gloucester was burnt; and Lincoln the year following. Matthew Paris gives us the following history of founding the order of the knights templars of Jerusalem under this year (1122.) "About this time (says he) several noble knights formed themselves into a society, obliging themselves to celibacy, and to live after the manner of the regular canons. The founders of this order were Hugo de Pagan and Godfrey of Eadmer, who were so poor that they had but one buckler and one horse between them; in commemoration of which, the seal of the order has two knights mounted on one horse. As they had no dwelling-place, Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, assigned them an apartment in his own palace for their residence, and the canons of the Temple granted them an area near the palace to erect their offices. The king himself, as well as the clergy, granted them a daily allowance for their table and cloathing. The knights at first undertook to clear the roads towards Jerusalem from the banditti and robbers, with which they were infested; and in a short time the order was so respectable, that it spread all over Europe, and was embraced by persons of the most distinguished birth and abilities." In his twenty-third year Henry built or repaired the palace of Woodstock, and adorned it with a park, the first that ever was in England. In his thirtieth year, Rochester was almost destroyed by fire: and London in his thirty-second. In the year before he died, being the thirty-fourth of his reign, on the second of August, just as he was about to take shipping for Normandy, an eclipse of the sun and moon appeared; at which time William of Malmesbury, who was then living, writes that he saw the stars plainly about the sun. This eclipse was followed by a most horrible earthquake, in which the same author relates, the house wherein he sat was lifted up with a double remove, and at the third time settled again in its proper place. Hollingshed tells us it was the house in which the king sat, and adds, that flames of fire burst out of clefts of the earth, and continued to burn for some time with unremitting violence.

THE vanity of human foresight was never so powerfully exemplified as in the case of Henry I. than whom no prince ever possessed a greater share of worldly wisdom, nor was it in the power of mortal prudence to have taken more effectual precautions for securing the succession in his family than he did; and yet Heaven was pleased to render those precautions of no effect, and even to make some of the measures which he most depended upon for success, to contribute to the frustrating of his intentions; probably as a righteous punishment for the many acts of injustice, violence, and oppression which himself and family had repeatedly exercised over this unhappy land.

Among those that had shared the late king's favours, Stephen, earl of Boulogne, had been the most particularly distinguished by him. He was the third son of the earl of Blois, by Adela, daughter of William I. Not contented with bestowing upon him the rich manor of Eye, in Suffolk, together with many other signal marks of affection and esteem, as also the immense estate of Robert Mallet, Henry had moreover effected a match for him with Matilda, or Maud, daughter and sole heiress of Eustace, earl of Boulogne, by Mary of Scotland, sister to his first queen. It must be confessed that Stephen had many great qualities, which entitled him to the regard of so discerning a prince as was Henry I.

At the time of this monarch's decease, Stephen was in France; but his long residence in England, and the intimate degree of confidence with which his uncle indulged him, had given him the fairest opportunity of becoming a perfect master of the state of affairs in this kingdom, a knowledge of which he made the most advantageous use for his own interest, though in a manner that, perhaps, did no great honour to his rectitude of heart; and, indeed, dissimulation seems to have made a very principal part of Stephen's character, of which he gave a flaming instance at the first assembly of the states convened by Henry to swear fealty to his daughter, the empress Maud, when the earl of Boulogne was so forward to fall in with the king's views, that he even entered into a dispute with David, king of the Scots, which of them should first be sworn.

As the period we are now entering upon is filled with civil bustle and contention, it may not be amiss to make the reader acquainted with some of the principal characters that made a figure on the theatre of politics, and were chiefly concerned in bringing about the several catastrophes of this active reign.

Stephen, as I have already observed, was the third son of the earl of Blois. His eldest brother laboured under some natural defects, which excluded him from the succession, which therefore came to the second brother, who claimed the duchy of Normandy in right of his mother, as will be shewn in the course of this history. Henry, the youngest brother, had been bred in the monastery of Augny, and Henry I. who thought he could not do too much for his own nephews, had made him abbot of Glastonbury and bishop of Winchester. He was of an active and turbulent disposition, bold of speech, dissembling and faithless in his manners, and so ready to adapt himself to the particular circumstances of the times, that he seemed formed by nature for a statesman. By a pleasing volubility of tongue he had gained the esteem and admiration of the ignorant populace, with whom he

he passed for a man of great abilities and good-nature; and his frank and familiar address gave him such interest with the clergy, that he had nearly the same influence over them that his brother had over the laity.

William, the then archbishop of Canterbury, possessed more learning than knowledge of the world. He was a zealous son of the church of Rome, whose decisions he regarded as sacred oracles, and was always ready to enforce the observance of them with all the violence of enthusiasm. His ignorance of the intrigues of state made him very liable to be imposed upon by cunning or designing persons, or to be led away by his own narrow notions.

Roger, bishop of Salisbury, was the wealthiest subject in England, having had the most favourable opportunities of amassing riches during the late reign, when the management of affairs, both in church and state, was intrusted to him, while the king was absent on his Norman expeditions. He was raised from the rank of a parish-priest to the see of Salisbury in a manner that had something singular in it: whilst he was only curate of a little parish in Normandy, Henry, who had then no prospect of one day mounting the throne, happened to go into the church where he was saying mass, and was so taken with the devout and solemn manner wherewith the priest performed the service, that he desired to have him for his chaplain; Roger did not want much intreaty to accept an honour he so little expected. As soon as Henry came to the crown, his first care was to prefer his chaplain by promoting him to the see of Salisbury; but, not stopping there, he committed to him afterwards the management of all important affairs in church and state, during his absence in his successive expeditions to Normandy; and at length made him his prime minister. This high post furnished the prelate with an opportunity of heaping up immense riches, which he laid out in building stately palaces, and keeping a noble house and magnificent equipage, which gained him the hearts of the common people; and, though a foreigner by birth, he seems to have had at heart the interests and liberties of the English nation. Thus much for those great men in the church and state, who were on the side of Stephen: let us now consider the heads of another party.

The empress Maud was of an undaunted spirit and haughty disposition, inspired into her by her high birth and alliance. She possessed her father's Norman dominions; she was married to a foreign prince, a stranger to the constitution of this country; her near relation to the Scottish king, who was always ready to assist her in all her ambitious projects; all these circumstances rendered her so excessively proud, that the English could have no prospect under her government but a continuance of the oppression and contempt which they had met with during the last three reigns.

Her half-brother and faithful defender and protector, Robert, earl of Gloucester, natural son of Henry I. was the most eminent of all the great men who then flourished in England, whether we view him in the cabinet or the field: his unspotted integrity, his success in arms, his firm attachment to the welfare of the nation, his learning, his humanity, and a thousand other excellent qualities, had justly endeared him to the more sensible part of the people, and made his friendship of great importance to either party. The generosity of his heart would not permit him to hesitate an instant which side to take, and though he was warmly devoted to his country, yet the confidence reposed in him by his father in his last moments had inspired him with an attachment to his sister Maud, that prevented him, notwithstanding the integrity of his intentions, from perceiving how little qualified she was to rule over a people naturally fond of liberty, and from closing with that party which was most likely to preserve the independency of England.

The late Henry, from his long absence in Normandy, seems not to have properly understood the character of his English subjects. His dependence upon the many oaths he had exacted from them, and which are seldom found to bind, in political cases, against principle and interest, had made both him and the empress too secure to take other precautions; and Stephen had a great advantage, by having on his side three prelates, whose interest secured him the suffrages of all the clergy. Whether the earl had entertained any designs upon the crown during the life of his uncle and benefactor, does not clearly appear; but it is certain, that the breath was hardly out of Henry's body, when he privately posted from Whitland, a town in Picardy, where he then was, and going on board a small vessel, landed at Dover; but none of the burghers would entertain him in their houses, nor did he meet with a better reception at Canterbury; for the citizens, apprized of his coming, and judging the design of so sudden a visit, shut their gates against him, and positively refused to admit him into their city. Not discouraged by these disappointments, he continued his way to London, where his brother, the bishop of Winchester, and other noblemen of his party, had so well prepared matters against his arrival, that he was received with open arms by the citizens; and a great council of the state being immediately convened, the friends to Stephen exerted all their rhetoric to represent the misfortunes which might arise from the accession of the empress Maud, in the most aggravating terms. The archbishop of Canterbury, who had been gained over by the bishop of Winchester, Stephen's brother, affirmed that the oath in which the states had bound themselves to Maud, was null and void, as being directly contrary to the custom of the English, who had never as yet permitted a woman to reign over them. The bishop of Salisbury maintained, that they were discharged from their oath, because Matilda was carried out of the realm without the consent of the barons, whose intent was, when they first swore fealty, to have no other king than one of the race of William I. In fine, entirely to remove all scruples, Hugh Bigod, who was an officer of great trust under the late king, and strongly in the interest of Stephen, came before the assembly, and voluntarily made oath that Henry, on his death-bed, had declared his intentions of setting aside the empress Maud and her children. On these, and divers other considerations*, which will, to different readers, appear in a different light, according to their political principles, and which are neither to be wholly vindicated nor condemned, it was resolved to set aside Maud from the succession, and Stephen was declared king of England, a day being appointed for solemnizing his coronation. He, on this occasion, failed not to throw out a profusion of promises, not only of advancing the particular interests of those who had the most warmly espoused his cause, but to rule over the people of England like an indulgent parent over his beloved children: promises which had been made familiar to the ears of the people by their frequent repetition, and the performance of which they had as often vainly expected. But Stephen did not rely on soothing speeches only for success, he had gone a more sure way to work; his first care, after his arrival, having been to take possession of the late king's treasure, amounting to an hundred thousand pounds (equal to about a million of the present money), besides a large quantity of plate and jewels: by a proper distribution of this sum he drew over to his side many of the necessitous nobility, and made fast friends of the still more necessitous soldiery.

The day fixed for his coronation being come, William, the archbishop of Canterbury, whose right and office it was to perform the ceremony, being a conscientious primate, scrupled to set the crown on Stephen's head, as being a downright violation of the oath he had taken to the empress. However, Roger, bishop of Salisbury, and some others of the clergy, with great difficulty, removed these scruples, and the good man at length consenting, Stephen was solemnly crowned on Sunday the twenty-second of December; but the appearance of nobility was smaller than ever had been known upon the like occasion.

Stephen began his reign like others of his predecessors most distinguished for their policy, by conciliating the affections of his new subjects, and which in his case, indeed, was peculiarly needful. With this view he began with the clergy and commons of England, to whom he principally owed his elevation. The former of these had long complained of the bishoprics being kept vacant by his predecessors for a number of years, in order to fill their coffers with the revenues belonging to them: the new king therefore, to make them easy on this head, added a very extraordinary clause to the usual coronation-oath, namely, "that upon the demise of a bishop he would instantly give the investiture to the successor appointed by a regular canonical election."

Innumerable had been the acts of oppression exercised upon the subjects of all ranks and degrees in relation to the woods and forests, and the right of hunting therein, which were extended even to private property, inasmuch that no gentleman dared to hunt in his own woods, or to grub up or cut down the smallest tree for his own domestic use, on pain of being proceeded against in the king's court upon information, as a despoiler or waster, in which case he was sure to be loaded with a heavy fine, collected with all the rigour of law. These vexatious prosecutions, which fell chiefly upon the old English gentry, were fully provided against by another article, in which "he swore not to disturb the clergy or laity in the quiet enjoyment and free use of their own woodlands, as had been done by his predecessors; neither would sue any one for hunting even in the royal forests; and that he would restore to the people the several tracts of ground taken in by the late kings for making forests, retaining such only as had been possessed by the two Williams."

To these acceptable concessions he added another, which was still more agreeable to the common people, namely, the abolition of the tax of Danegelt, declaring,

"That the king for ever remitted the said tax, which amounted to two shillings for every hide of land, and which had been annually collected by his predecessors."

He is said to have granted many other articles in favour of the commons of England; but the particulars of them have not come down to us.

While Stephen was thus employed in every act of popularity and affability that appeared most likely to ensure him the hearts and affections of those over whom he had assumed the sovereign rule, the empress and her party, either from a full dependence on the conscientiousness of the English in observing their repeated oath of fealty to her and her issue, or from other causes that have not been accounted for, made not the least efforts towards asserting her claim to the throne; and such of the nobility who favoured her cause, finding it impossible to resist unsupported the torrent of popular prejudice in favour of Stephen, retired into Scotland, where they were hospitably received by king David.

That prince, agreeable to the oath he had taken, resolved to exert himself to the utmost in support of the empress Maud; and with this view he, in the beginning of the ensuing year, 1136, raised a numerous army, with which he proposed to invade the territory of Stephen, whom he regarded only as an usurper. However, thinking it necessary to join artifice to force, he, on pretence of a visit to Carlisle and Newcastle, made himself master of both these places†; and being thus in possession of the two principal northern inlets to the kingdom, he threw off the mask, entered England in an hostile manner, and penetrated as far as Durham, obliging the inhabitants of all the towns that lay in his way to swear allegiance to Maud,

* The members of the council reflected, that the empress was the lawful heir of Henry I. and solemnly acknowledged as such by the whole nation; that she was a woman of a capricious and haughty temper, married to a foreign prince in needy circumstances, and of a character as exceptionable as her own; that she might possibly be induced to resign the reins of government into his hands, in which case England would be in danger of being involved in all the petty disputes and quarrels he might have with other princes on the continent, and see its blood and treasures sacrificed in support of foreign allies. On the other hand, Stephen, though a foreigner by birth, was an Englishman in his heart, and possessed of every virtue that could qualify him for filling the throne of a great and powerful kingdom with greater lustre and advantage to his people, than they could expect from the weak head of a woman: but above all, the precedent introduced by Henry himself, and his brother William, in usurping the crown from the immediate heir of blood, made the English nobles conceive they had an undoubted right to provide for their own safety by choosing for sovereign whomsoever they should judge the best qualified for that important station.

† When Stephen received intelligence of this piece of treachery (for we can give it no better name), he, in the most cool and deliberate manner, said, "It is very well; what my cousin David has thus treacherously seized upon, I must as manfully recover." Huntingd.

Stephen no sooner heard of these proceedings of the king of Scots than he assembled a body of forces, and marched with all expedition to meet him, and put a check to his progress. Accordingly, by forced marches, he came up with David as he was about to lay siege to the city of Durham, and both armies prepared for a battle the next day; but, during the intervening night, each party began to weigh maturely the chances for and against success: David had already found himself greatly disappointed in his hopes of meeting with a general insurrection in favour of his niece, the empress Maud, and was not unacquainted with the military abilities and personal valour of Stephen. The king of England, on his side, had many strong reasons to wish rather to have David for a friend than an enemy. These dispositions begat proposals of accommodation the next morning, which being hearkened to on both sides, a treaty was at length concluded, on Ash-wednesday, February 5, by which David was allowed to retain Carlisle, and what he possessed in Cumberland, on restoring the places he had lately taken in Northumberland. As these conceded territories belonged to the crown of England, David ought naturally to have done homage for them to Stephen, but he excused himself from that step on account of the oath he had taken to maintain his niece's succession: in order, therefore, to settle this matter on an amicable footing, it was agreed that Henry, the prince-royal of Scotland should do homage for them to the king of England; which being performed, Stephen invested the young prince with the earldom of Huntingdon, and promised not to dispose of Northumberland, till after a solemn hearing of his claim to that county. Stephen was extremely fond of this young prince, who accompanying him to London, got so far into his good graces that in the festival of Easter, which he kept there with great magnificence, he made him sit at his right hand, a mark of distinction which gave great offence to the archbishop of Canterbury, and several of the great nobles who were more ancient in date of creation, and so far resented this undue precedence, that they publicly affronted the young prince, which being known to David, he in great wrath sent for his son from the English court, whither he would never afterwards suffer him to return †.

Just at this time the king being attacked by a slight indisposition, a report prevailed that he was dead, upon which Hugh Bigod seized upon the castle of Norwich, swearing that he would deliver it up to no one but the king in person. This obliged Stephen, on his recovery, to go down to receive it from his hands.

At his return from this journey he was agreeably surprized to find that Robert, earl of Gloucester, either disgusted with the haughty conduct of the empress, or that of her husband, or (which appears more probable) to prevent his estates in England being put under confiscation, was arrived here from Normandy, in order to do homage to Stephen, which he performed accordingly, but with this express proviso, that it should be no longer binding than the king continued to rule according to the oath he had taken. The earl, knowing the fickleness of Stephen's temper, and how little trust is to be put in the promises of princes, judged this clause necessary to secure himself from any danger which might arise from a change of circumstances: and Stephen appears to have been perfectly sensible of Robert's intention in this evasive stipulation; however, dissembling as well as himself, he wore an air of great satisfaction and confidence towards him, in the mean time neglecting nothing to strengthen his own party, to do which more effectually, he took a body of foreign mercenaries (Flemings) into his pay, which, together with the English forces already in his service, formed so considerable an army, that he had little to apprehend from the private machinations or open attacks of the empress or her friends.

The example of so powerful a nobleman as the earl of Gloucester, who was moreover looked upon as the soul of Matilda's party, had such an influence on the other barons, that they took an oath of allegiance to Stephen, as did most of the prelates, who had as yet stood out. Stephen likewise procured pope Innocent to confirm his title and possession. But here it is to be observed, that the prelates clogged their oath of fealty with the following proviso, that they should pay allegiance to him "so long only as he maintained the liberties of the church, and supported her discipline ‡."

Stephen, highly pleased with being thus recognized by the prelates, whose power, influence, and example could not but have a great effect over the whole nation, resolved to give them a signal instance of his gratitude and good-will; and having convoked an assembly of the states at Oxford, he there renewed his coronation-oath, at the same time confirming it by a charter, in which "he promised to preserve the immunities of the church, disclaimed all simoniacal promotions; referred the persons and estates of all the ecclesiastics to the cognizance and jurisdiction of the bishops and the spiritual courts; secured the free and undisturbed enjoyment of all possessions belonging to the church at the death of William I. declared his intention to examine the claims of the clergy, and to restore to them all their possessions or privileges that had been taken away from them before that event; confirmed what estates had been since granted; allowed them to dispose of their effects by will, and engaged to commit the care of the possessions and revenues of vacant prelacies to clergymen and others of reputation till they should be canonically filled. He reserved to himself all the forests belonging to the crown before the accession of the late king; but gave up all the new ones that had been made by Henry, and were in such numbers as to be an intolerable grievance; promising also to give his protection and to do justice to every one of his liege subjects, and to abolish all unjust exactions and methods of oppression." And concludes his charter with an assurance that he would cause the good and wholesome laws and customs in the hundred and other courts to be duly observed.

Numbers of persons of the first nobility and the greatest dignity in the kingdom were witnesses to

† This probably happened at the coronation-dinner, after the archbishop had performed the office of crowning Maud, Stephen's queen, on Easter-day, March 22, it being customary for the archbishop of Canterbury to sit on the king's right hand at dinner on that solemn occasion.

this charter †. How far the king regarded the performance of the promises he therein made to his subjects, will best appear in the course of his history. Thus far, however, we may say, that the number and quality of the attestators furnishes a kind of evidence that the nation in general was satisfied at that time with Stephen's right. Some restless spirits there were, however, who endeavoured all in their power to disturb his government and shake his throne: the chief of these, both in power and insolence, was Baldwin de Redvers, earl of Devon and lord of the Isle of Wight, who, upon a repulse he had met with from the king in some slight favour he had asked, was so highly incensed thereat, that he threw off his allegiance, and, retiring from court, fortified himself in his castle of Exeter. His revolt was the more dangerous at this juncture as the Welsh had lately made an irruption into the frontiers, which rendered it necessary to send a strong army against them; but Stephen, who was always present upon any emergency, readily conceived that the quelling this rebellious subject was of more consequence than putting a stop to the inroads of the Welsh, and therefore he immediately put himself in march with a strong army, and went and laid siege to Exeter, the reduction of which cost him three months, and the place would have held out much longer had it not been in want of water through the drying up of the well which supplied the garrison. Before the surrender of the place, the earl found means to escape to the Isle of Wight, whither the king followed him with amazing expedition, expelled him from thence, obliged him to seek his safety by flying into Normandy, and seized upon all his estates in England.

This commotion was hardly appeased, when another was raised by Robert de Bathenton, who, after the example of Redvers, fortified his castle ‡, and renounced his obedience to Stephen. As soon as the king was informed of this fresh revolt, without staying to rest his harrassed troops or himself, he marched against this discontented baron, who, on his approach, put on a shew of contrition for what he had done, and offered to deliver up his castle to Stephen, who thereupon advanced to take possession of it; but the traitor, with an unparalleled effrontery, instead of performing his promise, appeared upon the walls, and declared his intention to hold out to the last extremity. This so exasperated Stephen, that he pushed the siege of the castle with redoubled vigour; and Bathenton attempting to make his escape in disguise, was discovered, taken, and brought to the king, who ordered him immediately to be hung up in view of the garrison. This sight so intimidated them, that they instantly capitulated.

† It may be proper to inform the reader, that it was signed by fourteen bishops; and of the temporal peers, by Henry, the prince royal of Scotland; by the earl of Gloucester; William de Warren; Ralph, earl of Chester; Hugh Bigod; William de Peverel; Ilbert, or Gilbert, de Lacy, or Lessois; and many others.

‡ It had been an ancient custom in England, for some of the principal noblemen to have one or more castles on their estates. The original intention of these fortresses seems to have been to defend the country against the incursions of the Scots, and the invasions of the Danes, Saxons, Normans, and other adventurous free-booters. When, after the Conquest, those precautions were rendered unnecessary, except in the northern counties, the castles were still suffered to remain. But instead of being, as they had formerly been, places of strength for the security of the nation, they were now converted into receptacles

Stephen being now at leisure to advert to the proceedings of the Welsh, sent a strong army against them, under the command of some English barons, whose territories lay in the neighbourhood of those places which they had ravaged in their excursions; wisely concluding, that these men would fight for the preservation of their own property, if they did not out of fidelity or love to him; but the event was not attended with that success the wisdom of the plan merited, for the English were defeated in an engagement with the enemy, in Cardiganshire, with the loss of three thousand men, who were slain in the field of battle, besides great numbers who perished in the river Temd, by the breaking of the bridges over which they were flying. The Welsh remained masters of the county by this defeat, and, after having exacted immense contributions from the inhabitants, returned home loaded with plunder.

This check seems to have given the king very little concern, for, the next day after receiving the news of it, he went down to Brompton, in Huntingdonshire, to take the amusement of the chase. And here he gave the first indication of the little regard he thought due to his late oath and charter; for the archbishopric of Canterbury becoming vacant about this time, by the death of William Corboil, the king seized upon the revenues, and kept them in his hands for upwards of two years; moreover, as the bishop died intestate, he seized upon his effects, pretending that they escheated to him in right of the prerogative which had been exercised by the three former kings his predecessors: this, however, must be confessed a very fallacious plea, inasmuch as he had made a formal resignation of such prerogative by the charter already mentioned, and therefore such a proceeding was nothing less than a downright violation of the promises he had so lately and so solemnly given to the clergy. Nor was he more scrupulous in performing those he had made to the laity; for, instead of granting them free liberty of hunting, he prosecuted several of the nobility on the old forest laws, with great severity. These steps excited great clamours in the nation, and provoked the earl of Gloucester to break his oath of allegiance, and to declare in favour of Maud, to whose court he forthwith repaired, to carry the designs he had formed in her behalf into execution.

Normandy had, ever since the time of the first William, been considered as an appenage to the English crown, and as such Stephen resolved to assert his right to that duchy. In the beginning of the year 1137, therefore, he went over to the continent, attended by several of the English nobility.

His presence was, indeed, more particularly necessary there at this juncture, as the Normans, upon the death of Henry I. were divided in their of tyranny and rebellion. A nobleman who either was, or conceived himself to be affronted by the court, retired to his castle, where he shut himself up, renounced his allegiance to the crown, and ruled with despotic sway among all his dependents, in open defiance to the laws of the land, and to the power of the sovereign; nor could he, frequently, be reduced to obedience without a considerable expence of blood and treasure, or even sometimes endangering the constitution. Stephen, in order to preserve himself in the possession of the crown by obliging the nobles and leading men of the kingdom, had granted them almost every thing they asked, and among the rest the liberty to fortify their houses and castles. In consequence of this permission the old castles were not only repaired and fortified, but such an immense number of new ones were built, that, in a short time, there were no less than fifteen hundred fortresses in different parts of the kingdom.

choice of a sovereign. The imperious behaviour of Matilda had alienated most hearts from her cause, as the people saw no prospect of living happily under the government of a woman who seemed to look upon those beneath her in a little better light than beasts of burthen, whose lives or services were hardly worthy her regard. As to Stephen, they looked upon him as sufficiently rewarded with the throne he filled; and besides, his elder brother, Theobald, had an incontestable priority of birth over him, and consequently was first entitled to their allegiance. Accordingly, the principal of the nobility and commons of that country made him a tender of the sovereignty, which he as readily accepted, as an offer he had never flattered himself with receiving.

Such were the dispositions of the people of Normandy in general; but Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, and husband of the empress Maud, considered things in a very different point of light; and whatever right the Normans might imagine they had to dispose of their duchy in favour of the person of their choice, he rested himself upon the incontestable right of his wife, as heiress to Henry, and resolved to support it by force of arms. He accordingly took the field with a numerous army, and soon reduced Argentune, Donfront, and several other strong places: but in his projects he seemed to forget that he was in a country over which he hoped shortly to rule, and behaved more like the freebooter and lawless invader, than the prince who asserted his right to a kingdom; for he suffered his soldiers to exercise the most brutal ravages, which so exasperated the Normans, that, rising suddenly against him, they cut off near a thousand of his followers. This, and the news of a rebellion raised against him in his own dominions of Anjou, obliged him to quit Normandy hastily, and by this retreat he lost all his interest in that country, save only a few towns still held by the empress.

Previous, however, to the departure of Geoffrey, count Theobald, despairing of being able to make head against such a powerful antagonist in the field, and finding that the Normans daily grew cool towards him, in proportion as his adversary had success in the campaign, and being moreover of an indolent and unwarlike disposition, had retired to the court of the French king, who encouraged him with promises of succours the ensuing year.

Things were in this situation in Normandy when Stephen appeared there as a third competitor for that duchy, and by his presence carried every thing before him. The dignity of king of England gave him a superior weight in the opinion both of the populace and of the nobility; the former imagining that they should reap great honour and advantage by the annexing of their duchy to so respectable a crown as that of England; and the latter, who had estates in this country, seeking only their own interests, which they knew must suffer in England if they sided with either Geoffrey or Theobald against Stephen. Thus the vanity of the people and the interested views of the great barons procured him a favourable reception in the duchy.

The earl of Gloucester, upon his retiring from the English court, had entered into a negotiation with the earl of Anjou, to whom he surrendered the town of Falaise, and the treasures of the late king in Normandy, which he had left in his hands. Stephen, apprized of this, and several other designs of the earl to oppose him, resolved, if possible, to get him into his power: with this view he employed one William de Ypres, a person on whom, on account of the signal services he had rendered him, he placed the most unlimited confidence; this man Stephen employed to intercept the earl, if possible, and take him prisoner, or else to dispatch him. But the earl getting scent of the plot against him, took another road to that which he had given out, and thus escaped the snare laid for him. Stephen was now sensible that his plot was discovered, and therefore, with a policy peculiar to himself, he desired a conference with Robert, under a safe-guard; when, instead of going about to exculpate himself, he, with an apparent frankness, confessed the mean design he had formed, expressed the greatest contrition for it, and, in fine, made such warm professions of friendship and regard for the earl, that, entirely dazzled by this specious sincerity, the latter proposed a form of oath to Stephen, which he took without the least hesitation, and whereby he solemnly promised never to attempt the like piece of treachery for the time to come. This was done in presence of the archbishop of Rouen, who thereupon joined the hands of the king and Robert together, in sign of reconciliation and future amity. After this, Stephen behaved to the earl with all the exterior of frankness and friendship; but Robert soon perceived there was no sincerity at the bottom, and that the king was daily circumscribing his power, and stripping him of his possessions.

Stephen's next step was to detach the French king from the cause of Theobald, if it could by any means be done. He knew, that so long as the latter was patronized by the court of France, he could never hope to come at the peaceable possession of the duchy, which being a fief of that crown, no one could receive the investiture but by the consent of the king of France as lord paramount. A round sum of money at length gained Stephen all that he desired: the king of France consented to an interview, at which Stephen obtained the investiture of the duchy of Normandy for his son Eustace, and a renewal of the league between the two courts of France and England, made in the time of his predecessor Henry. As to Theobald, finding himself thus deserted, he compromised affairs with his ambitious brother, by resigning his claim for an annual stipend of a thousand marks.

This interview, and the peace consequent upon it, happened in May, 1137; and Stephen having gained this essential point, had not the least doubt but that he should be able to make his cause good against the earl of Anjou. Accordingly he marched to besiege Argentune, the most important place Geoffrey held in Normandy; but when the two armies came in sight of each other, a quarrel happened among the mercenary troops, of which the king's army was chiefly composed. This obliged him to desist from prosecuting his design against Argentune, and even made it necessary to hearken to terms of accommodation with Plantagenet, to whom he agreed to pay an annuity of five thousand marks, as an equivalent for his claim to the duchy, and to leave him in possession of what he had taken in Normandy.

This peace, though far from being advantageous or honourable for Stephen, was very necessary at this time, as he had lately received advice of a conspiracy to place the king of Scots on the throne of England, and to massacre all the Normans on a certain day, the better to secure this new accession.

That David had any views upon the English crown does not seem to have been clearly made out, and there is great reason to believe that the whole affair had been greatly exaggerated to Stephen by his regency. Several persons, however, were apprehended on suspicion, and capitally punished.

The reader may recollect, that upon the ill treatment which young Henry, the son of David, had met with from the English nobles, on account of the high distinction shewn him by Stephen, the king of Scots had ordered him to return home, which he did, after having signed as a witness to the charter of Oxford; but, before he set out for Scotland, he pressed Stephen, in the most earnest manner, to put him in possession of those lands and honours for which he had done him homage at the peace of Durham; but Stephen put him off, upon frivolous pretences, and the young prince parted with great discontent, and returned home full of complaints to his father, who, from that instant, resolved to maintain his right, and that of his son, to their possessions in England, as peers of that realm. These then were the real motives, exclusive of the fealty he had sworn to the empress Maud, that induced David to invade England. To this he was moreover encouraged by the general disaffection the English began to shew to Stephen's government, on account of the little regard he paid to the charter he had granted them. David assembled a numerous army, and was on the point of falling upon Northumberland, when the venerable Thurstan, archbishop of York, desiring to avert the calamities that threatened his country, prevailed upon the Scottish king and his son to give him a meeting at Roxborough, near the frontiers of both kingdoms; when he exerted his pious endeavours so effectually, that both princes agreed to suspend hostilities till Stephen should return to England, and give a final answer in regard to the investiture of Northumberland, which the Scottish kings had enjoyed ever since the time of Edward the Elder.

Stephen, informed of this situation of affairs, left Normandy, and arrived in England about the middle of December, 1137. No sooner was he landed than he was met by deputies from the king of Scots, who demanded the investiture of the county of Northumberland for the prince-royal, their master's son; which Stephen flatly refused: whereupon the deputies declared, in their master's name, that the truce he had consented to at the interposition of archbishop Thurstan, was at an end, and the English king's refusal, the first commencement of hostilities.

In the beginning of February, 1138, Stephen advanced against the Scots with a strong army; but David, not chusing to trust to the issue of a battle in a strange country, retreated to Roxborough, whither the English king followed him; but finding it impossible to bring him to an action, and fearing, that if he kept the field longer, he might endanger the loss of his crown, he repassed the Tweed, and retreated with hasty marches towards his own dominions, where his presence was become particularly necessary, several of the great barons having fortified their castles†, and declared against him, alleging, as an excuse for their insurrection, that they could not consider themselves as safe in their lives and properties under a king who had so early broken through his coronation oath and charter, by divesting several of his chief nobles of their estates, seizing upon the vacant church-livings, and advancing foreigners to the first posts of distinction in the kingdom; and therefore they determined to recant the oath of allegiance they had given to him, and to abide by that they had formerly sworn to the empress Maud. And here I cannot help giving the opinion of William of Malmesbury on this occasion, as it appears perfectly agreeable to truth, the known depravity of human nature, and the particular circumstances of those times: "Few or none (says he) of the English nobility, except Robert, earl of Gloucester, who rebelled at this time, acted upon principle." And, indeed, the pretence they made use of, was no other than a cloak for their private resentments; the true reason of their disgust was their not being rewarded in the manner they expected.

Stephen was chagrined at this defection; but not being a person to shrink at the prospect of difficulties, he resolved to oppose force to perfidy; and therefore, immediately upon his return to England, he laid siege to the castle of Hereford, and pushed his operations so powerfully, that it soon fell into his hands. The reduction of Shrewsbury soon followed; and Dover castle, terrified by the examples made of the garrisons of the two other places, whom Stephen had ordered to be hung up, was surrendered by its governor, Wattelyn.

The earl of Gloucester now openly declared for the revolvers, and sent a message to Stephen, giving him to understand, that upon consulting his conscience, he found that he could not pay allegiance to any other person as sovereign of England, but the empress Matilda and her husband, and therefore redemanded the homage he had sworn to Stephen. Upon this renunciation of allegiance, the king seized upon all his great estates in England, and levelled several of his castles with the ground.

While those things were transacting in England, David, king of Scotland, taking advantage of Stephen's absence, again invaded Northumberland, after Easter, 1138; and after having ravaged the country for some time, penetrated as far as Northallerton, in Yorkshire, where, being met by an English army, under the command of William, earl of Albemarle, accompanied by Walter Espee, Roger Mowbray, Robert de Brice, Barnard de Baliol, Walter de Gant, and most of the northern barons, on the twenty-second of August a bloody battle ensued, called the Battle of the Standard, from the famous standard erected on this occasion by the English, who had all together entered into an association to stand or fall by one another. Of this standard we have the following description, in the prior of Hexham and Rievallensis: in a sort of wheel-carriage they had erected the mast of a small ship, on the top of which was placed a silver cross (or according to others, a pix †), and all round the pole were hung the banners of St. Peter, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfred.

Around this fanatic ensign the English were drawn up in a firm compacted body, the front being composed of pikemen and archers intermixed, to receive the first shock of the enemy; who, holding a council of war about the manner of beginning the engagement, disagreed in their sentiments: David and most of his nobility were of opinion to begin the attack with the archers and well-armed part of the forces, who were an equal match to the English; but the Galloway men, who were descendants from the ancient Britons, and, like them, fought without any defensive armour, and with slight weapons of offence, fit only for parties of incursion, deemed it as their right to begin the onset, presuming that their natural courage would more than make amends for the defect of armour. This claim occasioned a warm dispute between Alan de Percy and the earl of Stratherne, which being told to king David, he, fearing the ill consequences of a quarrel at this critical juncture, hastily gave orders for the Galloway men to take their post in the van, and begin the engagement. The second line was commanded by his son, a prince of great beauty, valour, and merit; he had under him a body of knights and archers, together with the militia of Cumberland and Tweedale, and was supported by Eustace Fitz John, an English nobleman *, who was a great favourite of the late king Henry, and had now deserted the party of Stephen, upon some ill usage he had received from him. The third body was composed of the Scotch Highlanders and the forces of Lothian and Murray, king David himself being at their head, with a party of English and Norman knights for the guard of his person.

The Gallovingians began the charge, according to their custom, with three huzzas, and fell upon the English archers with such fury, that they at first gave ground; but being sustained by the firmness of the rest of their body, and deriving great advantages from their armour in a close engagement, they so galled the enemy with their continual flight of arrows, that they could scarce see where to direct their blows; and the Galloway men, having lost their two commanders, Ulgric and Donald, were broke, and fled in great confusion.

The prince of Scotland then marched up to the attack with the second line, and fell on with such incredible fury, that in a very short time he pierced through part of the English army even to their very rear; while the English, terrified with the impetuosity of his attack, were on the point of quitting the field, had not an experienced veteran stopped them by an artful stratagem; for cutting off the head of one of the slain, and erecting it on the point of a spear, he called aloud, "Behold the head of the Scottish king!" This brought the English on again, who renewed the battle with redoubled vigour. On the other hand, the Scots, thinking their king slain, were struck with such a panic that they no longer made any resistance, but took to flight on all sides; so that king David, who had hitherto fought on foot, now finding himself left in a manner alone, was prevailed upon to mount on horseback and retreat, which he did, accompanied by his knights, in good order. The runaways seeing the royal banner waving in the air, immediately concluded that the report of their king's death was false, and rallying, joined him in such numbers as made them terrible to their pursuers, who were now convinced, that however they might have been put to flight by a stratagem, they were resolved to retrieve their character by their bravery; and declining any farther pursuit, they suffered David to retire unmolested to Carlisle, where he remained two days in great anxiety concerning the fate of his son, of whom he could hear no tidings.

That gallant prince, after breaking through the English ranks that were opposed to him, had passed beyond the standard, and fell upon a party of cavalry, posted behind the main body, whom he drove before him the space of two furlongs, supposing that he was followed by the rest of his forces; but finding himself at length with a few of his followers only, in the midst of the English troops, he made them throw away their badges of distinction, and mixing with the enemy as if a part of their corps, found means at last to get from them undiscovered, and passing through bye-ways, at length reached the king his father at Carlisle, who received him with the greatest joy, after having given him over as slain or taken prisoner. The Scots lost no great number of men in the battle, but several thousands of those that fled dispersedly, were slain in the different counties through which they endeavoured to make their way to Scotland.

Stephen was so well pleased with this victory, and with the conduct of his generals, that he conferred on William, earl of Albemarle, who commanded in chief, the additional title of earl of Yorkshire; and bestowed the earldom of Derby on Robert de Ferrieres, who had also greatly signified himself in the late engagement.

The king of Scots, on his part, not daunted by his late defeat, after resting for some days at Carlisle, renewed his invasions into England, and laid siege to the castle of Werk, which he took, after an obstinate defence.

In the mean time, Albert, bishop of Ostia, the pope's legate in England, interposed his good offices, in order to bring about a peace between the contending potentates; and Matilda, the wife of Stephen, who was niece to David, king of Scots, joining her persuasions to those of the legate, a truce was at length agreed upon for a few months, and a definitive treaty of peace was concluded the next year: the terms of the agreement were, that the prince-royal of Scotland should be put in possession of the whole county of Northumberland, excepting only the towns of Newcastle and Bamborough, for which he was to have an equivalent in the southern counties. These articles being ratified and confirmed, the barons of Northumberland did homage to the Scottish prince, who attended Stephen in his return to court as a peer of the realm.

The affairs of the North being thus happily settled, Stephen had now leisure to direct his attention to what was transacting in Normandy, where the earl of Gloucester had publicly declared for the empress Maud, who, with several of her friends, had taken up arms, and were making great preparations for invading England. Whereupon Stephen found it necessary to send a body of forces over to Normandy, under the command of the earl of Mellent and William de Ypres; but the two generals soon found that the adverse party was too strong for them to have any hopes of success, if they came to extremities: remaining, therefore, inactive, they beheld several of the principal towns and cities submitting to the enemy, without being able to oppose them; and, indeed, so general was the defection in that duchy, that Stephen had scarce a single place of defence left, excepting the city of Rouen.

In the beginning of the year 1139, Stephen undertook the siege of Ludlow castle*, a garrison belonging to Robert de Paganel; but with so little success that he abandoned it, and repaired to Oxford, where he called a great council, in order to rectify the flagrant abuse that the great men in general had made of the permission granted them to erect castles upon their estates, and fortify them. Among these the bishops had not been the least forward, inasmuch that Stephen found they had in a manner garrisoned the kingdom against himself: resolved, therefore, not to be a nominal king only, he waited but for a favourable opportunity to strip them of their exorbitant power; and a quarrel that happened between the followers of the bishop of Salisbury and those of Allan, earl of Brittany, about lodgings, in which some of the latter were killed, gave him the most plausible handle he could desire, for putting his designs in execution. Accordingly he summoned the prelate to attend him in the council, and answer for the riotous behaviour of his men, who had been the aggressors. Thither the bishop repaired, accompanied by his two nephews, Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, and Nigel, bishop of Ely, with such a numerous train of followers as excited the indignation of the other courtiers, especially the earl of Mellent, who insinuated to Stephen, that he could never be secure of his crown while the prelates were suffered to keep such a number of strong holds in their hands, and to entertain such numerous retinues. Upon the appearance of the three bishops, the king insisted that they should deliver up all their castles into his hands; and upon their discovering a reluctance to comply with these commands, he ordered Roger and Alexander to be committed to close custody: as to the bishop of Ely, he made his escape, and retired to his castle in the Devizes, determined to hold out to the last extremity; but William de Ypres being immediately sent after him, with a numerous force, took with him the other two bishops, and erecting a gallows in sight of the castle, threatened to hang them both thereon, unless the garrison immediately surrendered. Nigel, under these circumstances, could not hold out any longer; but having made his submission, he and the other prelates were forced to purchase their liberty by delivering all their castles into the king's hands; who, by this bold but impolitic step, brought the resentment of the whole body of the clergy upon him, which, in the sequel, proved the ruin of his affairs †.

Sacrilege, persecution, and violation of the privileges of holy church was now all the cry; the deluded people were taught to believe that religion itself was in danger through the attack that had been made upon its ministers; and to such a height did the general murmur and discontent rise, that the bishop of Winchester, Stephen's brother, who had been lately vested with the legatine authority, found himself obliged to convoke a general synod of the clergy at Winchester, on the twenty-ninth of August, 1139, and summoned the king to appear thereat in person. Stephen, however, who was the last person in the world to suffer himself to be priest-ridden, instead of obeying this insolent summons, sent in his stead one Aubrey de Vere, the most learned lawyer of his age, who, in a speech that did honour to his heart and abilities, justified the king's conduct in what he had done, shewed the council that the measures he had taken were founded on justice, and agreeable to the tenor of the Gospel: he observed, that the bishops had been seized, not as prelates, but as peers of the realm, who had justly incurred their sovereign's displeasure by their insolent and overbearing carriage, which had furnished sufficient cause to suspect them of favouring the designs of the enemies of the government: he farther added, that castles were not allowed the bishops by the canons of the church; were irreconcilable with their functions, as the preachers of peace, and could be looked upon in no other light than as the sanctuaries of disloyalty and the asylums of rebellion." This spirited remonstrance of de Vere so nettled the clergy, that they were about to pronounce an ecclesiastical anathema upon the king and his adherents; but Aubrey, who came prepared for the worst, gave them to understand in a very plain manner, that the first person who should presume to pronounce any spiritual interdict against his sovereign lord and theirs, should never live to behold the fruits of his insolence. Such a resolute and noble declaration brought the rebellious spirit of the prelates a little down; the meeting was adjourned to the next day, and in the evening the legate and the principal clergy had an interview with the king, at which mutual concessions being made with equal insincerity on both sides, the storm dispersed, an apparent calm ensued, and the synod was dissolved the next day, without carrying any of the points for which it had met.

But Stephen soon found the ill effects of this difference with the bishops; for the empress Maud, being informed of the disturbances in the kingdom, thought this the most proper time for asserting her right to the English crown; and accordingly she, with the earl of Gloucester, came over about the end of September, 1139, and landed at Arundel castle, in Suffex, with no greater retinue than one hundred and forty men; a very inconsiderable force

* In conducting the operations of this siege, he gave a remarkable proof of his courage and humanity: the prince of Scotland, who attended him in this expedition, having ventured too near the enemy's works, was like to have been taken off his horse by means of an iron hook let down from the walls at the end of a rope; but Stephen, seeing the danger he was in, boldly interposed, and rescued him, at the hazard of his own life: an action which redounded equally to the honour of the king and of the young prince for whom he shewed such an affection.

† Several authors tell us, that Stephen's army found an immense treasure in some of those castles, which proved of infinite service to the king afterwards, in purchasing the friendship of Lewis the Young, then king of France.

for such an undertaking as she came upon; but she relied on a powerful aid from the malecontents, with whom the whole kingdom swarmed at this time, the common people, who had been taught that the main of religion consisted in supporting the clergy in every thing they did, being ready to take up arms upon the first appearance of a leader to head them.

Stephen, upon the first news of this landing, advanced to Arundel, where the queen-dowager, who resided there, had received the empress with great demonstrations of affection; and the earl of Gloucester, thinking his sister perfectly safe under such a protection, left her and went to Bristol, in order to forward his designs in that part of the country. Upon the approach of the king, the dowager sent a messenger to desire him not to take amiss what she had done in giving the empress a reception, as she had taken that step wholly out of regard to her as a daughter-in-law, and from the respect due to her high rank and quality, and not in any wise as being willing to encourage or favour her as his competitor for the crown; beseeching him, at the same time, not to besiege her there, but to give her leave to retire to some other place, where he was at liberty to act as he might see proper, and she should be no longer bound by the rules of hospitality, as now, to defend a person who was become her guest. Stephen behaved on this occasion with a gallantry that bordered upon folly, for he not only complied with the dowager's request, but gave Matilda her choice of what place in his dominions she chose to retire to. She named Bristol; and the king ordered his own brother, Walleran, earl of Mellent, to escorte her thither in a manner becoming her dignity. The earl accordingly conducted her as far as Carlisle, where she was received by the bishop, and by him conducted to the earl of Gloucester, who came out of Bristol to meet her, with a body of forces.

No sooner was she arrived at Bristol than she openly declared her title, and asserted her claim to the crown of England, upon which the people flocked from all parts of the country to pay their allegiance to her; but what principally strengthened her party was her being recognized by Milo, or Miles, high-constable of England, or, in the style of that age, captain of the guard, who, on her removal from Bristol, not to be in the same place with her brother, gave her the castle of Gloucester, which he commanded, for the place of her residence, and honourably subsisted her at his own expence; at the same time disclaiming his allegiance to Stephen, and declaring openly for her.

Stephen in the mean time, hoping to crush his enemies before they could assemble all their forces, laid siege to Wallingford; but finding it was like to hold out longer than his affairs would permit him to stay before it, he converted the siege into a blockade, by building two forts opposite to it, and marched to Trowbridge. In his way he reduced the castles of Colne and Malmesbury, which had declared for the empress. Trowbridge also promising to cut him out more work than he expected in its reduction, and fearing that the earl of Gloucester might come upon him with a superior force, he raised the siege, and marched for London, where his chief dependence lay, in order to recruit his fatigued troops, and support the drooping spirits of his party: indeed, at this time,

Stephen's only adherents seem to have been a few barons and his foreign mercenaries, who, though ill paid, continued to serve him with great fidelity.

This retreat of the king gave an opportunity to Milo to march and attack the garrisons which Stephen had left in the two forts before Wallingford, which the constable took by storm, and put every one therein to the sword, and raised the siege of that place. For this important service he was by the empress created earl of Hereford. Soon after he laid siege to Worcester; but the castle made so vigorous a defence that he was obliged to abandon his enterprize, and retreat, after having committed several unmanly acts of cruelty and revenge upon the miserable inhabitants of the neighbouring country.

The king having by this time recruited his army, and gained some addition to his party, left London and set out for Oxford; from thence he proceeded to Gloucester, and afterwards to Salisbury, where he arrived about Christmas, and halted there to keep his holidays, which to him were days of grief and mourning, on account of the bad situation of his affairs, and the still more calamitous state of his subjects in general, who now found themselves exposed to all the horrors of civil war.

In the month of January, 1140, the king left Salisbury, and repaired to Reading, from whence he marched with a body of forces to seize the castle belonging to Nigel, bishop of Ely, which that prelate quitted at his approach, and fled for protection to the earl of Gloucester. After having secured this fortress, he ravaged the neighbourhood of Tewkesbury, and attacked Hereford with a numerous army, but was obliged to abandon it quickly after, and retire without glory or success, to Winchester. During his stay at Salisbury, he created William Fitz Beauchamp high-constable of England, in the room of Milo.

About this time we find a match concluded between Eustace, Stephen's son, and the princess Constance, sister to the French king, through the mediation of Matilda, Stephen's queen. By the marriage treaty, Lewis was to give the investiture of the duchy of Normandy to Eustace, as a dowry with his sister; and the king of England was, in return, to pay the French monarch a considerable sum of money.

During these transactions, the strong castle of the Devises was seized by one Robert Fitz Hubert, a man of an abandoned and profligate character, who, on this occasion declared neither for the king nor the empress, but kept the fortress in his own hands, making his boast, that with some forces he had sent for out of Flanders, he should quickly be in a condition to render himself formidable to both parties. The earl of Gloucester, upon hearing of this, sent the governor of Marlborough castle against him, with a strong force, who having gotten the audacious rebel into his hands, sent him to the earl, who immediately gave orders to hang him up in sight of the garrison, hoping thereby to terrify them into submission. The castle afterwards submitted to the empress, who likewise soon afterwards was put in possession of that of Bedford, which had been surprized by her fast friend and general, earl Milo. The earl of Gloucester also made an attempt upon Bath, but miscarried in his design, after having received a rude check from a strong party of the royalists, headed by Gilbert de Talbot. Abandoning, doing therefore that part of the country, he marched against Nottingham, where he met with better success, the garrison surrendering after a short resistance. During the confusion consequent upon the delivery and taking possession of the town, a fire by some accident broke out, which in a short time reduced it wholly to ashes.

In the mean time the bishop of Winchester reflecting upon the calamities which his country already suffered, and those with which it was threatened, began now to be sensible of his error in having fomented these disturbances by the high hand which he had carried against the king his brother, in the affair of the bishops: his own good understanding dictated to him that he must necessarily be involved in the common ruin, should the empress's party succeed, and his brother be driven from the throne; he therefore resolved to stand by him: and, in order to regain his confidence by some important service, he found means to draw together to Winchester a considerable number of barons and principal men who were friends to Maud, and having got them in his power, detained them prisoners till such time as they delivered up their castles to the king.

After this he laboured to bring about an accommodation between the contending parties; and accordingly we find that some time in this summer commissioners were appointed on both sides; but as the empress seemed determined to put the issue of her claim upon the decision of the church, and as Stephen knew very well, that, on account of the late heart-burnings between him and the prelates, the event would not at all terminate to his advantage, he broke off the conference, and each side prepared anew to decide their cause by the sword.

The war was carried on with various success till September, and this wretched land was over-run with mercenaries, brought by both sides from different parts of the continent. Historians are unanimous in representing the whole kingdom as the theatre of anarchy and confusion, every county, every town, and almost every individual declaring for one or the other of the competitors, as biased by interest or affection. The great lords attacked each other's territories with all the rage of barbarian freebooters: castles, houses, churches were every day levelled to the ground, or lighted up in flames, to gratify private pique and animosity; the unhappy wretches who were made prisoners on these occasions, were inhumanly sold for slaves, and frequently more inhumanly massacred, unless they could purchase the shadow of life and liberty by parting with every means of subsistence, to gratify the avarice of their cruel captors. It must, indeed, be observed, in justice to the king and the earl of Gloucester, that they neither, by their principles or practice, countenanced such outrages, though at times they were obliged to connive at them, dreading to punish their friends lest they should alienate their affections.

About the latter end of September the bishop of Winchester, who had greatly at heart the effecting an accommodation as soon as possible, went over to France, in order to engage the French king to interest himself in setting a negotiation on foot; but as the church was here again to have the principal direction of the terms, Stephen, for the same reasons as before, rejected the proposal.

In the beginning of the year 1141, the earl of Gloucester concluded a treaty of marriage between his daughter and Ralph de Gernons, earl of Chester, by which the latter was entirely brought over to the interest of the empress. and hearing that Stephen had just left Lincoln, where he had passed the preceding Christmas, the earl resolved to surprize that town, and associated with him in the expedition William de Romara, his half-brother. They met with the desired success, and Lincoln fell into their hands. But the inhabitants of that city, being firmly attached to Stephen, immediately sent him word of the fate of their city, intimating at the same time, that, with his assistance, they made no doubt of being able to wrest it again out of the hands of the enemy. The king, on receiving this advice, and knowing that Lincoln, where he had so many friends, could not be defended by the few troops that the Empress had in it, resolved to march forthwith to recover this important place, and sent the townsmen word that they might rely on his being speedily with them, at the head of such a force as should soon free them from the power of their present masters. And, indeed, Stephen exerted himself so well on this occasion, and made such surprizing marches, that the earl of Chester had but just time to retire into the castle, which the king immediately invested; however, the earl found means to escape, and get to the earl of Gloucester, when it was resolved in the council of the empress to relieve the castle, or come to a decisive battle with Stephen.

The two earls, therefore, put themselves in march with all the forces they could draw together, and made such expedition, that they were very nigh coming upon the king unawares, who had not the least conception of their being so near; the earl's army having forded the river Trent, a thing Stephen thought impracticable.

In this situation of the two armies it was next to an impossibility not to come to a speedy engagement; and accordingly both sides set about making the necessary preparations for that purpose. Stephen was the first who drew out his troops in battle array, which, though inferior in numbers to that of the empress, he thought this disadvantage more than counterbalanced by the valour of his soldiers and the experience and skill of his general officers, among whom William de Ypres, a Fleming, deservedly held the first rank. The king drew up his forces in four lines; and, resolving to fight on foot, put himself at the head of his main body, consisting of two corps of infantry, and placed his horse in two wings, one composed chiefly of Flemings, under the command of de Ypres, assisted by the earls of York and Albemarle; the other of Bretons and English, headed by the count de Mellent, Hugh Bigod, earl of Norfolk, with the earls of Northampton and Surry.

The earl of Gloucester drew up his army much in the same manner, himself commanding on foot at the head of his main body; one of his wings was composed of those who had been stripped of their honours and estates by Stephen, and were animated to the combat by their personal injuries; the other was made up of the vassals of the earl of Chester, under his own conduct. William de Ypres began the battle, by falling upon a body of Welsh, whom the earl of Gloucester had posted on the outside of the left wing, to serve as a corps de reserve, and fall fall upon the enemy's flank after the engagement was begun; these men, though very brave in their persons, were too slightly armed for a pitched battle, and therefore were presently put to the rout; but their pursuers, being heedless in chase, suffered themselves to be charged in flank by the earl of Chester, and were so entirely broken as never again to be able to rally. At the same time the earl of Gloucester, taking advantage of this success, fell so furiously upon the king's infantry, that, unable to withstand the impetuosity of the shock, and deserted by their cavalry, they were obliged to take to flight also.

Stephen now found himself left as it were alone, in the midst of the enemy; nevertheless, disdain- ing to turn his back, he continued to dispute every inch of ground against an amazing superiority, till at length, having shivered his sword in a thousand pieces, he fought with his truncheon, until he received a blow with a stone, which struck him to the ground: this being perceived by a knight of the enemy's party, named William de Kaimes, he ran in and closed with the king just as he was raising himself upon his knees, after having a little recovered his senses, when, clapping the point of his sword to his throat, he threatened him with instant death if he would not surrender; but Stephen, not in the least dismayed, peremptorily refused to resign himself into an ignoble hand, and called out for the earl of Gloucester: happily that nobleman was near at hand, and instantly running up, took the royal captive under his protection, whom he treated with the greatest respect all the time he was in his custody; and the castle of Lincoln now falling to the lot of the victors, the king was lodged therein for that night, after which he was conveyed to the empress Maud, who, at the time of this battle, was in Gloucester; and no sooner had she gotten Stephen in her power, than, forgetting the tribute of gratitude due to him for his former generous behaviour to her, she ordered him to be confined in the castle of Bristol, and ignominiously laid in chains. This battle, which seemed to render Maud the sole and undisputed mistress of the English crown, was fought on the second of February, A.D. 1141, being Sexagesima Sunday.

The empress took every step that she judged most likely to improve this great advantage: she immediately set out on a progress through the several parts of the kingdom where her friends had already declared for her. Indeed all England had abandoned the captive king, excepting London and the county of Kent, in which his queen Matilda, his son Eustace, and his favourite William de Ypres, still maintained their authority.

While her fortunes were as yet unsettled, Maud was wise enough to suffer herself to be guided by the counsels of the earl of Gloucester, who failed not to represent to her on this occasion, that all the success she had gained, or the numbers who declared for her, would avail her cause but little, unless she could find some means of winning over the bishop of Winchester to her party, who, in consequence of the legatine power he had received from the pope, was at the head of the church, and could dispose the clergy either for or against her; and their example would have a great influence on the common people. Resolving, therefore, to detach this prelate on any terms from his brother, she went to make him a visit at his palace at Winchester, where she so wrought upon his fickle and ambitious mind, that, regardless of the ties of brotherly affection, or of the rules of common policy, which should have kept him from lending his assistance to those who wanted to remove the sceptre for ever out of his family, he suffered himself to be prevailed on to give the empress and the earl of Gloucester a public meeting on the third Sunday of Lent, in this same year, on an open plain near Winchester. Here they held a conference, in which the empress promised, if he would espouse her cause, that she would surrender into his hands the whole government of church and state, be wholly guided by his advice in the disposal of all offices of profit and dignity, and, moreover, leave to him the entire department of filling up all vacant bishoprics and other church-preferments. These promises she offered to bind by an oath, whereupon Henry, who was restrained by no principles of honour, readily embraced the proposal, and took an oath of allegiance to her, having first exacted her's for the faithful performance of what she had promised.

Loyalty, brotherly love, and patriotism having been thus infamously bartered away on the side of the prelate, for worldly honours and power, he the next day received the empress with great pomp in the cathedral church, where he solemnly excommunicated all those who should oppose her, and promised full absolution of their sins to any one who should pay obedience to her. The gaining over the legate was a great point secured; but still there was one of great consequence remaining to be settled, which was the getting Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, to recognize Maud's title: this prelate, upon some scruples of conscience relative to the legality of swearing fealty to two different competitors for the throne of his country, had kept away from the conference held between Henry and Maud. The absence of so great a subject could not but give her and her party some uneasiness; therefore, the empress having removed with her court to the monastery of Wilton, the legate sent a message to the archbishop, requiring him to repair thither to a personal conference, when such arguments should be laid before him as would effectually remove all his present scruples. The archbishop obeyed; but when it was proposed to him to acknowledge the empress Maud as sovereign of England, he declared that his conscience would not permit him to do such a thing, until Stephen, the sovereign to whom he had already sworn allegiance, should himself absolve him from that tie, and leave him at liberty to act for himself: he therefore demanded leave to visit Stephen, in order to receive from his mouth the answer which was to determine his future proceedings. Accordingly, having received permission from the empress, he repaired, attended by most of the clergy, and a great number of the laity, to Bristol, where that unhappy prince was confined, and whom they found ingloriously fettered like a common malefactor. Oppressed with his misfortunes, and seeing no prospect of their being terminated but by an untimely death, should he obstinately oppose the designs of those who had his fate in their hands, he consented to dispense with the archbishop's fealty, and told both him and the nobles, that he gave them free liberty to follow the current of the times. This concession, forced from him by the exigence of his circumstances, circumstances, was interpreted into an act of grace and free-will; and the archbishop, having gone through this farce, declared himself ready to join with the legate in what he had done.

The interest of the clergy being thus fully secured by the coming in of their two chiefs, Henry appointed a council to be held at Winchester, after Easter, and made use of the intervening time to bring over, by promises and threats, all such of the clergy whom he thought not sufficiently staunch to the cause he had taken in hand.

Matters and minds being properly prepared, the synod assembled on Monday, April 7, 1141. The meeting was very full, and the legate opened the session with a speech, which we have transmitted by William of Malmesbury, who was present, and which was to the following import.

"That having the honour to represent the pope in this kingdom of England, he had, in virtue of the pontifical authority, called together the English clergy to consult upon the most proper measures to be taken, for restoring peace to their troubled country, groaning beneath the miseries of domestic contention, and which he attributed to the tyranny and mal-administration of his brother Stephen. He then proceeded to expatiate on the blessings and happiness the subject enjoyed under the equitable administration of his uncle Henry of glorious memory: and having set forth the contrast in the most striking point of light, he went on to remind them, that this excellent prince had, a few years before his death, engaged all the bishops and barons of England and Normandy, to accept of the empress as their eventual sovereign on his decease, and to take an oath of fealty to her as such; and afterwards to her son Henry, in case of survivorship: that the case of the succession stood thus, when Henry died in Normandy. That the empress being out of England at the time of her father's decease, his brother Stephen was permitted to reign, in order to prevent the anarchy and disturbances generally attending an interregnum: that he himself (the legate) had plighted his faith for him, that he would pay all due reverence to holy church, support her rights, and repeal all such laws that were oppressive. But, alas! (added he) I have found myself miserably disappointed, and I both grieve and blush to confess what hath been his administration, how wickedly he hath connived at the licentious behaviour of all degrees of men, insomuch that in less than a year after his mounting the throne, virtue and peace abandoned this country, and lawless tyranny and oppression took their places: bishops have been imprisoned contrary to law, and forced to part with their estates; abbeyes have been set up to sale, and churches and religious houses plundered of the treasures set apart for the honour and service of God. All good men have been obliged to quit a court where vice lorded it untroubled, and the ear of the king was wholly possessed by evil counsellors. Many and oftentimes (added he) have I interposed with the most salutary remonstrances, and as often have they been rejected: and although I preserve for my brother all that affection which nearness of blood can claim, yet it is my duty to obey the orders of my eternal Father, and to prefer them to the interests of a carnal pro-pinquity: nay, the judgment of Heaven seems evidently to have overtaken my unhappy and ill-advised brother, by suffering him to be defeated and lose his liberty. I have, therefore (adds he), convened you by virtue of the apostolic power committed to me, to consult about the means of putting a stop to the calamities of this nation. This affair was yesterday examined in presence of most of the clergy, who ought doubtless to have a principal share in the election of a king, and, after the most serious and mature deliberation, we have resolved to acknowledge the empress for our sovereign: therefore, beseeching God to grant his blessing on our proceedings, I do hereby declare Maud, daughter of Henry I. of glorious and ever respectable memory, our queen and sovereign lady of this realm of England, requiring your allegiance and promise of standing by her with your lives and fortunes."

Such of the members who had not been let into the secret, were extremely surprized at the speech, and burnt with indignation to see the crown disposed of by a private cabal of churchmen, in so unprecedented a manner; nevertheless, being overawed by the great authority and power of the legate, no one chose to testify his dislike. The legate then acquainted them, that he had sent to the city of London, whose influence in public affairs was very great, to attend the council by its magistrates, and that he expected them as the next day, till which time he adjourned the assembly.

In effect, there seemed to be no other power in the nation capable of making head against the intolerable insolence of this assembly, who presumed, by a simple deputation from the pope of Rome, to dispose of the crown of this kingdom; a circumstance which cannot but reflect dishonour upon the lay nobles of those days, who suffered so audacious an insult upon the royal character and their own prerogatives: but, indeed, such was the divided state of the secularity, both nobles and commons, at this time, and such their mutual distrusts and jealousies, that, fearful of each other, they could not be brought to unite in the common cause of supporting their own consequence; while, on the contrary, the clergy, knit into one body under the legatine authority, carried all their points with a high hand. But to return.

The next day the deputies sent by the city of London arrived; but, instead of giving their assent to what had previously passed in the assembly, they peremptorily demanded, in the name of their constituents*, that the king should be instantly set at liberty. Henry, who expected this demand, was not in the least embarrassed by it, but, with a true prelati cal arrogance, told them, "that it ill-became the citizens of London, who were treated in England as noblemen, to take part with such who had deserted their lord in battle; had put him, by their evil counsels, upon dishonouring the church; who pretended an affection for the city of London merely to draw from its coffers all the money they could; and were even then endeavouring to involve both it and the nation in fresh troubles." This insidious harangue had little effect upon the deputies, who, with a steadiness that will ever do honour to themselves and those they represented, insisted upon their first demand; upon which the legate told them, that the matter had been already decided, and could not be altered; and so saying, was about to dissolve the synod, when one Christian, a chaplain to queen Maud, stood up and offered a paper to the legate, which taking into his hand, he read over to himself, and then told the assembly that it contained a matter not proper to be laid before them at that time, and was going to put it by, when the chaplain, with a noble resolution, snatching it out of his hand, read it aloud to those present, when it appeared to be a petition from the queen, earnestly beseeching the council to order the king her husband to be released from the duration in which he was held by his rebellious subjects, and to restore him to his throne, particularly calling upon the bishop of Winchester to remember the ties of blood, and the oath of allegiance, by which he was bound to his brother and his king. To this petition the legate gave the same short answer that he had given to the reiterated demand of the Londoners, who, finding how things went, took their leave, saying they would report to their principals the reply that had been given them. The legate, having thus fully accomplished his designs, dissolved the council the day following, being Thursday, April 10, having first excommunicated several that still adhered to the captive king, particularly William Martel, against whom Henry was highly incensed for having formerly intercepted and plundered his baggage.

The noble stand made by the city of London on this occasion plainly convinced the empress and her party, that nothing effectual could be done unless means could be found to bring this metropolis over to their interests. With this view Maud, leaving Winchester, where she then resided, went to Reading, and there held a splendid court. Among others who came to pay their compliments to her here, was Robert d'Oyley, governor of the castle of Oxford, who resigned that fortress into her hands; upon which she immediately went thither, to take possession of it, and, after some short stay, advanced to St. Alban's, her court being daily crowded with the resort of new comers to pay their homage, and acknowledge her for their sovereign. This amazing success, and, above all, the high degree of estimation in which the earl of Gloucester stood with the nation in general, brought a great many of the Londoners over to the side of the empress, so that those in her interest soon proved too strong for the royal party within that city, and it was resolved to leave Stephen to his fate, and make the best terms for themselves that they could. Accordingly a solemn deputation of the citizens waited upon Maud at St. Alban's, about the beginning of June, offering to recognize her title, and inviting her to repair to their city. The empress required not to be pressed on this head, and therefore immediately set out for London, attended by a pompous train of barons and other nobles, and was received into the city with every possible mark of respect.

The city of London having thus declared for Maud, she met with no farther opposition, and from that time was looked upon as queen of England, nothing being wanting but the ceremony of her coronation. In the mean while she exercised all other acts of sovereignty; but that impotence of mind which prosperity alone discovers, robbed her of all the fruits of her unwearied labours, and those of her friends and adherents: she was naturally of an insolent and haughty disposition, which shewed itself in her carriage on all occasions in which she did not put a restraint upon herself. She considered all petitions as so many commands, and thought that no human being had a right to examine into or direct her actions. Full of this spirit of pride and female obstinacy, and thinking herself secure of the crown beyond the possibility of a reverse, she resolved to shew her independency by flatly refusing every petition, and began by an instance which shewed her to have had either a weak head, or a very bad heart, and which exposed her to all the calamities and misfortunes she afterwards suffered in this island.

The wife of the deposed king, imagining that success would have softened the breast of the empress, applied to her in the most humble manner for her husband's release, promising that he would never for the future disturb her reign; that he would give up all pretensions to the crown; and, farthermore, to remove every possible cause of jealousy, was ready to embrace a monastic retirement. Such concessions in a person who had so lately enjoyed sovereign rule (and who, indeed, by such a meanness seemed almost unworthy of it) mollified all hearts (save that of Maud, threefold encompassed with ambition); and several great men of the kingdom joined their intercessions, but without effect: nay, even after the proposals made by Stephen's queen, in his name, had been debated in council, and that the earl of Gloucester, and David, king of Scots, approved of them, and were for setting him at liberty, the empress foolishly persisted in rejecting them; and even forbid the unfortunate Matilda to appear any more in her presence. But, as if this act of haughtiness and revengeful cruelty was not deemed sufficient to turn against her the stream of popularity, she drew upon herself the hatred of the citizens of London, which it was so much her interest to manage, by insolently refusing them the only thing they petitioned, and which had been faithfully promised them by the king her father, namely, to mitigate the severity of the Norman laws, and revive those of Edward the Confessor: and when, at an elegant entertainment to which that city invited her a few days after, the principal magistrates took an opportunity, in the name of the citizens, to lay before her their great poverty and distress, the effects of civil war and scarcity of provisions, praying to be eased a little of their taxes and heavy duties till a time of greater plenty; Maud, instead of giving them any relief, told them, with a countenance in which fury and disdain strove for the mastery, that since they had been so lavish of their money in supporting Stephen, it was the highest degree of insolence in them to expect any alleviation from her. In vain did the earl of Gloucester, and others of her faithful counsellors, represent the madness of such a procedure; her head was turned with power, and she looked upon all advice as an insult offered to her understanding and dignity.

The citizens were justly incensed and alarmed at this instance of pride and inflexibility in one who was on the point of ruling over them; they began to murmur loudly, and the nation in general to pity the distress of Stephen and his family: they thought they saw, and trembled at the prospect, the spirit of the first William that manifested itself so early in the deportment of his grand-daughter, and heartily repented the steps they had taken in her favour.

The bishop of Winchester, from the whole of his conduct, seems not to have really intended his brother's deposition (as, indeed, it is not natural to suppose he could, if we consider things only in a political light), but only to temporize with Maud, after the battle of Lincoln, when she was ready to fall upon him with all her force, and he unable to make any defence, his castles being utterly unprovided: and being, as we have already observed, a person of profound dissimulation, he continued to act the same part whilst the kingdom appeared to be devoted to her, reserving himself, and the discovery of his views, for a more favourable time, when he might be able to serve himself and family by serving his brother. The present universal discontent, occasioned by Maud's impolitic carriage, afforded him the opportunity he wished for, and accordingly he left no means unturned to foment the popular disgust and blow it into the flames of sedition: in this he succeeded so effectually, that he prevailed upon the principal citizens of London to engage in a plot for seizing the person of the empress. The earl of Gloucester, who had spies every where, was soon apprized of the association entered into, and used all means in his power to soothe the citizens, and fix them in the interests of his sister; but finding all his endeavours vain, and that they had conceived an irreconcilable aversion to her, he persuaded her to secure her person by flight, and before the design against her was ripe for execution; accordingly the empress, the king of Scots, the earl of Gloucester, and all the nobles of their party, withdrew to Oxford. No sooner had she quitted the city, than the enraged inhabitants fell upon her palace and stripped it of all its rich furniture which she had not time to remove in her precipitate retreat.

Whilst the empress staid at Oxford, in order to assemble an army, the legate retired to his palace of Winchester, which he fortified, determined to wait, without declaring himself, for the issue of events. Maud, who was not unacquainted with his real intentions, had recourse to that dissimulation of which he had set her an example, and, without appearing to suspect him of having had an hand in the late plot, sent her brother, the earl of Gloucester, under pretence of paying him a visit, to sound how he stood affected to her interest, who quickly found how matters were, by the cool reception Henry gave him, and therefore returned to Oxford, to give the empress an account of his negotiation.

Upon this she put herself at the head of her troops, and, attended by Robert and the king of Scotland, proceeded to Winchester, and encamped within a short mile of that city, from whence she sent orders to the bishop, who was then in his palace, to repair to a council she was about to hold in her camp; but Henry, guessing at her intent, evasively answered the messengers, "Parabole me. — I will make myself ready;" which they mistaking for an intent to comply with the summons, retired into another apartment, when the legate took advantage of their absence to step out at a postern-gate, and make his escape; and repairing in all haste to London, directed his nephew Eustace to assemble the men of Kent and Surry, in which he was assisted by William de Ypres, the fast friend to Stephen and his family. This being done, the legate openly declared in favour of the deposed king, and very soon found himself at the head of a very respectable body of forces; when, without losing any time, he marched directly for Winchester, being accompanied by Stephen's son Eustace and his queen Matilda, and made such expedition that the empress and her friends had but just time to shut themselves up in the castle, which Henry instantly invested.

The care the bishop had taken to store the castle with all sorts of ammunition, rendered the siege very long and difficult, the empress and her party making shift to hold out seven weeks, though under great difficulties; when at length, having no other prospect before their eyes but that of perishing with hunger or surrendering themselves to the legate, a thought which carried something worse than death with it, it was determined to force themselves a passage with their swords, and to run all hazards to convey the empress to some place of safety. With this design they committed the custody of her person to the main body of their forces, under the command of Reginald, brother to the earl of Gloucester, while Robert himself, at the head of only two hundred chosen followers, sallied forth to amuse the besiegers, and secure the retreat of the empress. This stratagem had the desired effect, for the gallant earl of Gloucester and his valiant corps found the enemy so much employed by the vigorous manner in which they sustained this unequal fight, that the empress had time to reach the town of Luggershall, in Wiltshire. The noble efforts of Robert in behalf of his sister proved fatal to himself, for being pursued as far as Stowbridge, he was there taken, together with the earl of Warren, upon a bridge which they were endeavouring to pass, and being committed to the charge of William de Ypres, was by him conveyed to Rochester, in Kent, that place being entirely in the possession of king Stephen's friends.

In the mean time Maud, finding the castle of Luggershall too ill provided for defence for her to trust her person there, after having a while reposed her wearied limbs, she got on horseback in man's disguise, and continued her flight to the castle of the Devizes, and from thence to Gloucester*, where she was joined by Milo, who had long served her with great fidelity.

The legate finding one part of his project frustrated by the escape of the empress, resolved, if possible, to get the earl of Gloucester over to the side of the king. With this view he sent persons to offer him the government of the whole realm under Stephen, if he would embrace that prince's party. But all their solicitations, or even the consideration of the state he was in, could not for an instant warp the integrity of this truly great nobleman. At length, being brought under a guard to

* Brompton, an historian who delights much in the marvellous, cannot resist the itch of romancing on this occasion, but very gravely tells us, that her flight coming to the ears of the legate, he sent a body of horse after her, who scoured the country round to prevent her escape, till the main body should come up; and that having intelligence of this, the empress, to escape captivity, caused herself to be put into a bier, in which she was safely conducted to Gloucester, without any one taking it into their heads to search such a vehicle.

Winchester, whither Stephen now came in full freedom, he was there exchanged for that monarch : and on this occasion they entertained each other with the most friendly discourse, mutually extolling one another's laudable qualities ; but at the same time openly declaring that each would maintain his interest against his antagonist so long as they had life or strength to wield the sword. This exchange happened about the end of September of this year, 1141, a year productive of the most surprising revolutions.

In the beginning of December following, Henry summoned a general synod of the clergy to meet at Westminster ; previous to which he had taken care to procure letters from the pope, in which his holiness blamed him for having so long neglected to restore his brother to the throne, and enjoined him for the future to use all his endeavours towards it, exhorting him to exert all power, ecclesiastical and secular, to accomplish the same.

These letters being read at the opening of the council, Stephen next appeared, and, in a set speech, complained of his imprisonment and the infidelity of his subjects, calling God to witness, at the same time, that he never willingly lent his hand to oppress his people, or ever denied them justice. The legate then entered into a vindication of his late conduct, and the frequent breach of his oaths : but this harangue proved very little satisfactory to the assembly, although they did not chuse to express their sentiments to the face of a person who had so great power both in ecclesiastical and civil affairs. Nevertheless, what the obsequious clergy, through a dastardly time-serving disposition, would not do, was amply made up by the courage and resolution of a lay deputy sent to the synod from the empress, who, standing up, entered a protest against the legate's proceedings, accused him of complicated perjury, affirming, " that it was upon his invitation, and his repeated letters, that the empress had come into England, having too readily trusted to his faithless promises : " nay, he had even the boldness to tell him, " that it was by his advice that his brother had met with such treatment ; " and farthermore charged him, " upon the faith he had sworn to the empress Maud as his sovereign and liege lady, to do nothing in that assembly against her title and dignity : " adding a great deal more, with no small acrimony of expression. To all which, however, the legate answered only by a profound silence, conscious guilt, or a policy beyond the depth of common comprehensions, sealing up his lips. The assembly soon after broke up, and their resolutions seem to have been highly in favour of the king. Before they rose, the legate denounced excommunication against the countess of Anjou and her adherents ; which struck every one with surprize and indignation, to find themselves liable to ecclesiastical censures so directly opposite to one another, according to the humour of this haughty priest.

Early in the year 1142, both parties prepared to pursue their operations with vigour ; but when the empress and her friends began to muster their forces, they found too late the ill effects which had been produced by the unseasonable pride and obstinacy of Maud : her party appeared considerably thinned ; the warmth of those who yet remained in her interest was sensibly cooled ; and it was next to a certainty that she could never hope to ascend the throne by the voices or assistance of the common people. At the same time Stephen, now at liberty, exerted himself in the strongest manner, and with such success, that he soon became superior to those who had so lately had his destiny in their hands. In this unpromising situation of affairs, Maud summoned a council of her principal friends at the Devizes, where it was resolved to call in a foreign aid to their support, and the earl of Gloucester was dispatched over to the continent to engage the earl of Anjou to come over with forces to the assistance of his wife : but Robert found that prince so fully employed in adjusting the embroiled state of his affairs in Normandy, that he could not persuade him to fall in with his proposal ; and all that he could obtain from him was to send over his eldest son, Henry, with a reinforcement of four hundred men*.

While the earl of Gloucester was thus engaged on the other side of the water, the empress's affairs grew worse and worse, and she at length shut herself up in the castle of Oxford, where she resolved to remain till the arrival of those succours she expected from her husband. Stephen hearing of this, and being willing to take advantage of Robert's absence, and the low state of the adverse party, had marched suddenly against Wareham castle, which was commanded by the earl of Gloucester's son William, and took that fortress by surprize. After which, by long and hasty marches, he came before Oxford, and that so suddenly that the empress had but just time to retire into the castle, and the city was abandoned to the king, who immediately took possession of it ; and hoping to finish the war at one stroke, by making himself master of Matilda's person, he laid siege to the castle, and pushed his operations with so much vigour, that, after several unsuccessful sallies, the empress was reduced to the greatest extremity. In the mean time the earl of Gloucester arriving with prince Henry, and the body of forces from Normandy, landed in Dorsetshire, where he soon heard of the fate of Wareham castle, and the distressed situation of the empress. In order, therefore, if possible, to relieve her, by calling off the king's attention to another part, he laid siege to Wareham, which, not being sufficiently provided for a resistance, was soon reduced. Stephen, however, who had made a firm resolution not to suffer any event, in any other part of England, to draw him from the siege in which he was employed, pressed the garrison so hard that they were at length obliged to agree to a capitulation. Nevertheless, the success and presence of the earl of Gloucester and young prince Henry had a sensible effect in prejudice of Stephen's interest in those parts : several of his best troops deserted, and that in such numbers that he had not sufficient forces to surround the castle entirely, so that the empress found means to escape, with a few of her women, through one of the postern-gates. It was now the dead of winter, the ground was covered with snow, and the waters of the Thames were entirely frozen : availing herself of this circumstance, she and her attendants dressed themselves in

* A reader of the least discernment will readily perceive that this prince had always a dislike to meddle with the affairs in England. His and his wife's long inactivity after the death of white, in order to deceive the centinels, and in this manner passed the Thames on the ice, and walked above six miles on foot, the snow beating all the way in their faces, till they came to Abingdon, where the empress took horses, and rode that same night to Wallingford.

Immediately upon her departure the castle of Oxford surrendered; but Stephen was not a little mortified to find the fruits of all his pains and perseverance thus snatched out of his very grasp, and regarding the taking of Oxford as matter of little concern, since he had not got Matilda in his power, he retired in a discontented mood to London, to recruit his forces, as also to be present at a council held there at that time by his brother the legate.

The news of the empress's lucky escape soon reached the ears of the earl of Gloucester and prince Henry, who were just preparing to march towards Oxford, and at all events endeavour to raise the siege; but now they bent their route to Wallingford, where they found the empress, and the sight of her darling son blotted out for a time all remembrance of her past sufferings*.

In the beginning of the year 1143, Stephen again took the field, and opened the campaign by marching against Salisbury, the principal city of Wiltshire, then in the hands of the empress; and, in order to straiten the enemy for room, as also to secure a place of retreat for himself on any occasion, he seized upon the monastery of Wilton, where he took up his quarters, together with the legate who accompanied him in this expedition, and who had given his sanction to this act. Here they thought themselves in full security; but the earl of Gloucester, of whom it is difficult to say whether he excelled most in valour or in that of activity and a happy presence of mind, which is so essential to a good general, on receiving intelligence of what Stephen had done, assembled a body of forces, and marching with great secrecy and expedition, came suddenly before the monastery a little before sunset, set fire to it in three different places, and then making the attack sword in hand, those who defended it were put to flight after a very little opposition: the king himself, who never dreamed of the earl of Gloucester's being near him till the action began, would certainly have been taken, had he not fled with his brother, the bishop of Winchester, in so much hurry that he left his plate, furniture, and equipage as a spoil to the enemy. A great number of prisoners were taken, and among the rest William Martel, the only person of distinction that had stood his ground for any time in the engagement. This nobleman had been chief butler to the late king, and had the post of steward of the household under Stephen, whose favourite and faithful servant he was. Upon falling into the earl of Gloucester's hands, he was obliged to give up the strong castle of Sherborne, of which he was governor, for his ransom.

During these transactions in England, Geoffrey Plantagenet, notwithstanding his treaty with Stephen, renewed his claim to the duchy of Normandy, in right of the empress his wife; and, after various successes, entirely reduced that province, which now fell under the dominion of the Anjou-vingian race, and Geoffrey took the title of duke of Normandy.

Towards the close of this year, the empress suffered a considerable loss by the death of Milo, earl of Hereford, the great pillar of her cause, who, being excommunicated by the bishop of Winchester, was afterwards slain by one of his own domestics†. On the other hand, Stephen met with a mortification, which affected him full as much as this did the empress, his brother, the bishop of Winchester, being deprived of his legatine authority, which had enabled him to direct the resolutions of the prelates, to govern the clergy, and turn the minds of the populace as he pleased‡.

Stephen by this event lost much of his power over the clergy, and therefore thought to obtain an equivalent by increasing it over the laity. With this view he had recourse to a step, which, however it may be justified by the necessities of state, and the over-grown power of many of the great nobles, was certainly impolitic, and was attended with some circumstances that do no great honour to the integrity of his heart. He could not, without great uneasiness and resentment, behold the mischiefs arising from the number of castles belonging to the great vassals of the crown, the lords or governors of which exercised the most unsufferable oppressions upon the inhabitants of the country round about them; and he imagined that he should have the voice of the greatest part of the nation with him, if he could get these strong holds into his own possession. Accordingly he began with Geoffrey de Magneville, a nobleman superior to most others both in wealth and dignity, being governor of the Tower and forts about London, and Stephen's lieutenant in most parts of the kingdom subject to his rule, and had also been created earl of Essex by him: but now, upon a pretext, or real intelligence of his employing his services secretly in favour of the empress, Stephen ordered him to be arrested and thrown into prison, from whence he was obliged to purchase his releasement by delivering up the Tower of London and his castles of Malden and of Pleshy, near Dunmow, in Essex.

Whatever might have been Geoffrey's principles previous to this indignity put upon him, he now declared himself the open enemy of Stephen, and friend to the empress and her cause; who, in order to bind him more strongly to her, renewed his title of earl of Essex, and appointed him hereditary high-sheriff of London, Middlesex, and Hertfordshire. Geoffrey repaid these marks of favour by many signal services which he rendered her during the course of her wars with Stephen, till at last he was killed at the siege of Barwell castle, in Cambridgeshire.

About the beginning of the year 1144, Stephen laid siege to the city of Lincoln, then held by Ralph, earl of Chester; but not being able to carry the place, he retired to London. The rest of this year passed in little skirmishes of no consequence, as did also the ensuing one, 1145, excepting that the castle of Faringdon, in Berkshire, was taken by the king's forces; after which he laid siege to the castle of Wallingford, which held out all that year.

A. D. 1146, Stephen despairing of being able to reduce this strong fortress by a regular siege, turned it into a blockade, by building wooden forts round it. It was during this siege that an affair happened with Ralph, earl of Chester, of which we have the following account in the author of the Gesta Reg. Stephani. This earl having, in the course of the last year, made his peace with Stephen, matters were seemingly upon an amicable footing between them; but Stephen holding his court at Northampton, in the August of that year, the earl repaired thither, without having any suspicion: but having, during his stay, represented to Stephen the expediency of sending a body of forces to curb the insolence of the Welsh, who were continually committing outrages upon the borderers; and offering to be himself at the expence of the armament sent for this purpose, the king began to entertain a jealousy that he wanted to set up for independency; and that, if he should trust him with an army, he might turn it against himself; therefore he demanded of the earl, that, previous to any step of that kind, he should deliver his castles into the hands of the crown. Ralph, surprized at this demand, replied, "that what he had proposed had been purely from a view to serve the king; that it was a very cruel return to his loyalty; and that he could not consent to such a delivery, without first consulting his friends." Upon this refusal, a charge of high treason was immediately exhibited against him, and his person was taken into custody: at last, upon his complying with the king's demands, and delivering into his hands the strong castle and city of Lincoln, with all the other places he held in England, and giving his nephew, Gilbert de Clare, as a pledge for his peaceable behaviour, he got his release-ment.

The next year, 1147, young prince Henry returned to Normandy, being sent for over by his father, Geoffrey Plantagenet; and soon after the great earl of Gloucester died of a fever, in his city of Gloucester, and was buried at Bristol. In him the empress lost, perhaps, the only person who had served her without views of interest; at least, the only one that deserved her entire confidence: this melancholy event happened on the thirty-first of October, 1147. Stephen kept his Christmas this year at Lincoln, which he had now in his possession; and as it was customary for an English king to wear the regalia on all high festivals, Stephen appeared in his crown on this occasion, notwithstanding a prophecy (as it was called) denouncing death, or some dreadful calamity, to any prince who should wear a crown in that city; but Stephen had too much greatness of soul to be intimidated by such superstitious stories.

The empress Maud having lost her two chief counsellors and most faithful friends, the earls of Gloucester and Hereford, and plainly perceiving that she should not be able to stand her ground much longer, left England and retired to Normandy after the prince her son. It is said, that she did this at the earnest intreaty of her husband, the earl of Anjou, who thought it little less than madness to expose either himself or family to continual danger in attempting to wrest the sceptre out of the hands of a prince, in which it seemed to be too well fixed.

Upon the retreat of the empress, Stephen found himself in peaceable possession of the crown, and began to flatter himself with tasting the sweets of a tranquil reign; but the event did not answer his wish: a new rival was preparing to dispute the crown with him, and he soon became sensible that the calm with which he had flattered himself, was to be of but short duration.

Henry, the eldest son of Matilda, by Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, a prince of fourteen years of age only, at this time, but old enough to know himself for the undisputed heir of the first Henry, burning with a noble ardour to revenge the injustice which he thought had been done to his mother by Stephen's seizing upon the crown, determined to assert his right to the succession; sensible that there were many of the old English, however displeased they might have been with the behaviour of his mother, who still regarded him as the object of their wishes for filling the throne of this kingdom after the demise of Stephen. Warmed with the glorious prospect of royalty, he had repeatedly applied to his father to put him at the head of an army, to make good his claim: at length he complied with his request, and, in the year 1149, he landed in England, with an handful of men only (being no more than one hundred and forty horse and three thousand foot), but sufficient to revive the drooping spirits of the empress's party by the presence of the next heir to the crown, and who waited only for a favourable opportunity to declare themselves again.

Previous to his leaving Normandy to engage in this expedition, young Henry had, by the advice of prudent counsellors, carried on a correspondence with his great-uncle, David, king of Scots; and now his first business was to have an interview with that monarch, who lay with an army of observation at Carlisle, prepared to act according to the circumstances of the times. The Scottish prince received our young adventurer with all possible demonstrations of cordiality and esteem, and conferred the honour of knighthood on him. His name-sake Henry, prince-royal of Scotland, with the earls of Chester and Hereford, and several other of the nobility, both English and Scotch, assisted at the ceremony, which was performed with great pomp and solemnity, on Whitsunday, May 22, 1149.

Stephen was no sooner apprized of these proceedings, than, justly alarmed for the consequences, he assembled a powerful army, and marched northwards, determined to give Henry and the king of Scots battle, and, if possible, to crush the dreaded rebellion in its infancy. However, finding things tolerably quiet, Stephen was not over-fond of hazarding the event of a battle, or wasting the strength of his forces without an absolute necessity: he encamped in the neighbourhood of York; and David having advanced further into Northumberland, both armies continued almost facing each other during the whole summer; and when the approach of the winter-season made it impossible longer to keep the field, drew off again, without coming to an action.

Next year, which was 1150, Henry was recalled by his father the earl of Anjou, who finding himself near his end, and desirous to settle the succession of his dominions upon the surest footing, invested young Henry with the honours and revenues of the duchy. Lewis the Young, then king of France,

France, incensed at this resignation made without his assent, who was sovereign lord of the fief, invaded Normandy, and laid siege to the citadel of Arques. Henry immediately went and laid siege to the castle of Tournon, in France, by way of diversion. His design succeeded; Lewis advancing to the relief of the place, which was on the point of being taken. At length a peace was concluded between the adverse parties, and Lewis gave Henry the investiture of Normandy. Soon after, Geoffrey, earl of Anjou, dying, Henry was left in possession of Normandy and Anjou, and saw himself the most powerful subject in France: but an unforeseen event happened soon after, which added greatly to that power.

The frenzy of crusading had again invaded the Christian world in the year 1146, through the preaching of St. Bernard, abbot of Clerval†. Conrad, emperor of Germany, and Lewis, king of France, had taken up the cross. After a very unsuccessful expedition, Lewis returned home; and thinking that he had not been well used by his wife, Eleanor, who was heiress of Guienne and Poitou, he resolved to take revenge for the injury that he thought he had sustained, an injury of the most exasperating nature: tired with accompanying him in these famous and unfortunate crusades, in which he was engaged, she had made herself amends, to use her own expression, for the tedious hours she was obliged to spend with a king, who was fitter to be a monk. This coming to the king's knowledge, he annulled his marriage under pretence of consanguinity, in order to spare himself the confusion of publishing the true cause. The divorce was accordingly pronounced at Beaujenci, in a council called expressly on the occasion, on Tuesday before Palm Sunday; and Lewis, by a stretch of romantic generosity, gave her back all the vast possessions she had brought him. The slur which had been thrown upon her reputation * seems, however, to have done her very little prejudice: her beauty and riches were powerful considerations, and Theobald, count of Blois, and young Henry both made their addresses to her; the latter proved the object of her choice, and he being less difficult than Lewis of France, thought it no disgrace to marry a gay lady, who brought him the provinces of Guienne, Poitou, and Xaintonge for her dowry. In a word, their nuptials were solemnized with extraordinary magnificence, at Bourdeaux, the Whitsuntide after the sentence of divorce had been pronounced between her and her former lord king Lewis. Theobald, count of Blois, upon finding his suit rejected, was extremely chagrined: he had it seems actually laid a plot to surprize the person of the young widow and force her to an alliance; but having discovered his design, she luckily escaped the snare.

Henry by this marriage added to his former dominions most of the provinces of France, lying between the river Loire and the Pyrenees, which Lewis had meant to descend to the two daughters he had by Eleonora, or purposed to annex to the crown. Vexed at his own folly, and jealous of Henry's great accession of power, he entered into an alliance with Stephen, Theobald count of Blois, and Geoffrey of Anjou, Henry's younger brother, to strip him of all his dominions. With this view Lewis, with his brother the count of Evreux, Eustace, Stephen's son, and Robert, count de la Perche, invaded Normandy, and besieged Neufmarché, between Gournay and Gisors, while Geoffrey remained in Anjou, to stir up an insurrection there. Henry, thus powerfully attacked, instead of being daunted, seemed to receive new spirits and vigour from the strength of his opposers. He immediately advanced to Barfleur, and, dividing his forces, sent one part to guard Normandy, while he himself, at

† It may not be unentertaining to the reader to find a description of this crusade, as given us by the celebrated Voltaire, in his Essay upon General History; we have therefore subjoined it in a note; and the more readily, as some part of it will be found to have a connection with the following pages.

"The Christians (says he) began to grow every day weaker in those countries which they had conquered: the first conquerors were no more. The little kingdom of Edissa had already been taken by the Turks, in 1140. And Jerusalem itself was now threatened; and the Christians of Asia, ready to be overpowered on every side, solicited Europe for a new crusade.

"The French had begun the first inundation, therefore they were applied to, in order to make a second. Pope Eugenius III. who had been a disciple of St. Bernard, the founder of the order of Clervaux, very prudently pitched upon his quondam master to be the instrument of a new depopulation. Never did gown-man better reconcile the hurry of business with the austerity of his profession, nor had any one ever attained to so high a degree of personal respect, which is ever superior even to authority. His fellow-student, the abbot Sugarius, or Suger, was prime minister of France, and his disciple was pope; but Bernard, though no more than abbot of Clervaux, was the oracle, not only of France, but of all Europe.

"In the year 1146, a scaffold was erected in the public market-place at Vezelai, in Burgundy; there Bernard appeared, having by his side Lewis the Young, king of France. He harangued the people; the king seconded him, and was the first who took the cross from the hands of St. Bernard. The example of the prince was followed by all present. Suger, the prime minister, would fain have persuaded the king to stay at home, and govern his kingdom in a wise and prudent manner rather than ramble abroad in search of precarious conquests; but the eloquence of St. Bernard, and the prevailing spirit of the times, without which that eloquence would have been nothing, carried it against the wholesome advice of the minister. Lewis's young wife, Eleanor of Guienne, engaged to accompany him in this crusade, either from the affection she bore him, or that the customs of those times made it a point of decency to follow her husband to such kind of wars. St. Bernard had acquired so extraordinary a reputation in this affair, that, in another assembly held at Chartres, he was unanimously chosen chief of the crusade. This may appear almost incredible, but every thing is to be believed of the religious frenzy of the populace. St. Bernard, however, had too much understanding to expose himself to the ridicule which would have attended a step of this kind; he therefore wisely refused the office of general, and contented himself with that of prophet; and in this character he sent the red cross to the emperor Conrad III. making him at the same time a positive promise, in the name of God, that he should prove victorious over the Infidels.

"The prospect of certain victory drew after the emperor and the king of France the greatest part of the knights in their dominions, who carried with them most of their vassals and dependents. This second emigration is said to have consisted of no less than three hundred thousand souls; which, added to one million three hundred thousand sent before, makes the whole one million six hundred thousand persons thus transplanted from their native countries. It is natural to suppose, that, of so great a multitude, numbers must have been carried off upon change of climate; this, added to intemperance, produced a mortality in Conrad's army, which occasioned the report that was spread through the West, of the Greeks having poisoned the wells and fountains.

"The conclusion of the whole enterprize was, that the emperor Conrad returned almost alone to Germany; and Lewis carried back with him to France only his wife and a few of his courtiers. A thousand ruined families in vain exclaimed against St. Bernard for his prophecies: he excused himself upon the example of Moses, with whom he compared himself, and who, like him, he said, had promised the Israelites, in God's name, to conduct them into a happy country, and yet beheld the first generation perish in the deserts."

the head of the other, fell upon the French Vexin, which he ravaged with fire and sword. This gave the army of the confederates so powerful a diversion, that Lewis was obliged to withdraw his forces to provide for the defence of his own dominions. After this, Henry passing into the territories of his brother Geoffrey, compelled him in a short time to renounce the unnatural alliance he had entered into, and to embrace terms of reconciliation.

Whilst these things were transacting against Henry in Normandy, his succession to the crown of England was no less powerfully attacked here; for Stephen, taking advantage of the league formed against this prince, had got Lewis once more to invest his son Eustace with the duchy of Normandy; and now, about the year 1152, he endeavoured to bring the English to agree to a proposal he made them of recognizing his son Eustace king of England, and to crown him beforehand: but he met with a most powerful opposition in the prosecution of this design, and from a quarter he little suspected. Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, who had been invested with the legatine power, flatly refused to crown the young prince; and the reason he gave for his noncompliance was still more offensive than the refusal itself. He told Stephen in plain terms, that the pope had positively forbidden him to crown the son of a king, who, contrary to his oath, had usurped the kingdom, to the prejudice of the lawful heir. The king, highly incensed (and indeed with good reason) at the insolence of the prelate, ordered him to be confined; but, having probably found means to corrupt his guards, he escaped out of the house where he was kept prisoner, and got over to the continent, to the no small vexation of Stephen, who thus found all his projects for securing the succession in his family, baffled by the flight of the archbishop, who was looked upon to have an unalienable right to crown the kings of England†.

Henry having by this time settled his Norman affairs to his satisfaction, resolved upon prosecuting those in England; and accordingly came over with a small force, and landed on the sixth of January, when his army was quickly increased by the greatest part of the most respectable nobility of the kingdom. Though it was now the middle of winter, this active prince resolved not to lose any time, and therefore advanced to the siege of Malmesbury, and took the town before Stephen had advice of his having sat down before it; but the castle, which in those days was deemed an impregnable fortification, held out for some time, under the command of one Jordan, its governor; and Stephen was now hastening by long marches to come up with the enemy, and oblige them to raise the siege, or come to a battle; but the great severity of the season, and the badness of the roads, were such obstacles to his progress, that he was got no farther than Cirencester when he received news of the castle's having surrendered to Henry. Robert, earl of Leicester, now came in person to offer his service to the duke of Normandy; Gundreda, countess of Norwich, put him in possession of her strong castle; and Reading, with above thirty other fortresses, submitted without resistance.

The duke then marched to the relief of Wallingford, which was still closely pushed by the forces which Stephen had left before it. Here he attacked the forces, which formed the blockade, in the most furious manner, and met with as gallant a resistance; however, he found means to open a communication between his army and the castle. All this while Stephen, in defiance of weather and season, was employed in reinforcing his army, which being now become much superior to that of the duke, he came up with him, after a most tedious march, and within sight of the place, with a full resolution to raise the siege, or compel Henry to fight him. The duke no sooner beheld the royal army approaching, than, exerting all his courage and activity, and animating his soldiers by his example, he gave such a furious and unexpected assault to the chief fort, that in a short time they carried it sword in hand, and effectually relieved the place: and not content with this, he drew out his forces next day, at some distance from the castle, in order of battle, regardless of the superior numbers he had to encounter.

Stephen, on his side, beheld this ardour of his youthful adversary as an earnest of his own success; he doubted not but Henry, flushed with his late advantage, would set no bounds to his martial impetuosity, but rush headlong upon his own destruction: but herein he seems to have been mistaken in the young prince; his confidence was the result of a private correspondence with most of the principal leaders in Stephen's army, whom he knew to be averse to sheathe their swords in the bowels of their countrymen and relations, and to be moreover well affected to his cause.

The two armies were almost close to each other, and every thing was ready to begin the action, when the nobles in Stephen's army, with the earl of Arundel at their head, desired a conference with Stephen, in which they gave him to understand, "that they were heartily tired with the continual state of warfare in which they had lived ever since his accession to the crown; that it would be an everlasting blot upon their names, should they persist to embroil their hands in each other's blood, to gratify the ambition of two men: that it was beyond any doubt that Henry had the right of succession on his side; and therefore that it would be better to put an end to civil discord, and the sufferings of the nation, and to restore peace to a desolated land by a mutual compromise between the two parties, and their agreeing to live and reign together in amity and union." Stephen in vain remonstrated against this prudent and seasonable advice; he saw it confirmed by the looks of all his soldiers, and repeated by a general murmur through the ranks; giving way, therefore, to a torrent he could no longer oppose with safety to himself, he consented to have an interview with Henry, and a messenger was dispatched to the duke's army with the proposal; the noblemen, and all the rest of the king's party, having first sworn to abide by whatever terms should be agreed to, between the two princes.

Henry, though undoubtedly at the bottom of all this, affected great surprize at receiving such a message at a time, when, he said, he expected no other than an instant and bloody contest in the field of battle: at length, however, he suffered himself to be prevailed on, and repaired to the place appointed, where Stephen and he had a long conference by themselves; after which they returned to their respective camps, and a cessation of arms was proclaimed in both armies: the soldiers, by their repeated shouts, demonstrating their mutual joy at at this unlooked-for and happy event.

† According to some authors, however, he gained his point in part, by the temporal nobility taking an oath of fealty to Eustace. This year Stephen lost his wife Matilda, a princess of great prudence and conjugal virtue, who had been exceedingly useful to him in all the difficulties of his affairs. She died May 3, 1152, and was buried in the abbey of Feversham.

But while pleasure expanded the hearts of those who saw themselves thus delivered from the cruel necessity of slaughtering their nearest friends and kindred, the soul of Eustace was a prey to the most bitter reflections. He was well assured that no treaty could exist between his father and a prince of Henry's ambition, but what must have the ruin of his hopes for its basis; and he could not, with any degree of patience, behold a sceptre, which he already grasped in idea, struck from his hand in one luckless moment. He vented his griefs in the warmest expostulations with his father, for having thus abandoned the rights of his family. Stephen felt as a parent, but knew that it was in vain to dispute against his wayward fate; he endeavoured to soothe the passions of his son; but, abandoned to rage and despair, he left the court, and went to Cambridge, where he raised a body of independent troops, with which he resolved to ravage the country round about, without sparing age or sex, or the most sacred edifices. In this disposition he marched as far as St. Edmundsbury, where he was overtaken by a sudden death, probably the effect of the violent agitations which his mind and body had undergone. He was buried at Feverham, near the remains of his excellent mother, few of whose virtues he appears to have inherited.

The time limited for the cessation of arms being now expired, each party again commenced hostilities. Henry reduced the castles of Stamford and Nottingham; while Stephen made himself master of Ipswich, belonging to Hugh Bigod, earl of Norfolk, who still remained his declared enemy.

At length, Stephen wearied out with a contest, which he plainly saw could never end in his favour, and having lost his wife and eldest son, as also most of those who had been staunch in his interest, particularly Simon, earl of Northampton, and seeing himself abandoned by the rest, he began in earnest to think of coming to an accommodation with duke Henry. In this disposition he was not a little encouraged by the sentiments of his brother, the bishop of Winchester, whose ambition was now thoroughly mortified, and who joining with Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, who had by this time returned to England, they laboured so heartily to bring about the salutary work of peace, that at length a conference was appointed to be held at Wallingford between the king and duke Henry. Several proposals were made and rejected on both sides; the main obstacle was Stephen's insisting upon having the succession settled on his surviving son William, to which Henry would by no means consent. He was willing that Stephen should enjoy the crown during his life, and thought he made no small concession in obliging himself not to give any disturbance to a rival who was not yet fifty years of age. In fine, after much canvassing these matters, Stephen, reflecting on the little confidence he could put in the great barons for supporting the interests of his family, and sensible that his son William had few or none of the qualities fit for holding the reins of government, he consented to a peace as proposed by Henry; upon which it was agreed to call a great council of the nobility, both spiritual and temporal, at Winchester, where the whole was to be finally ratified.

Accordingly, the council being assembled in the latter end of November in this year, 1153, the terms of accommodation were declared to be as follow:

"That Stephen should reign as king during his life; and Henry should succeed him, as lawful heir by hereditary right.

"That William, Stephen's son, should have all the lands which his father possessed, in England and Normandy, before his accession to the English throne; with the honours of the late William Warren (whose daughter and heiress he had married), Richard de l'Aigle's share of the honour of Pevensey, and seven hundred pounds per annum in Norfolk; and should do homage, and give securities or hostages for his fidelity to Henry.

"That the inhabitants of cities, garrisons, and castles, subject to Stephen, should do the same.

"That the Tower of London and castle of Windsor should be put into the hands of William de Tracey, who was to swear, and give his son for an hostage, that he would deliver them to Henry after Stephen's decease; and that the castle of Oxford should be entrusted to Roger de Lacey, and that of Lincoln to Jordan de Buselo, on the like security; which was to be given also by all future governors of those places; and by the bishop of Winchester, for the delivery of the castles of Winchester and Southampton.

"That justice should be administered in Stephen's name, through Henry's part of the realm as well as his own; but in the affairs of the kingdom, the first should act by Henry's advice.

"All the prelates, earls, and barons are to take an oath for the observance of this agreement; and the bishops shall pass ecclesiastical censures on whoever shall infringe it in any respect, which sentence shall remain upon him till he do reform his conduct†."

As soon as this treaty was signed, the two princes made their public appearance together, and came to London, in order for Henry's receiving the fealty of the citizens. Here they were received with the greatest demonstrations of joy by the people, who now thought they saw an happy end of their miseries, and of the general troubles and confusion. After a short stay, Henry parted, to keep his Christmas in another part of the kingdom, among his friends: but the king and he met again at Oxford, on January 13, 1154, when a great council was held, in which the principal nobles of England did homage to Henry, and swore fealty to him as their future lord, with a reservation of obedience to Stephen during his natural life.

While these matters were in agitation, death took out of the world David, king of Scots, having before lost his eldest hope, Henry, the prince-royal. He died at Carlisle, on the twenty-fourth of May, after a reign of twenty-nine years, two months, and three days, and was buried at Dunfermling, with all royal pomp, leaving behind him the character of an able statesman, a faithful friend, a formidable enemy, and a liberal patron to the church. This latter qualification has, indeed, occasioned the priests and monks to lavish on him encomiums, which, as they were not his due, have prejudiced him in the opinions of many, who, while they deservedly laugh at his countrymen for extolling him as the greatest warrior and hero of his age, and inferior to few of antiquity, forget to do that justice to his real virtues which they confessedly deserved.

Stephen employed the leisure hours of restored tranquility in making a progress through England, during which he reformed all abuses, issued several wise and wholesome edicts, and, in a word, gave so many proofs of his great abilities and love of justice, as made his subjects regret that the former years of his reign had been so disturbed by civil commotions, as not to allow him, with safety to himself, to exert those qualities which now shone forth conspicuous, to the general advantage; and, if we compare this part of his reign with the preceding ones, we must be obliged to confess, that many of those acts which wore the appearance of oppression and an arbitrary exertion of his power, were forced from him by the peculiar exigencies of the times, and that the steps he took to curb the over-grown insolence of the great barons, and the clergy, were warranted by sound policy, however unseasonable, or perhaps too rigorous, they might be at the instant of putting them in practice; but now that he no longer had any thing to contend for, he seems to have determined to devote the close of his life and government to the ease and benefit of his subjects, and to have manifested a parental desire of recompensing them for their past sufferings by every regulation that was best fitted to secure their properties, protect their persons, and diffuse universal harmony and tranquility through the land.

Nevertheless, it happened then as it ever has, and ever will, in all states; some few persons, who found their interest in the distresses of their country, and who had lived chiefly upon the fruits of plunder and desolation, during the late times of general anarchy and confusion, thinking their occupation now at an end by the good understanding that subsisted between the king and the duke, used all their endeavours to kindle a jealousy between them, though not with that success which they hoped, or expected. However, an accident fell out at this time, which, for a while, promised to blow the flames of discord higher than ever. Theodoric, earl of Flanders, and his countess, coming over to England upon some business, the king and Henry set out together to receive them at Dover: in the height of the feasting made to welcome these princely guests, advice was privately sent to Henry, that a plot was formed for poisoning him at an entertainment, and to set up William, the king's son, who was said to be in the conspiracy, in his stead. It happened, however, just at this juncture, that prince William, riding along Barham Downs, was thrown from his horse, and fractured his leg, which accident is said to have disconcerted the designs of the conspirators.

But notwithstanding that the Norman Chronicles, Gervase, and Henry of Huntingdon, all agree in this story, and add moreover, that William de Ypres, whom king Stephen had lately made earl of Kent, with a number of Flemings who had settled in that county, under the protection of this nobleman, who was their countryman, had engaged to way-lay prince Henry, and put him to death with their swords if the other method did not succeed; nevertheless the whole seems to be of doubtful credit, inasmuch as we find Henry, immediately after his reception of the earl of Flanders, going over to Normandy; which no man in his senses would, in his situation, have done, without taking some steps towards a detection of the plot, that the accomplices might be punished, especially when he could not but know what powerful adherents he had in this kingdom, who would have stirred heaven and earth to revenge such a flagrant instance of treachery, however the abettors of this report may represent his leaving the kingdom, as the effect of that diffidence which Henry conceived on this occasion of Stephen, his family, and friends.

The real cause of his going over to Normandy at this time, was his having received advice that the king of France had invaded that duchy, and got possession of Vernon; he therefore thought his presence necessary there, in order to stop the progress of his enemy's arms, which he did in a very short time; and the king of France finding that he could do nothing of any moment against such a vigorous and active adversary as Henry, wisely consented to a peace, and restored the places he had taken, on being paid the expence he had been at in fortifying them.

The latter end of this year Stephen made another journey to Dover, in order to confer with the count of Flanders, in relation to some of his estates on the continent. At his return from this visit he was seized with a violent fit of the iliac passion, which, baffling all the art of medicine, carried him off, on the twenty-fifth of October, 1154; and his body was interred by that of his queen Matilda, in the abbey of Feversham, which he himself had founded.

Stephen was a prince of great fortitude, courage, and activity, and might have reigned with the approbation of his people, had he swayed the sceptre in less troublesome times. Ambition was the noble failing of his soul; and if in the pursuit of this darling object, he might at times have deviated from the stricter rules of equity and moderation, unhappily he stands not alone in the annals of the princes of the world. His generosity and greatness of soul were sufficiently conspicuous in his never taking revenge upon those who deserted him in his distress, even after he had burst through the clouds of adversity and shone again in the zenith of power. His valour was witnessed by thousands, who fought for or against him; and in answer to the charge of perjury, brought against him in the case of the empress Maud, to whom he had sworn allegiance, let it be considered, that her total neglect of the English succession upon the death of Henry I. to which she, for a considerable time, did not prosecute her claim, and the readiness which the English, left without an head, shewed to place Stephen upon the vacant throne, was a temptation that the virtue of few princes would have been proof against. In a word, though I would not wish to plead for treachery or the breach of vows, on the most flattering prospect; yet I must confess myself an advocate for human nature, and, in consideration of the numerous frailties inherent to it, think that a few public virtues are more than a counterpoise for many private errors: how far the public may accept of this in excuse or alleviation of Stephen's conduct, I know not; thus much, however, is certain, that he seems to have been possessed of many great and amiable qualities; and, had he lived in happier times, he might possibly have been transmitted to posterity as one of the most illustrious monarchs that ever filled the English throne.

The marriage and issue of this prince were as follow.

Matilda, or Maud, the wife of king Stephen, was the daughter of Eustace, earl of Boulogne, by Mary, sister to Matilda queen of Henry I. By her he had,

1. Baldwin, his eldest son, who was born in the reign of king Henry, his father's uncle, and died in his infancy.

2. Eustace, his second son, and heir apparent of both him and his wife Matilda, was created earl of Boulogne when his father was made king, that dignity being the inheritance of his mother. He married Constance, sister of Lewis VII. king of France, and daughter of Lewis the Fat. He died on the 10th of August, 1152.

3. William, his third and youngest son, married Isabella, daughter and heir of William Warren, the third earl of Surry, with whom he had that earldom. After his father's death, king Henry II. made him a knight, resumed those honours that he held of the crown, and restored him to all that his father had before he was king, namely the honours of Boulogne, Surry, and Mortaigne. He died without issue in October, 1160, being the seventh of king Henry's reign.

4. Matilda, his eldest daughter. She was born before he was king, and in the reign of his uncle Henry I. in whose time she also deceased, very young.

5. Mary, who was a nun and abbess of the monastery of Rumsey, in Hants, from whence she was privately taken by Matthew, younger son of the earl of Alsace; and after ten years cohabitation they were divorced by sentence of the pope, and the lady obliged to return to her monastery.

Stephen's natural issue were,

1. William, by some mistaken for the same William that was earl of Boulogne: others again will have it that Stephen had no other son named William but the lawful one. To ascertain this matter, we need no better authority than that of William, earl of Boulogne, himself, who, in an ancient charter of his, still extant, names this William as a witness, and calls him his brother.

2. Gervase, begotten on a gentlewoman named Damietta, and born in Normandy. He was brought into England by his father, in the year 1140, the fifth of his reign, who made him the same year abbot of Westminster, which he retained for the space of twenty years, and died and was buried in that abbey, in the sixth year of the reign of Henry II. 1169.

As to the remarkable occurrences of this reign, we find them thus recorded.

On the very day that Stephen landed in England to put up for the crown, there happened a most terrible and fearful storm of thunder and lightning, which falling out in the winter season, was considered by the people as an omen of the troublesome reign of their new sovereign.

In his fourteenth there fell so much rain in the summer season, that all the fruits of the earth were spoiled, and there ensued a grievous dearth. On the ninth of December it began to freeze, and the frost held till the ninth of February, in which time the Thames was entirely bound up, so as to give free passage for man and horse on the ice.

William of Malmesbury writes, that on the twenty-first of March, 1140, early in the morning there was so great an eclipse of the sun, that men were forced to light candles to eat their meat by; and the same author adds, that those who sat at the table where he was, feared the return of the ancient chaos, for several stars were perceived near the sun. A sufficient proof this, of the little progress the sciences had made in this island in those days.

The RESTORATION of the SAXON LINE under King HENRY II. to the Death of King JOHN.

P A R T V.

H E N R Y II. A. D. 1154.

HENRY was busied in settling his affairs in Normandy when he received advice of Stephen's death; but as he knew he had no opposition to apprehend in England; he was in no haste to come over, and therefore staid till he had reduced the town which he was besieging; and then leaving Normandy, he landed safely at Hurst castle, near the Isle of Wight, on the eighth of December, from whence he immediately proceeded to Winchester, where he received the homage and fealty of the nobility, and on the nineteenth of the same month was crowned at London, with his queen Eleanor, by the hands of Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, with the unanimous applause of the English of all ranks, who were so charmed with the specious calm they at present enjoyed, after the manifold miseries they had suffered, that they strove who should be foremost in their demonstrations of affection for their new sovereign. This tranquility, however, proved only like the slumbers of a person worn out with a long and painful distemper, rather a recess from suffering, than an annihilation of the malady. This Henry plainly perceived, and therefore he made it his first business, after his accession to the throne, to guard his infant government against the expected attacks upon its tranquility.

As soon as his coronation was over, he retired to the abbey of Bermondsey, to keep his Christmas, where he also held a council to deliberate on the most effectual means for redressing the disorders and grievances introduced in the preceding reign, and for establishing his throne in peace and power.

And here let it be observed, that nothing was of greater advantage to Henry's reputation, or contributed more to his own glory, and the happiness of his people, than the judgment he shewed in the choice of his council, which was composed of men, ripe in years and full of capacity, wisdom, and experience.

Three things made the principal subjects of their deliberations. The first was, the expulsion of all foreign mercenaries, especially the Flemings, which had been brought over in crowds during the civil commotions in the late king's reign, who had put many of them in possession of fair estates here, either as a reward for services already done, or to attach them to his interest by such a proof of his bounty. The Flemings, both in number and power, exceeded all the other strangers put together, and were immediately under the direction and at the command of William de Ypres, an able and experienced general, who had constantly abided by Stephen in all troubles, and had rendered the most signal services to that monarch: him, therefore, Henry could not think of permitting to remain in England, at the head of a body of people who might take the first occasion to raise disturbances in behalf of William, earl of Warren, the son of their deceased benefactor: though, indeed, his quiet and easy accession to the crown during the life of this son of Stephen, was a convincing proof of the unanimity of the people with regard to his right, especially as during a regency, or interregnum, of near three months, there had appeared no commo-

tions. Be this as it might, Henry wisely resolved to provide against the worst.

The second thing that fell under the consideration of Henry and his council, was the clearing the land of that prodigious number of castles that were so many fortresses raised against the regal power, and whose possessors were arrived at such a state of independency, as hardly to know a superior. The third and last reform to be made, was in relation to the exorbitant grants which had passed under the late reign, owing partly to the weakness and necessities of Stephen, who was obliged to purchase friends to support a title which was founded on so fallacious a basis.

While these prudent regulations were under revision, Henry, unwilling to trust to his own lights in the management of so extensive a sway as that to which he was now called, applied to Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, to whom, of all the English, he owed the greatest obligations, and in whose wisdom and fidelity he could best confide, to assist him in the choice of an able and honest ministry. The archbishop not being fond of public business himself, recommended to the king Thomas Becket, archdeacon of Canterbury, a person who had done him eminent services at the court of Rome while the dispute subsisted between him and the legate, Henry of Winchester. Thomas was accordingly made the king's chancellor*, or, in other words constitutionally prime minister.

It now remained to take the opinion of the council upon the matters that had come under their deliberation, when the result was as follows.

As to the first point, all the foreigners, who had deluged England in the preceding reign, were ordered by proclamation to leave the kingdom; and in three months there was not a Fleming to be seen in the county of Kent, which before swarmed with that people; and their protector and countryman William de Ypres, who had led them over hither, withdrew out of the country with them. In the next place, all the castles erected since the death of Henry I. were, by public edict, ordered to be demolished, except a few which the crown retained on account of their advantageous situation for the defence of the kingdom. Thirdly and lastly, all the demesnes alienated by Stephen, were reassumed and reannexed to the crown; and the earls which had been created by that prince, in prejudice to the ancient nobility of the kingdom, were deprived of their titles: even benefactions to churches, and monasteries met with the same fate; and the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland were reclaimed from Malcolm the Maiden, king of Scots, who gave them up rather than make war with Henry; and, on account of his ready compliance, was gratified with the county of Huntingdon, to which he had pretensions in right of his predecessor king David.

The king met with no difficulty in the execution of any of these measures for the security of his government and the peace of the nation, except in that relating to the demolition and surrender of the fortresses belonging to the nobility, some of whom were very unwilling to comply with the terms of the proclamation on that subject. The most considerable of these was William le Gros, earl of Albemarle, now stripped of his other title of York given him by Stephen †, who being lord of Holderneffe and master of large possessions in other parts of Yorkshire, had, in Stephen's time, acted as king in the country north of the Humber, and erected the castle of Scarborough, fortifying it so as to render it almost impregnable. However, after several affected delays and excuses, he was forced to submit. These delays were probably the occasion of the king's marching into Yorkshire; as also to call William Peverel to account for the poisoning of Ralph, earl of Chester, but William, conscious of his guilt, and dreading the king's steady justice, fled, upon his approach, over to the continent, leaving his large estates and castle, which were immediately seized and forfeited to the king. Henry, bishop of Winchester, the late king's brother, about the same time, sending his treasure before him by the abbot of Cluny, withdrew privately out of the kingdom; and as he went without the king's licence, the king ordered all his castles to be demolished: and by these vigorous measures the peace the north was fully secured.

Henry now found his presence necessary in the southern parts of the kingdom, especially towards the marches of Wales, where there were several malecontents, that gave strong indications of rebellious designs; and Hugh de Mortimer, a nobleman of great power, had fortified his castles of Bridgenorth, Clayberry, and Wigmore. He had also prevailed upon Roger (son of the great Milo), earl of Hereford, to retire from court, and levy a body of forces amongst the Welsh, to defend his castles of Hereford and Gloucester against the commissioners appointed by Henry to see the demolition of the private fortresses put in execution: however, Gilbert Follyott, bishop of Hereford, who was related to the young earl, found means to draw him off from this dangerous connection, and carried him back to court, upon assurance of the king's pardon, which was readily granted him upon the surrender of his castles. Mortimer continued obstinate, till at length Henry marching against him in person, and investing his three castles at one and the same time, he found himself unable to hold out, and therefore threw himself upon the king's mercy, who, unwilling to stain the beginning of his reign with blood, pardoned him.

While Henry was taken up with the weightier affairs of the realm, he had appointed justices in all quarters of the kingdom to repress disorders, and punish offenders, within their respective jurisdictions; whilst he took care to watch himself over their conduct, to see that they were vigilant and upright in the execution of their trust; examining into the state of the counties through which he passed in his progress, always ready to hear the complaints of such as were aggrieved, and never forgiving negligence or oppression in the justices. All these wise and paternal regulations gave his subjects the highest opinion of him, and they rejoiced in their change of situation, promising themselves peace, plenty, and felicity under a reign that had opened with such happy omens. They had a pleasing prospect of the continuance of these blessings by the increase of the royal progeny, queen Eleanor being, on February 28, 1155, delivered of a prince, who was named Henry. This event seems to have given occasion to that general council of the prelates and nobility which the king summoned at Wallingford, about Easter, in which he exacted an oath of fealty to his son William, then an infant §, and in case of his death to this Henry.

In this year also Henry passed a charter of liberties, confirming the church in all the privileges and immunities granted to it by Henry I. and also caused the adulterated coin to be cried down, and new money struck, of the just value and standard.

These and other acts of popularity endeared Henry so much to the people of England, that he found himself in perfect tranquility*, and therefore, in January, 1156, he went over into Normandy, where he did homage to Lewis the Young, king of France, for his possessions there; not that Henry, like some of his ancestors, considered England only as an appendage to Normandy; on the contrary, he looked upon it as the throne of his majesty and the fountain of his power: but the state of the French government and that of Normandy, at this time, made him unwilling to give the crown of France any handle against him.

During his stay in Normandy, where he passed several months of this year, he had some disputes with his brother Geoffrey, in regard to his father's will, which he had taken an oath to observe †, and by which Geoffrey was to have the earldoms of Anjou, Touraine, and Maine, as soon as Henry should be in possession of the English crown; but Henry, who is said in this affair to have regarded his own interest more than the ties of blood or oaths, got a dispensation from pope Adrian IV. (with whom he was upon very good terms) absolving him from his oath to keep his father's will; and Geoffrey having thereupon engaged the Anjouins to rise and declare for him, Henry seized this as a plausible pretext to come to an open rupture with his brother, whose patrimony he seized by force of arms into his own possession, after having reduced the insurgents; and at length Geoffrey found himself compelled to accept of a pension of one thousand pounds English money, and two thousand pounds Anjouin, which amounted to about five hundred pounds more, and to relinquish his title to the counties in question. Henry having thus settled every thing upon a desirable footing in Normandy, returned to his English dominions about autumn, where his presence was become particularly necessary on account of the behaviour of the Welsh, who had made several bloody invasions into the territories bordering upon their country.

In order, therefore, to quell these disturbances, Henry, soon after his return, set about assembling a powerful army, with which he, in the beginning of the ensuing year, 1157, marched to Westchester, where he received intelligence that Owen, the Welch prince, was advanced as far as Basingwerk, to meet him. Upon this Henry advanced with the van of his army to give him battle; but here he had well nigh lost the greatest part of his men, and his own life, through the cowardice or treachery of a young nobleman, Henry de Essex, his standard-bearer, who, upon the first charge, was struck with such a panic from the furious onset given by the Welsh, that, throwing away the royal standard, he fled with the greatest precipitation‡. The English, no longer seeing the king's ensign waving in its place, took it for granted their monarch was slain, which occasioned so great a confusion, that the whole army was on the point of falling into a general rout; but Henry, apprized of the cause, rode every where among his men bare-headed to shew himself, and partly by his words, and partly by his example, inspired fresh vigour into his desponding soldiers; so that rallying they returned to the charge, and the shame of having been thus surprized giving double strength to their blows, they beat back the enemy, and got time to retreat, though with considerable loss. About the same time Henry's fleet made a descent upon the Isle of Anglesey; but the inhabitants, who were accustomed to such visits, being upon their guard, gave the invaders so warm a reception, that hardly three out of ten returned alive to their ships. These unsuccessful beginnings determined Henry for the present to patch up a peace with a people whom he found too powerful for him in the midst of their fastnesses and woods. A pacification was accordingly concluded between Owen and him, whereby the former was to pay the accustomed tribute.

Matters being thus settled with the Welch, Henry, in pursuance of his scheme of resumption, invited Malcolm, king of Scots, surnamed the Maiden ||, to visit him at Chester, where the latter resigned to Henry the counties of Northumberland and Cumberland, but was suffered to retain the earldom of Huntingdon, upon doing fealty and homage to Henry, as his grand-father had done before to Henry I. with a salvo to all his royal dignities.

The close of this year added an increase to Henry's happiness by the birth of a son, at Oxford, who afterwards succeeded him, by the name of Richard.

In the beginning of the year 1158, Henry made an iter, or progress, through his kingdom, in order to see that justice was duly administered. When he came to Lincoln, he submitted to be crowned in the suburbs of that city, called Wickford, in compliance with the superstition of the inhabitants, to whom this condescension proved highly agreeable.

§ Who died a few days after this ceremony.

* Some historians inform us, that about this time Henry began to plan the conquest of Ireland, and that he had actually obtained a bull from pope Adrian IV. for that purpose, but that, for some particular reasons, the expedition was postponed.

† Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, desirous to have a better provision for his younger son than he was able to make him, required, in a will made on his death-bed, that his eldest son Henry, whenever he got possession of England, should make over the counties of Anjou, Touraine, and Maine; and obliged the bishops and nobles about him to swear that his corpse should not be interred till Henry had bound himself by oath to perform the contents of the will, which till then was not to be opened. Henry coming to the funeral is said to have taken the oath very unwillingly, and purely to avoid the scandal of letting his father's corpse lie unburied. But this relation is much to be suspected, it not being agreeable either to the father's affection to Henry, to whom, in his own life-time, he had voluntarily resigned Normandy, or to his known piety and regard to justice, to make use of such an artifice in his last moments, either to force his eldest son to part with his undoubted right against his will, or to trepan him into an act of perjury.

‡ For which he was afterwards formally accused by Robert de Montfort; and the fact being notorious, Henry de Essex had no other defence than to take the benefit of a single duel. Being vanquished, though his life became a forfeit to the law, yet the king spared it, ordering him to be shorn a monk, and to be shut up in a monastery; by which means his great estate fell to the crown.

|| On account of his remarkable continency and celibacy.

Henry was no sooner returned from this progress than he was called abroad, upon the death of his brother Geoffrey, count of Nantes, to take care of his foreign affairs; and accordingly left England about the middle of August.

He judged it necessary to engage the court of France in his interest on this occasion, and therefore procured a conference with Lewis (the Young), on the river Epte, which separated their territories. Here the two kings agreed on a match between prince Henry of England and the princess Margaret of France, both infants, the former only about four years of age, and the latter as many months. Lewis afterwards invited the king of England to Paris, where he entertained him with great magnificence: at his departure he took with him the young princess, the care of whose education he committed to Robert de Newbourg, steward and justiciary of Normandy, till she came of an age fit for marriage. Lewis the Young has been represented by most historians as a very easy and weak prince, and hence it has been said that Henry procured from him a commission to enter Brittany as his lieutenant; but though the reputation of a league, or alliance, with this king, might be of great service, it does not seem reasonable to think that he had any such commission, and that all he obtained was only an acknowledgement of his title of grand-seneschal of France, which had been enjoyed by his grand-father, Fulk, in virtue of a grant from Lewis the Fat, in consequence of the hereditary right the counts of Anjou had to that dignity, from the time of their first creation. The assuming this title, however, gave Henry a very plausible pretext for invading the county of Nantes, which he claimed as heir to his brother Geoffrey. In fact, he wanted neither commission nor power to carry his point, being master of all the countries that surrounded Brittany, and having had the administration of Flanders, with guardianship of the heir, committed to him by count Theodoric, when he set out on his expedition to Jerusalem.

Brittany had, for some time, been rent by intestine wars, occasioned by the pretensions of Eudes, or Eudo, viscount of Penthievre, husband to the duchess Bertha (daughter of Conan le Gros), and of Conan le Petit, earl of Richmond, her son by her first husband, Allan le Sauvage, to the government of the duchy; but Eudes being taken prisoner by the lord of Fougères, Conan at last got possession of the whole principality, except the county of Nantes, which he likewise seized upon the death of Geoffrey. It was his undoubted right by inheritance, and Geoffrey, the late possessor, had no title to it but what he derived from the voluntary submission of the inhabitants of Nantes, who, after the death of Conan le Gros, not chusing to come again under the dominion of a duke of Brittany, put themselves under the protection of young Geoffrey Plantagenet. But it was in vain that Conan urged his right, in opposition to a superior power: Henry summoned him to restore the county, and on his non-compliance, confiscated the earldom of Richmond, with all his estates in England, equal at least in revenue to all that he enjoyed in the county of Nantes.

Conan therefore, finding himself certain to be the loser, whatever party he should take; apprehensive of new troubles being raised in Brittany, by his uncle Henry, count of Penthievre, who was returned into France with that design; despairing of any assistance, and utterly unable to oppose the king of England, who was advanced as far as Avranches, at the head of a powerful army of Normans, and ready to enter his territories, he thought it best to avert these troubles by a timely submission; and accordingly, having had a meeting with Henry, he delivered up to him the county of Nantes, on the twenty-ninth of September, of which Henry instantly took possession*: and having reduced the castle of Thouars, which held out against him, he applied himself to the settling all matters of dispute between him and the princes whose territories lay contiguous to his in Normandy. But before he left France, he took the opportunity of Lewis's making a visit of devotion to Mount St. Michael, to wait upon him there, in order to rivet the good understanding between them. The pilgrimage being over, the French monarch was nobly entertained by Henry, who observed the same ceremonies towards him, which had been shewn to himself in Paris. Lewis then departed, highly pleased with the politeness and magnificence of his brother of England.

Henry now returned to his English dominions; and soon after went into the North, in order to have an interview with the Scottish king at Carlisle, the particulars of which we do not know. From hence he and his queen went over again to Normandy, and kept their Christmas at Falaise: and there the earls of Blois and Perche resigned to Henry all the towns and castles which were in their hands, belonging to the duchy of Normandy; while Henry invested the earl of Perche in the castle of Bellesme.

The beginning of the year 1159, we find Henry again in England, and taking a progress as far as the city of Worcester, where he kept the festival of Easter, together with his queen; and, after being solemnly crowned, they both came to the offertory, laid their crowns upon the high altar, and vowed never to wear them more, as long as they lived†.

Henry, not yet satisfied with the addition of Nantes, and the extensive dominions he formerly enjoyed, resolved to revive the pretensions of his queen, Eleanor, to the county of Thoulouse, in right of her grand-father, William, count of Poitou, who married Philippa, heiress of William IV. count of Thoulouse. These dominions had been mortgaged to Raymond de St. Giles, the youngest brother of William, for a certain consideration; and the count of Poitou afterwards confirmed the sale for a sum of money. But Lewis the Young, when he married Eleanor, sole daughter and heiress of William IX. count of Poitou, pretended that the first alienation to Raymond de St. Giles was no better than a collusion between him and his brother, and that the confirmation was an imposition upon the simplicity of the count of Poictou: he therefore alleged that the whole transaction was null and void, and that Eleanor ought to enjoy the inheritance of her grand-mother Philippa, upon restoring the sum which the count of Poictou had received for the confirmation of the pretended sale. Raymond V. then count of Thoulouse, in vain pleaded prescription and right of sale; this plea was over-ruled by the power of the French king, who threatened to make his pretensions good by force of arms. Nevertheless, after a long negotiation, the difference was terminated by the marriage of count Raymond with Constance, the sister of Lewis, and widow of Eustace, son of king Stephen. In favour of this marriage Lewis desisted from his pretensions †.

But after the marriage of Eleanor with Henry, the same rights devolved to him, who was of too ambitious a spirit to suffer them to lie long dormant, and accordingly now laid claim to the county; and Raymond again pleading sale and prescription, he resolved to reduce it by force of arms.

This was an enterprize of great importance, and attended with many difficulties. It would require a length of time to take by force so strong and populous a city as Thoulouse; and to supply pay at the usual rate, with provisions, to the knights his vassals, after the expiration of the forty days service (which, by their tenures, they were obliged to perform at their own cost), was likely to involve Henry in an insupportable expence. To provide against this inconvenience, and that he might not be compelled to abandon his design for want of money, he raised sixty Anjouvin shillings (about fifteen shillings English) upon every noble fief in Normandy, and his other foreign dominions that lay at a distance from the scene of his enterprize.

The usual manner hitherto observed through Europe in general, in raising armies, was by the king's sending orders to his military tenants to take the field with a certain number of their vassals, in proportion to the value of their fiefs; and an army being formed of these, each lord and gentleman had a command in it, greater or less, according to the quantity of his lands and the number of his followers. This personal service was both inconvenient and burthensome, especially to the inferior gentry, when a war was to be carried on in remote countries, the charges of going to the army and returning thence, which they bore themselves, being very great; their domestic affairs suffering, and the tillage of their lands being neglected, during their long absence, and that of their attendants, who used to be employed at home in husbandry. It was much more agreeable to them, in such a case, to advance money (as prelates were often allowed to do), than to furnish troops and go in person: and Henry's military tenants, in England, Normandy, and Anjou, came readily into this proposal of commuting, by a pecuniary payment, for their personal service in the expedition against Thoulouse. This payment was called Escuage, Scutage; and this is the first time we find any mention of it in history. It seems to have been charged in England at the rate of three pounds for every knight's fee; and, according to Gervase, raised the sum of one hundred and eighty thousand pounds. With this money he levied a numerous army of mercenaries, which being put under the command of the most experienced of his nobility and gentry, and joined by his military tenants, and their followers, in Guienne, and also by the troops of his allies, furnished a sufficient force for the intended expedition.

Henry, finding every thing now ready, returned to the continent, taking with him Malcolm, king of Scotland, whom he knighted on this occasion, William, count of Boulogne, and a great number of English noblemen, who served as volunteers on this occasion*. He was joined, on his arrival, by the troops of William, lord of Montpelier, and Trincaval, viscount of Beziers and Nîmes: Raymond Berenger, count of Barcelona, sent him a body of forces, in consequence of a treaty of marriage between the count's daughter and Richard, the king's second son, by which the young couple were to be put in possession of Guienne, as soon as they should be of age to consummate the marriage.

Thus reinforced, Henry's first operation was the siege of Cahors, the capital of the generality of Quercy, which he quickly made himself master of; and then entering the county of Thoulouse, he sat down before the city of that name; but Lewis, the French king, who had with a jealous eye watched over Henry's motions, resolved at all events to stop his further progress, fearing, not without reason, that if he should become master of so many principal places in the heart of France, he might ere long advance to the very gates of Paris, and give him laws: he therefore marched with a small body of troops to the succour of the count his brother-in-law, and made such expedition that he threw himself into the town before Henry could have time to prevent him. The king of England was not a little surprized at this step of Lewis, with whom he had so lately contracted an alliance, and even intimacy of friendship. Nevertheless, he continued to push the siege with the utmost vigour, from the middle of June till the beginning of November; but such was the strength of the place, and so resolute the resistance of the besieged, animated by the presence of the French king, that at length, after a prodigious expence of blood and treasure, Henry, to his unspeakable mortification, was obliged to raise the siege. In his retreat his army was miserably harrassed by the French troops; William, count of Boulogne, son to the deceased king Stephen, was slain with several other persons of distinction, and Henry, with great difficulty, got the shattered remains of his army back into Normandy.

Burning with rage and resentment against the French king for his late breach of the peace and alliance between them, Henry resolved to make him pay dear for his perfidy; and therefore, after some time spent in recruiting the strength and numbers of his forces, he fell upon the Beauvoisis, took and destroyed the strong fortress of Gerberoy, reduced several towns and villages to ashes, and having found means to get over to his interest Si-† Catel. Histoire des Comtes de Toulouse.

* His chancellor Becket likewise attended him on this occasion: and Fitz Stephens, in his Life of that prelate, says, that in this war, Thomas, then chancellor, made a prodigious figure; he had seven hundred knights in his retinue: and, besides these, he maintained at his table, for forty days, twelve hundred horsemen, each of whom received of him three shillings per diem, to provide for his horses and esquires: and that the number of all his dependants amounted to four thousand men able to carry arms.

mon de Montfort, count of Evreux, that nobleman surrendered into his hands the strong fortresses of Montfort l'Aumari, Rochefort, and Epernon, in the neighbourhood of Paris. By this sudden turn of affairs, Lewis found all communication with his capital cut off, and alarmed at the rapid progress of Henry's arms, he was glad to propose a cessation of arms for six months; to which Henry consenting, all hostilities ceased, and the latter returned to Normandy, where he kept his Christmas. This cessation of arms was followed by a treaty of peace, which was concluded in May, 1160, but not ratified till the October following.

The reader will recollect, that Margaret, the French king's daughter, had been affianced to Henry's eldest son: she was to have for her portion the city of Gisors, with a part of the Norman Vexin, which were to remain in the custody of the Knights Templars till the celebration of the marriage; but Henry, impatient to be in possession of the lands abovementioned, prevailed on the cardinals of Pisa and Pavia to grant him a synodical decree dispensing with the nonage of the parties; whereupon he ordered the nuptials to be solemnized, and the royal infants were accordingly married in the beginning of November, though the bridegroom was not then seven, and the bride only three years of age. In consequence of the celebration of these nuptials the Knights Templars, looking upon themselves as freed from their charge, delivered up to Henry the castle of Gisors and the other places assigned as Margaret's portion.

These mean and underhand proceedings naturally gave great umbrage to Lewis, who vented the first emotions of his resentment on the Knights Templars, who had so hastily, and without consulting him, given up their trust; he banished them out of his kingdom; but Henry, who always took care to reward those who had rendered him services, gave them so favourable a reception in England, that they had no cause to regret their expulsion from the French dominions. Lewis then ordered the sons of Theobald, count of Blois, to fortify Chaumont, a place of considerable strength, and that commanded the whole of the county of Touraine, where Henry had great possessions. Hereupon the king of England, without losing any time, gathered together a strong force, and advanced against the place, which being unprovided just then for defence, became an easy conquest, and the works, not yet finished, were by Henry levelled to the ground, who, at the same time, took and carried away prisoners all the garrison, amounting to two hundred men and upwards. He then gave orders for fortifying several places in that province, and supplying them with strong garrisons; after which he went to Mans, where he kept his Christmas, with his queen, Eleanor, who had lately come over to Normandy, with her son prince Henry and his sister Matilda.

When the following spring, 1161, allowed the campaign to open, the French king entered the Norman Vexin with a considerable army; Henry also raised forces on his side, to oppose him: but as neither party, though several times in sight of each other, chose to come to a battle, both lay upon the defensive, till at length, by the mediation of pope Alexander III. a truce was made till Midsummer; and Henry, having taken the strong castle of Agen, in Aquitaine, this success of his induced Lewis more readily to hearken to a peace. Pope Alexander, who had been obliged to fly from Italy by his rival, the antipope Victor, had now taken refuge in France, where Lewis had acknowledged him for the true pope, as did also Henry on his side; the pontiff therefore, desirous to reconcile his two friends, probably with a view of getting them to unite in his cause, offered his personal mediation, and proposed an interview between the two monarchs at Torcy, upon the river Loire; which being agreed to, a peace was there concluded in presence of his holiness†.

Henry, no longer taken up with the affairs of war, applied himself to the redressing some grievances that had crept into his Norman government. For this purpose he held a council of his prelates and nobility at Bayeux, and soon after another at Lislebonne, where the barons took an eventual oath of fealty to prince Henry, as heir-apparent to that duchy.

The affairs of England now requiring to be looked after, Henry would gladly have returned hither; but as his concerns on the continent could not yet dispense with his absence, he was contented to send over his son Henry, in the spring of 1162, under the care of his trusty chancellor, Becket, to whom he gave a patent to act as regent of the kingdom till his own arrival. Accordingly this year Thomas convened a great assembly, or parliament, under the king's commission, at which the prince-royal of England was present, and had fealty sworn to him by the prelates and nobles here, in like manner as he had received it before from those in Normandy, the chancellor himself being the first to set the example. This same year Thomas Becket was chosen archbishop of Canterbury, upon the demise of Theobald: there was some dispute concerning his election, the bishop of Hereford objecting that he had appeared hitherto rather in the character of a soldier than a churchman; but this obstacle was powerfully over-ruled, and Thomas was, by the bishop of Winchester, declared duly elected, and received consecration accordingly*.

After settling the affairs which had now detained him on the continent near four years, Henry returned into England in 1163, where he was received with the greatest demonstrations of loyalty and affection by all the nobility, both spiritual and temporal, and among the rest by Becket, his favourite minister, and now head of the English church. And here it was that he gave the first instance of that dissimulation, for which among his other vices, he became so notorious in the succeeding part of his life: from the gayest soldier and the most magnificent courtier of his age, he was now become a professed practiser of all the fanatic ferities of the monkish order; and the manner of his behaviour to the temporal nobles was so insup-

† On this occasion a magnificent pavilion was erected for the pope; and before he alighted from his horse, he was met by both kings, walking on foot, who each placed himself at one of the stirrups of his holiness, and walked by him till he alighted, each of them holding a stirrup, and waiting on him like common grooms. No wonder, if such an unpardonable weakness in two powerful monarchs raised the haughtiness of the pontiff to its utmost height; and accordingly he rather commanded than mediated the peace he was so desirous to have concluded.

* Becket was thus elected on June 3, 1162, having been ordained priest the day before, by Walter, bishop of Rochester.

portably insolent, that it required far less discernment than Henry was possessed of, for that prince to perceive that he had been egregiously mistaken in the spirit of the man whom he had delighted to honour: however, he for the present disguised his real sentiments under the appearance of a civil reception.

After his return, Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster, where he received homage from Malcolm, king of Scots, from Owen and Rees, the princes of North and South Wales, and from all the nobility, spiritual and temporal, who, at the same time, renewed their eventual oath of fealty to his son prince Henry.

And now he might have reigned the happiest and greatest monarch that had for many years filled the English, or indeed any other, throne, had not all his expected felicity been suddenly destroyed by a viper whom he had nourished in his bosom, and no sooner felt himself raised to the meridian vigour of power by the genial warmth of royal favour, than, with the blackest ingratitude, he endeavoured to sting his benefactor to the heart.

The reader will readily conceive that I can mean no other than the archbishop, Becket, whose insolence, pride, and obstinacy brought disgrace upon his sovereign, and an untimely fate upon himself.

It will be necessary, before we proceed to give an account of the great controversy that at this time arose between Henry and the archbishop of Canterbury, and which I shall consider in a civil light, to let the reader into the history and rise of this ambitious and rebellious subject.

Thomas Becket † was son of a citizen of London ‡, by a Syrian woman §, and spent his youth in the study of the law. He grew so famous at the bar, that he was sent to Rome by Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, on several negotiations, in which he discharged himself so ably, and to the satisfaction of his patron, that, upon the promotion of Roger de Pont l'Eveque to the see of York, he was ordained deacon, and afterwards made archdeacon of Canterbury, about a fortnight before the death of Stephen. When Henry II. was crowned, Theobald, as hath been already shewn, recommended him to the king for his chancellor. In the discharge of this high office Becket behaved to every one with so much pride and haughtiness, as rendered him almost insupportable; but, at the same time, he had the art of disguising himself entirely with regard to the king, to whose will he at all times appeared to be submissively devoted, so that Henry looked upon him as a person always ready to sacrifice every thing to his desire or interest; and therefore, upon receiving news of the death of Theobald, he resolved to promote Becket to that dignity, as a person who might be serviceable to him in some designs he had formed against the encroachments which the clergy were daily making upon the royal authority. The monks of Canterbury, who claimed the privilege of electing an archbishop of that see, were very little inclinable to have Becket placed there, whom they looked upon as too much of a courtier and man of the world; but Henry's recommendation was so warm and urgent, that Becket was actually elected, as abovesaid, on the third of June, 1162, being the first Sunday after Whitsunday.

No sooner did he see himself established in this high station then he began to give a specimen of his vanity and insolence, by two acts, which one would imagine were meant to prepare the king for what he afterwards found in his conduct towards him: he imagined his consecration to be a matter of such importance to Christianity and the church of England, that he affected to distinguish it by a solemn festival, and accordingly instituted the feast of the Holy Trinity to be kept on that day, saying himself the communion-office especially appointed for it §. The other act was, his sending, immediately upon his election, the seals of his office of chancellor to the king, without waiting his return from abroad: an act which Henry considered as an affectation of independency, and a declaration that he was to expect no service from him in the affairs of the kingdom. This the king could not but greatly resent; and Diceto and Gervase will have it, that this was the principal cause of that cold civility which Henry shewed to the archbishop, when he met him at his landing in England, which was the more taken notice of, on account of their former intimacy, and what the king had so lately done for him in getting him promoted to the archiepiscopal dignity. Another writer, of some degree of credit ¶, says on the contrary, "that when the king landed at Southampton, he received the archbishop with his accustomed kindness; and after being several days together, during which nothing passed but what shewed Becket to be in the highest favour, they parted, entirely satisfied with each other." So that perhaps the coldness on the king's side did not commence till after the archbishop's return from the council of Tours, and the king's being informed of the resolutions he had taken there.

Thomas had behaved so little like a churchman during the time that he exercised the office of chancellor, that Henry, when he advanced him by his interest to the place of Theobald, never dreamed he would trouble his head about matters of controversy, especially such as tended to give any uneasiness to, or circumscribe the power of the crown; but Becket being now placed, as he imagined, beyond the reach of royal authority, resolved to support his imaginary independency, and struck into all that presumptuous ambition, which in those times seemed to be inherent in that illustrious office. The daily jarrings that happened in temporal and spiritual affairs, soon gave Henry an opportunity of observing that the very quintessence of prelatial insolence was centered in Thomas.

A council having been held at Tours, by pope Alexander III. on the nineteenth of May, in the preceding year (1162), Becket had attended there, and was received by his holiness with extraordinary honours, who granted his church all the privileges he desired. Among other canons made at this council, there was one against the usurpation of ecclesiastical goods by the laity: and whether Thomas thought himself obliged by the canon, or was encouraged by the pope (with whom it is most likely he then concerted the measures he afterwards pursued), to attempt the recovery of all lands alienated from his see, he was no sooner returned home than he demanded of the king the custody of the castle of Rochester, which Henry held in his own hands, and also the manors of Saltwode and Hethe, as belonging to the church of Canterbury, but were now held of the king, by knight's fee, by William de Ros. He pretended also to the castle, with all the honours, of Tunbridge, in the possession of Roger, earl of Clare, great-grandson to Richard Fitz Gilbert, to whom it had been granted by William I. for a valuable consideration of lands, to an equal extent, in Normandy: this grant had also been confirmed by several former archbishops of Canterbury. Nevertheless, Becket, insisting that his predecessors had no power to alienate the property of the church, summoned Roger to do him homage, without deigning to acquaint the king with his intentions. But the earl, with a becoming spirit, told him he held the castle of the king, and would do homage to none but his majesty. Such proceedings in the archbishop could not but give great umbrage both to the king and the nobility; however, not contented with this attempt to extend his jurisdiction, he made a still more powerful effort, by collating one Lawrence, a priest and creature of his own, to the rectory of Eynsworth, or Ayresford, in Kent, asserting that it was the prerogative of the archbishop to fill all vacant church-livings in the manors of his military tenants, as well as of the churches of Canterbury. But the patron, who was a baron of the realm, resolved not to submit to such an insolent intrusion, and immediately ejected Lawrence from the benefice.

Becket, considering this as an unpardonable affront, excommunicated the patron, expressly contrary to a law enacted in the reign of the first William, importing, that no military tenant of the crown should be excommunicated without knowledge of the king. This presumption was an additional cause of disgust to Henry, who, on this occasion wrote himself a letter to the archbishop, desiring that the censure might be taken off, which the haughty prelate absolutely refused: at length, however, reflecting, that, by persevering in what he had done, he should incur the penalties of the above-mentioned law, amounting to high treason, he complied, but with so ill a grace, that Henry from that instant resolved never more to countenance him. These may be considered as the preludes to the open rupture which soon after ensued between the king and this rebellious subject.

Among other steps by which Becket endeavoured to gain the good-will of the populace, and of the herd of monks and other lazy gown-men that swarmed all over the kingdom, and by whose assistance he hoped to be able to set the archiepiscopal chair at least upon a level, if not above the royal throne; he affected, on all occasions, to be a vigorous asserter of the privileges and immunities of holy church, to use the cant of those times.

One of these immunities, or rather abuses, was that no clergyman was to be subject to the civil jurisdiction, however heinous the crime he might have committed: in consequence of this iniquitous exemption, there was not a species of villainy which the priests did not practise, relying upon their privileges for impunity, and openly defying the power of the magistrates, and even insulting their persons; murder, robbery, and theft stalked openly through the land, clad in the habit of the church, without any one daring to call these holy ruffians to account.

It happened soon after Becket's elevation to the primacy, that a clerk, in Worcestershire, having debauched a gentleman's daughter, and afterwards killed her father, the king insisted that he should be tried for these crimes in his secular court; but Becket would not allow it, and, to protect him from the civil jurisdiction, ordered him to be kept in the bishop's prison; and afterwards, bringing the matter into his own court, it was decreed that the murderer, as a punishment for his crime, should be deprived of his benefice, and be confined for the remainder of his days in a monastery. The king, being informed of the sentence, expostulated very warmly with the archbishop for punishing so slightly a crime which was death by the laws of the land. Becket, in reply, alleged the immunities of the church, and told the king to his face, that a clergyman ought not to be put to death for any crime whatever; and that as to subjecting a churchman to the cognizance of the civil courts, it was a flagrant encroachment upon the privileges of the church, which he would, in all cases, oppose it the utmost of his power. This insolent declaration put the king almost beside himself with rage; but his prudence coming to his assistance, he wisely forbore treating the insolent archbishop as he deserved, but, turning his back upon him, left him with contempt.

Henry now perceived that it was high time to put a stop to this tyranny and injustice of the clergy, which threatened his own authority and the peace of the nation with the most fatal consequences: he therefore called an assembly of the bishops at Westminster, where he solemnly demanded of the archbishop and bishops, "whether they consented and allowed, that such felons as were clergymen, who were taken in the fact, convicted, or confessed, should be degraded, and immediately upon their degradation be delivered over to a secular officer for corporal punishment?" This demand, which was of itself perfectly agreeable to justice and the constitution of the land, met with little or no resistance from the clergy; but the archbishop peremptorily refused to comply with it, alleging that it was contrary to the law of God and the institutions of the church, for a delinquent to undergo a double punishment for one offence; and told his brethren, that it ill became them, who were forbid by the holy scriptures to be concerned in sentences of blood, to consent to the exposing any guilty person of their own order to capital punishment. Upon this the bishops, who thought they could do no less than subscribe to the opinion of their primate in all church-affairs, declined coming to a resolution upon the subject of the king's demand. Henry finding them thus obstinate, demanded, with some warmth, whether they would observe the laws and customs of his realm? To which the archbishop, in the name of all the clergy and himself, answered, that they would, "saving their order by and in all things." This shuffling answer plainly shewed the king the little good he had to expect from this assembly, and accordingly he went away to Woodstock the same evening.

evening, without deigning to take any further notice of them, having first sent to demand of Becket the restitution of the castles which he had been entrusted with, during the time of his being chancellor, and which he still retained, notwithstanding his hypocritical declaration, that he had resigned the seals as thinking it too worldly an office to be exercised by him in his sacerdotal function.

The abrupt departure of the king filled the bishops with some apprehensions; they represented to Becket, that his unseasonable obstinacy might drive the king into some measures detrimental to the church and her sons, and therefore advised him, from a regard to the common cause, to make some concessions to offended majesty: but the archbishop remained immovable, and even declared that he was ready to lay down his life in maintenance of the canons of the church, exhorting them to do the same; but the good bishops, who were not so blinded with enthusiasm or ambition as their principal, wisely reflected, that whatever honour their perseverance might do them with the court of Rome, yet, as barons of the kingdom of England, they had much to fear for their temporal possessions from the resentment of an active and warlike prince, who had a fine army at his command, and was master of an immense revenue: making their interest, therefore, the measure of their loyalty, they repaired to the king at Oxford, and retracted the disgusting salvo.

In the mean time, Philip, abbot of Eleemosyna, coming into England from the pope, in quality of legate a latere, and finding how matters stood between the king and the archbishop, pressed the latter so warmly to compromise all differences, and represented to him the danger that might accrue to the church from the resentment of Henry, in such strong colours, at the same time urging the desire of the pope, who by him exhorted the archbishop to pacific measures, that he at length prevailed upon Becket to visit Henry at Woodstock, where he promised, upon the faith of an honest man, to observe the laws of the kingdom without qualification or prevarication.

Henry, in order to remove every possible cause of dispute for the future, and to prevent all further encroachments upon his prerogative, by fixing the precise limits between the authority of the church and state, assembled a general council of the prelates and nobility at Clarendon, on the twenty-fifth of January, 1164. Here the articles, so famous under the name of the Constitutions of Clarendon, were presented to the assembly on the part of the crown: but in the interim Becket had changed his resolution and retracted his promise; and, when the council met, absolutely refused signing the articles, till after the repeated intreaties and representations of the principal nobility, who laid before him the imminent hazard he might run from the king's high spirit. Moved by these insinuations, he at length consented, and the articles being all expressly recognized as the rights of the crown, were signed by both the archbishops and twelve bishops, who all swore to observe them; and, on the thirtieth of January, in the presence of a great number of the nobility, whose names are recited, put their seals to the instrument, of which there were three indented copies made, one lodged among the records of the crown, and the others delivered to the two archbishops.

These articles, which served as the foundation of that excellent plan of polity which still obtains in our government, are too interesting and curious for us to omit them in this place.

The preface or preamble to them was as follows:

“At a council holden at Clarendon, in the presence of king Henry II. in which John of Oxford, the king's chaplain, presided, by order of the king, a recognition was made of the customs and liberties of the king's ancestors (particularly of his grand-father, Henry I.) by the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, and great men of the kingdom, and which ought to be observed, by reason of the disputes which often happen between the clergy and the justices of the king, and of the great men.”

The articles here follow:

I. All suits about the presentation and advowson of churches, between either laity or clergy, shall be tried and determined in the king's court.

II. Churches of the king's fee cannot be given away in perpetuity without his consent.

III. Clergymen accused of any crime whatever, and summoned by the king's justices, shall appear in the king's court, and plead to such articles as the court shall require, and in the ecclesiastical court to such as are cognizable therein; provided the king's justices send an officer to inspect the proceedings of the ecclesiastical court. And in case a clerk is convicted, or pleads guilty, he is to lose his privilege, and be protected by the church no longer.

IV. No archbishops, bishops, or parsons may go out of the realm without the king's licence: and if they have leave, they shall give security not to ask or attempt any thing, either in their passage, stay, or return, to the prejudice of the king or kingdom.

V. Excommunicated persons shall not be obliged to make oath or give security to continue upon the place where they live; but only to stand to the judgment of the church, in order to their absolution.

VI. Laymen ought not to be accused in the ecclesiastical court, but by legal and reputable promoters and witnesses, and in the presence of the bishop; yet so as the archdeacon lose not his right, or any of his dues. And if the offenders be such that nobody either will or dare accuse them, the sheriff, at the bishop's instance, shall cause twelve legal men, of the town or vicinage, to make oath before the bishop, that they will declare the truth of the matter, according to the best of their knowledge.

VII. None either of the king's tenants in capite, or of his ministerial officers, may be excommunicated, nor any of their lands put under an interdict, unless application be first made to the king, if he be in England, or (in case he be out of the realm) to his justiciary, that he may see justice done in their case; so that, what is cognizable in the king's court may be there determined, and what belongs to the ecclesiastical may be remitted thither.

VIII. If appeals arise in ecclesiastical causes, they are to be made from the archdeacon to the bishop, and from the bishop to the archbishop: in failure of justice from the archbishop, recourse must be had to the king, that, by his precept, the suit may be be determined in the archbishop's court; nor shall it be lawful to proceed further without the king's consent.

IX. If a suit arise between a clergyman and a layman, about a tenement, which the first pretends to be held by frank-almoine*, and the latter maintains it to be a lay-fee, the tenure shall be tried before the king's justiciary, by the verdict of twelve legal men, summoned, according to the custom of the court, by the order of the king's chief-justice: and if the tenement is found to be held in frank-almoine, the suit shall be tried in the ecclesiastical court; but if the verdict brings it in a lay-fee, the suit shall be carried on in the king's court, unless they both hold of the same lord, either spiritual or temporal, in which case it shall be tried in his court; provided, however, that the person seised of the tenement in question, shall not, on account of such verdict, be disseised till the suit is determined.

X. If any inhabitant of a city, castle, borough, or demesne-manor of the king, be cited for any crime by the archdeacon or bishop, and will not make satisfaction upon their summons, they may interdict him from divine service; but they ought not to excommunicate him till the king's principal officer of the place be made acquainted therewith, that he may oblige the person to make satisfaction to the church; and if such officer fail in so doing, he shall be fineable at the king's pleasure, and the bishop may then exert his ecclesiastical authority upon the accused person.

XI. All archbishops and bishops, and other clergymen possessed of ecclesiastical dignities or benefices, who hold of the king in capite, are to look upon their estates as baronies, and shall appear before the king's justices and officers, to answer the duties of their tenure, and shall observe and perform all the royal customs, rights, and services, and shall hold themselves as other barons, obliged to be present at judicial proceedings in the king's court, till sentence comes to be given against life or limb.

XII. When any archbishopric, bishopric, abbey, or priory, of royal foundation or patronage, becomes vacant, the king shall enter thereupon, and receive all the issues and profits thereof, as of his own demesne lands; and when he shall think fit that such church be provided for, the king shall send his mandate to the chief persons of the chapter or convent, and the election shall be made in the king's chapel, with the king's consent, and by the advice of such dignitaries of the realm as the king shall call together for that purpose: and the person so elected, shall there, before his consecration, do homage and fealty to the king, as to his liege lord, for life, limb, and earthly honour, saving his order.

XIII. If any of the chief nobility of the realm do violently oppose the archbishop, or bishop, or archdeacon, in doing justice on themselves, or on their tenants, the king shall take cognizance of the matter, and oblige him to submit to justice. And if any one deny the king his rights, and decline standing to the judgment of the court, the archbishop, bishops, and archdeacons shall employ their authority and censures to oblige him to make the king satisfaction.

XIV. The goods and chattels of such as have forfeited to the king, shall not be detained in any church or church-yard, to secure them from being seized according to law, because they belong to the king wherever they are found, as well within the precincts of the church as without.

XV. All actions and suits for debt, due either upon oath or solemn promise, or otherwise contracted, shall be tried in the king's court.

XVI. The sons of villains, or copyholders, are not to be ordained without the consent of the lord of the manor where they were known to be born.

How unwillingly soever the archbishop subscribed the articles, the king was highly pleased with having his hand to them, as not making the least doubt of the pope's approving laws that had been deemed necessary by all the bishops themselves. In this belief he resolved to have them confirmed by a bull, in order to take from the prelates all pretence of recanting; but when the articles were transmitted to France, where pope Alexander then was, he not only refused to give them the sanction of his authority, but exclaimed bitterly against them, as prejudicial to the church and destructive of her privileges, though he did not think fit to censure them equally. There were only six that he condescended to tolerate, and absolutely condemned all the rest. Shortly after, Becket openly declared that he repented signing the Constitutions of Clarendon, and affected to treat himself with great austerity, as a punishment for his criminal condescension to the king's will, and actually suspended himself as unworthy to perform the archiepiscopal functions, till the pope should be pleased to absolve him. The pope's absolution being easily obtained, he resumed his functions, having also received assurances from his holiness that he should be supported. But, in the mean time, Alexander not chusing to break with Henry, sent the archbishop of Rouen over to offer his mediation for compromising matters between Thomas and him; but the king refused to listen to any overtures till the pope had confirmed the Constitutions: at the same time, to try how his holiness stood disposed, he sent over to solicit a legatine power from the pope in favour of Roger, archbishop of York, which was denied; but the artful pontiff made the king himself a compliment of such power, provided it was not exercised to the prejudice of the archbishop of Canterbury.

Henry, however, was not to be caught with this bait; he declined the offer, and at the same time took care to express himself in such terms in relation to Becket, whenever the pope's ambassador was by, that it was generally apprehended by all Becket's friends, that the king was bent upon his ruin. The archbishop, alarmed at this, applied to Henry for leave to go on a visit to pope Alexander, whose advice he pretended to want in regard to some church-affair, but was refused; whereupon he embarked privately on board a vessel at Romney, in order to make his escape over to France; but being put back by contrary winds, he went to Woodstock, where the king then resided, in hopes of being able to mollify him; but Henry was by this time so thoroughly incensed against him, that he refused him audience, and he was obliged to depart without an interview.

* A tenure of lands, or tenements, bestowed for perpetual alms.

The late behaviour of the primate had been such as warranted the most rigorous punishment that insulted majesty could inflict; but Henry, to his just praise be it said, chose to proceed by the most constitutional measures, and therefore he called a new council at Northampton, about the beginning of October, 1164, at which no less than four impeachments were preferred against the turbulent primate.

The first was for contumacy, in not having appeared at the king's court in person, to answer a writ brought against him for removing a cause from his court into that of the king. The archbishop, standing upon his defence, was cast, and fined in five hundred pounds.

The second article was his having embezzled three hundred pounds he had received of the issues of the honours of Eye and Berkhamstead. In answer to this article he alleged, that he had laid out a greater sum in the repairs of royal castles, and wanted to wave the prosecution, because he was not cited to the council on that account; but the king denying his first allegation, and demanding immediate judgment, he agreed to refund the money, and gave security for the payment.

The third charge brought against him, was for five hundred marks which he had borrowed of the king. Here the archbishop pleaded, as he did against the last article, that he was unprepared to answer upon those charges. This plea was likewise over-ruled, and Becket obliged to give security.

The last charge was of a capital nature, for thereby he was accused of having converted to his own use the revenues of the archbishopric of York, of which he had the custody whilst he was chancellor, together with the profits of several other bishoprics, abbeys, and church-livings. Instead of endeavouring to clear himself of this accusation, he answered, that when he was made archbishop, prince Henry, the king's son, and Richard de Lucy, the justiciary, had acquitted him of all accounts: adding, that even had they not done so, he was not bound to answer before laymen, since he was invested with the first ecclesiastical dignity in the kingdom. The former part of this answer sufficiently shews the shuffling disposition of this churchman, since the prince, from whom he said he had his acquittance, was but seven or eight years of age, though he had the title of guardian of the realm in the absence of the king his father. Moreover, it was certainly incumbent upon a person of the character he affected to bear, to shew the greatest readiness in accounting for his administration with regard to the profits of vacant benefices, and the expending of the king's treasures, even supposing those in power had, out of respect or complaisance to him, forbore to demand it. As for the latter part of his answer, he himself had rendered that plea utterly void, by signing the Constitutions of Clarendon, an irrevocable deed, however he might pretend to repent of it, or set up the pope's authority against the laws of the land. In fine, the whole tenor of his conduct appeared so blameable, that the assembly were unanimously of opinion, that he stood guilty of contumacy and rebellion against the authority of the laws. The haughty prelate, finding that matters were going against him, in order to gain time, desired leave to consult his suffragans and the other bishops, in relation to his further defence: this was allowed him, and he accordingly retired to his lodgings.

Here he sat all night in close consultation with his suffragans, but had the mortification to find that he could not engage them in the same plan of refractoriness and disobedience with himself; on the contrary, they advised him to submit to the king. Thus disappointed, he had recourse to another artifice; he pretended to be taken violently ill, and kept his bed, and when the king sent some of the temporal lords to demand of him peremptorily, whether he would give security to render an account of what he had received by the vacancies of churches, during his being chancellor, and abide by the determination of the king's court? he returned for answer, that, if he was better, he would attend the king and his court on the morrow.

The next day he accordingly repaired thither; though resolved to give no account of his stewardship, but to insist on the liberties of the church, as the only thing that could screen him from the prosecution; and thinking that some religious solemnity, or rather mummary, such as would strike the people, might be of service to him: with this view he proposed to walk to the court bare-foot, attired in his pontifical robes, and to take the cross of Canterbury in his hand, into the king's presence, to petition there for the peace of the church, as if the Christian religion was under persecution by calling upon a rebellious subject and a fraudulent treasurer to give up his accounts. His clergy, however, dissuaded him from his first design, and he laid aside his pall and mitre, and wearing his other sacred vestments, with his cope above them, the cross being carried before him, proceeded in that manner to the king's court, on horseback. When he came into the outer court he alighted, and taking the cross into his own hand, proceeded thus into the king's chamber, where he sat down, holding it erected.

Every one present was struck with amazement at his folly and insolence; the bishops, in particular, were covered with shame, and one of them told him, that it looked as if he came prepared to set the whole kingdom in a flame, and to put his sovereign at open defiance: he represented to him the ill consequences of such a vain-glorious and insulting conduct, and tried to persuade him to deliver the cross to the bishop of Hereford, who offered to carry it for him; but in vain, he would not comply. At length, the archbishop of York, no longer able to bear with his obstinate insolence, told him, that notwithstanding the cross was in his hand, he would find that the king carried much sharper weapons. Becket replied, it was true, the king's weapon could kill the body, but his destroyed the soul and sent it to hell.

This answer, which seemed to threaten the king and the court with excommunication, was carried to Henry, then sitting in an inner chamber, who was so provoked at this traitorous menace, that he sent for all the nobles and prelates to attend him, and complained loudly of Becket's intolerable insolence in entering his court in such a presumptuous manner. The whole council joined in condemning this instance of his pride; and the prelates gave the king to understand that the archbishop had notified to them his intent of appealing to the pope against the sentence passed upon him, and had, moreover, inhibited them from sitting in judgment upon him in relation to any matter he had done previous to his being elected primate. The king, provoked at this rebellious appeal, which struck at the very root of regal authority, and the constitutions of the land, told the bishops, that he hoped, nay he charged them upon their oath of allegiance and fealty, that they would continue to sit and consult with the temporal barons on the most effectual methods for humbling the pride of this overgrown subject, who aimed at no less than sovereign authority. The bishops, however, excused themselves from violating the inhibition laid upon them by Becket, as they well knew the great warmth of his temper, and feared that, thus armed with his cross, he should denounce against them the sentence of suspension or excommunication; but promised that they would all join in a counter-appeal to the pope, and get this turbulent primate removed.

The king, taking them at their word, dispensed with their sitting as judges, notwithstanding the express stipulation of the XIth article of the Constitutions of Clarendon; and the prelates, being thus extricated from their greatest difficulty, seemed warmly to espouse the king's cause, and sent a message to the archbishop, complaining of his having laid them under the necessity of contravening the Constitutions of Clarendon, by one of which they were expressly bound to sit in judgment with the king's barons: they reminded him of his having been the first who swore to these Constitutions; and concluded with telling him that they appealed to the pope against his unjust and oppressive inhibition. To which the primate replied, that neither he nor they were bound by the Constitutions of Clarendon, because their oath implied a salvo for their order; and those Constitutions had been condemned by the pope, whose authority was superior to all earthly laws: a subterfuge worthy the father of lies, and dictated by the spirit of disloyalty.

The king next sent some of the lay nobility to expostulate with the archbishop, and to bring him, if possible, to a sense of his duty: but his answer was so full of insolence and evasion, that the king, no longer able to bear with it, demanded judgment of the court upon Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury: he was accordingly declared guilty of perjury and treason. Then the earl of Leicester, one of the justiciaries of the kingdom, going into the room where Becket had all this time remained, told him, that it was the king's pleasure, that he should either come before his majesty's court and acquit himself of the crimes laid to his charge, or submit to his sentence, which he was ready to pronounce. Hereupon the archbishop, starting up hastily, told the earl, "that when he was elected to Canterbury, upon asking what manner of person that would make him, he was told that it would free him from all engagements to the court†, and therefore he would make no answer about such things from which he was freed: that he was their father; and that it did not become them, who were only barons of the king's court, lay powers, to pretend to sit in judgment upon their father; nor would he hear their sentence, inasmuch as he had disclaimed all courts of judicature but that of the pope, to whom he appealed, and under whose protection he would now retire." So saying, he walked with his cross to the door, which was immediately opened at his desire, and he marched out amidst the repeated hootings of the populace, who called to him to stay and hear his sentence; but, regardless of their outcries, he mounted his horse, and passed unmolested to the convent of St. Andrew, from whence he sent three bishops to ask a licence and safe-conduct for his departure; but the king deferring his answer till the next day, he was afraid of being arrested, and went off privately in the night with only two servants. At first he went northwards towards Lincoln; but then altering his route, he travelled by night, and rested all day; at last he got to Sandwich, and putting to sea in a small vessel, on Tuesday, November 2, landed the next day near Grave-lines, in Flanders.

Were not this transaction so circumstantially related by authors who were on the spot, it would be almost incredible that a subject should have the boldness to wrest himself out of the hands of justice. It must, however, be confessed, that Henry's conduct in this affair is far from being blameless: the original suit against Becket was frivolous and vexatious; and, supposing the charge to be proved, the punishment was too heavy for the crime, which happening to be in rent, it ought to have been regulated by the custom of that county (Kent) where it was committed, which gave no more than forty shillings for such offence. The material charge against this prelate was his endeavouring to withdraw himself from the civil power, and setting up the authority of a foreign prince against that of his own sovereign and liege lord.

When the archbishop's flight was known, the next day, which was the eighth of the session, the king consulted with the council, concerning the measures most proper to be taken on this occasion; and it was resolved not to seize the revenues of the see of Canterbury, nor remove any of Becket's officers. The rest of the day was spent in debates about raising a body of foot to be sent against Rees, prince of South Wales, who had broke his late homage; and a certain number of men being promised by every ecclesiastic and layman, for the king's service, the council was dissolved.

Henry was very solicitous to prevent the escape of the archbishop abroad, but finding he had eluded his vigilance, he lost no time in dispatching the archbishop of York, with the bishops of London, Worcester, Chichester, and Exeter, two earls, two barons, and three of his chaplains, to accuse him to the pope, and solicit his being deposed: he wrote also to Lewis the Young, of France, and Philip, count of Flanders, charging the archbishop with treason, and desiring them not to shew him any countenance, nor receive him within their dominions. But, notwithstanding this request, Philip, as well as his brother Matthew, count of Boulogne, shewed the primate all possible civilities; and Lewis, who both dreaded and hated the king of England, and gladly heard that the quarrel between Henry and the archbishop had been carried to such a length, not only did Becket the honour of a visit at Soissons, and gave him assurances of

† This was, in all probability, the reason why he so suddenly threw up his post of chancellor, in hopes he should not be called to an account for any thing he had done in that post: but as he had still kept the custody of castles and honours, even this is not to be admitted as an excuse for giving up his accounts.

his protection, but also wrote to the pope in his favour. Thus did jealousy and political interest induce that prince to urge the pope's authority in a matter so prejudicial to that of all crowned heads: he could not wound Henry but through his own sides; yet his extreme desire to embarrass that prince, made him overlook these considerations.

Henry had as ill success in his application to the pope as to the other sovereigns: the pontiff was then at Sens, and the king's ambassadors, who crossed the sea from Dover the same day that Becket sailed from Sandwich, could not, by all their intreaties and remonstrances, prevail on Alexander to enter into an examination of the affair till the archbishop's arrival, notwithstanding that they made use of the most alluring promises, having had orders from their master to offer the pope, in case he would agree to the deposing of the primate, an enlargement of the income of Peter-pence, which being paid hitherto only by copyholders, and not by all of them, in England, the king proposed to make it a perpetual tax, to be paid by every inhabitant in the kingdom for every house that had a fire in it; by which the value of this income to the see of Rome would have been augmented above a thousand pounds per annum, a very great sum in those days. Alexander, however, remained inflexible, and the ambassadors finding themselves put off with delays, and being ordered not to stay above three days for an answer, they desired his holiness to send two legates over to England to examine the dispute between the king and the archbishop, and to determine it finally; but he would not consent to this proposal, without reserving a liberty of appeal to himself.

The ambassadors were but a little way on the road from Sens when they met three hundred horse of Becket's train going thither; upon which they sent Guy, dean of Waltham, one of the king's chaplains, to see the manner of the archbishop's reception, which he found to be very pompous, all the cardinals going out of the town on horseback to meet him, as well as very respectful and affectionate on the part of the pope, who rose up to kiss and embrace him, and shewed him many other marks of great esteem.

The report which they made of these transactions to Henry, at their arrival at Marlborough, on Christmas eve, did not a little chagrin him; who, having called together a privy-council of his nobles, it was determined to sequester all the possessions of the see of Canterbury, and all the churches, chatels, and rents of the clergy that adhered to the archbishop; and accordingly, on St. Stephen's day, the king issued an ordonnance for that purpose; at the same time a proclamation was issued for the banishment of all Becket's relations and domestics, both clergy and laity.

About this time Frederic Barbarossa was laid under excommunication by the see of Rome. The parity of their circumstances naturally made him look upon Henry as the most proper person with whom he could form a correspondence and alliance. Accordingly, in the beginning of the year 1165, he sent over the archbishop of Cologne as his ambassador into England, to demand Matilda, the eldest daughter of Henry, in marriage for his favourite the duke of Saxony. Henry received his ambassador with all possible marks of distinction, but excused himself from coming to any agreement in relation to this marriage on account of the young ladies nonage.

The Lent following, Henry thought proper to go over to Normandy, in hopes of preventing an interdict on the realm, which he most apprehended, by a personal conference with Alexander. Frequent messages had passed between them, treating of an accommodation, but without any effect; accordingly an interview was now proposed, and the time and place appointed. The king insisted that Becket should not be present; and this artful prelate, fearing that Henry might convince the pope of his misbehaviour, and of the reasonableness of the proceedings of the council, suggested to the pope, "that he might be imposed on by the king's fluent and plausible harangues, if himself were not present to interpret their meaning by what he knew of the inward sentiments of his heart, and his real designs." Thus did this very modest prelate at once arrogate to himself a power, acknowledged only in the Deity, who is the maker and searcher of all hearts, and overturn the papal claim of infallibility, by telling his holiness to his face, that he might be imposed upon! Nevertheless, such was his ascendant over this weak pontiff, that he refused to hearken to any conference with the king unless Becket was present; upon which Henry immediately broke off the intended interview.

Returning to England, Henry now took the field against the Welsh, whose incursions by this time claimed the most serious attention, they having, under the conduct of Rees, prince of South Wales, fallen upon Cardiganshire, expelled all the English subjects from thence, and carried off a prodigious booty.

The king's first operation was directed against Ruthland castle, which was then in the hands of the Welsh, and to which he laid siege. But as the princes of North and South Wales had entered into an alliance with each other, to shake off the English yoke, and were now become formidable, Henry did not care to trust to so small an army as he then had before the place, lest the enemy might find means to cut off his retreat, abandoned the siege of Ruthland, and marched back to reinforce his army. The Welsh, on the other hand, were no less vigorous in their preparations, and seemed determined to retrieve their ancient liberty, or perish in the attempt. At length both armies met, near Oswestree, in Shropshire, and a battle ensued, in which the English had greatly the worst, and were obliged to retreat. On this occasion Henry was guilty of so horrible and mean an act of cruelty as must for ever make him hated and despised by every person of humanity: in revenge for his late disgrace, he ordered two sons of each of the Welsh princes, whom he had in his power, to have their eyes put out, and afterwards to lose their virility.

This year died Malcolm, surnamed the Maiden, king of Scotland, and was succeeded by his brother William, a prince of great expectancy.

Soon after the Welsh expedition, Henry went over again to Normandy; where finding all endeavours in vain to bring the court of Rome to reason in the case of the archbishop, he resolved to provide against the worst, and therefore, during his stay, he enacted several constitutions, which, as they were to be observed over all his dominions, were transmitted into England.

By some of these, "All appeals, either to the pope or archbishop, were absolutely forbidden: the receiving and transmitting any mandate, either to or from either of them, and all suits and proceedings thereon, were to be punished with imprisonment. The chattels and possessions of all the pope's or the archbishop's adherents, and of all belonging to them, were to be seized and confiscated: and such clergy as, having livings or estates in England, were in foreign parts, and did not return upon the general summons published in all the counties in the realm, within three months, were to have their benefices sequestered."

By others, "All persons bringing any letters from the pope or archbishop, containing an interdict, were to be punished as traitors to the king and kingdom; secular clergymen, by the loss of their eyes and by castration; regulars, by amputation of their feet; laymen, by hanging; and leprous persons, by burning: and all bishops, abbots, clergy, or laymen, that should obey such interdict, were, with all their kindred, to be immediately expelled the realm, and their chattels sequestered." Orders were also given for "all the ports of England to be strictly guarded, and no person whatever suffered either to pass thither without the king's licence, or to go from thence abroad without letters of leave signed by the chief justiciary: and perpetual imprisonment was denounced against all such who should break this ordinance. Payment of Peter-pence to the pope was also forbid; but the same was to be collected, and deposited in the royal exchequer." The last article related to the bishops of London and Norwich, who had published in their dioceses the interdict laid upon the lands of Hugh Bigod, earl of Norfolk, and the excommunication denounced against his person by the pope, without a licence from the justiciary, in contempt of the Statutes of Clarendon, which subjected them to the forfeiture of their chattels; and orders were given for their prosecution before the king's justiciary.

These constitutions were sent to the chief justiciaries in England, to be observed and sworn to by all the nobility and people of this kingdom.

Henry, during his stay in Normandy, was employed in making several useful alliances with his neighbours, and had an interview with the king of France at Gisors; and likewise entertained his cousin Philip, count of Flanders, at Rouen: and then returning to England, kept his Christmas at Oxford. Here William, the successor of Malcolm, came to pay his homage for the estates he possessed in England; and at the same time made a formal requisition of the county of Northumberland from Henry, who knew too well its importance to his own crown to part with it readily. Nevertheless, he found means to amuse the Scottish monarch so well, that we find him the ensuing year, 1166, accompanying Henry into Normandy, whither he seems to have gone in order to make a party against that of Becket at the court of Rome. To effect this purpose he could devise no readier expedient than that of encouraging crusades and other expeditions against the Infidels. Accordingly, by the mediation of the king of France, this year he promised to grant four pence upon every hide of ploughed land for those purposes. The archbishop, apprehensive that this would gain Henry credit with the pope and the Christian princes of Europe, renewed his intrigues and fulminations. Henry in return sent word to the abbot of Pontigny, who, by the pope's recommendation, had entertained the archbishop for the last two years, that if he gave him refuge any longer, he would banish all the monks of his order out of England. This severity, instead of hurting the archbishop, did him singular service, for the king of France now took him under his own protection, and allowed him a generous maintenance. The pope at the same time did all he could to mollify Henry, but the king was deaf to all intercession.

The archbishop, exasperated at the king's rigour, excommunicated all that adhered to the Constitutions of Clarendon, and particularly some lords of the council; who, however, despised his censures. At length, finding Henry was bent to maintain his ground, he wrote several insolent letters to the king himself, in which, among other things, he asserted that the secular power being subject to the ecclesiastical, Henry ought to part with the ancient customs and regalities of his crown. One of these letters we have inserted in the note, as a piece very proper to discover the character of this prelate; and its authenticity comes warranted to us from Ralph Diceto, Hoveden, and Matthew Paris*.

* Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, to the King of England.

"I have most earnestly desired to see you; and although I cannot deny, that in this I had a view to my own, yet was it your interest that lay nearest my heart. I was in hopes that when you should see me again, you would call to mind the many services I have done you, with all imaginable regard and affection. For the truth of which I appeal to him who is to judge all mankind, when they shall appear before his tribunal, to be rewarded according to their deeds. I flattered myself that you would be moved with compassion towards me, who am forced to beg my bread in a strange land, though, by the grace of God, I have plenty of all things necessary for my subsistence. I receive, however, great consolation from the words of the apostle, 'They that live in Christ, shall suffer persecution;' and likewise from that saying of the prophet, 'I never saw the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging their bread.' As to what relates to you, I cannot but be sensibly affected with it, for three reasons: first, because you are my liege lord; secondly, because you are my king; thirdly, because you are my spiritual son. As my liege lord, I owe and offer you my best advice; such, however, as is due from a bishop, saving the honour of God and the head of the church. As my king, I owe you a profound respect, and withal am bound to direct my admonitions to you. As my son, it is my duty to correct and exhort you. Kings are anointed in three places, the head, the breast, and the arms; which denote glory, holiness, and power. We find, from several instances taken from the Scriptures, that the kings who despised the commandments of the Lord, were deprived of glory, understanding, and might: such were Pharaoh, Saul, Solomon, Nebuchadnezzar, and many others. On the contrary, they that humbled themselves before God, received a larger measure of grace, and in greater perfection: this was experienced by David, Hezekiah, and some others. Take, therefore, my liege lord, the advice of your vassal; hearken, my king, to the admonitions of your bishop; and receive, my son, the corrections of your father, lest you are drawn aside in schism, or persuaded to hold communion with schismatics. All the world knows with what honour and devotion you received the pope, how respectfully and zealously you protected the church of Rome, and what suitable returns the church and pope have made you. Remember, therefore, the declaration you made, and even laid upon the altar, at your coronation, to protect the church of God in all her immunities: restore the church of Canterbury, from which you received your authority, to the state it was in under your predecessors and mine; otherwise, be assured, that you will draw down on your head the wrath and vengeance of God."

This letter was little capable of appeasing the incensed king; and, indeed, it is very hard to believe that the writer thought it proper for that end, or penned it with that intent.

Henry,

Henry, when he was last in England, had left his queen, Eleanor, regent of his French dominions. Either her sex, or the encouragement they met with from the earl of Brittany, had induced the nobility of Maine to disturb her administration; Henry, therefore, took this opportunity of being on the continent, to march an army both into Maine and Brittany, by which he effectually quelled the revolt. The earl of Brittany, finding himself too weak to cope with the king of England, made a treaty with him, and agreed to give his daughter Constance to Henry's third son Geoffrey; at the same time he put the greatest part of his estate into the hands of Henry, as guardian for the young pair, and the latter accordingly took immediate possession.

About the beginning of the year 1167, a war broke out between Henry and Lewis king of France, whose minds had been irritated to a mutual animosity by the affair of Becket: and now the king of England falling upon the territories of the count of Auvergne, who had rejected his arbitration in a dispute with his own nephew, the king of France espoused his cause, and invaded the Norman Vexin. Henry marching to the defence of that country, conferences were opened between him and Lewis, on the subject of a treaty; but the French nobility being averse to an accommodation, the war was renewed with great fury on both sides, until the two monarchs, unwilling to subject their dominions to such cruel ravages, agreed to a truce, during which the king of England marched into Brittany, and reduced Guiomar, viscount of Leon, who had revolted.

While he was thus employed, he received tidings of the death of the empress Maud, his mother, which happened on the tenth of September, 1167. Her experience and misfortunes had rendered her, in her old age, an excellent counsellor to her son: she was convinced of his equitable intentions in the dispute with the archbishop; she justified his zeal for the customs and prerogatives of the crown; but she disapproved of the written constitutions, which she thought might have been omitted, without any prejudice to the regal authority.

The pope and Becket, taking advantage of sentiments so favourable to their cause, had solicited her to employ her interest with the king her son, in order to bring matters to an accommodation. This she had engaged to do; but being prevented by death, the business was left to William de Pavia and Otho, the legates a latere, sent by the pope with full powers to negotiate a reconciliation between the two jarring parties: but Becket having complained to the pope, that he was apprehensive the legates were too much in the interest of Henry and his clergy, they were hardly set out when he clogged their powers with restrictions that prevented them from giving a final decision. The king, therefore, and all his friends, were clearly of opinion, that the pope intended only to amuse him. In the interim, Becket's adherents and counsellors, dreading that Henry would come to extremities, advised him to give his sovereign some satisfaction. He answered them, that he was ready to come to an accommodation, saving his honour, the church's possessions and his own, and the rights of others. So many salvos sufficiently bespoke his little inclination to relax; however, his friends, who had still so good an opinion of him as to believe he would sacrifice his private interest to the peace of the church, made him another proposal, viz. whether he would agree to resign the archbishopric, in case the king would, upon that condition, give up the Constitutions of Clarendon? To which the pride-sworn priest answered, "that the proposal was unequal, since he could not renounce his dignity without betraying the cause of God and of the church, whereas the king was bound in conscience to annul his new laws." This reply, and the limited power of the legates, entirely destroyed all the king's hopes of reconciliation upon any tolerable terms; and as the empress, his mother, was now dead, he found himself freed from a powerful advocate in behalf of the archbishop, and therefore resolved to strengthen himself against his cabals, and those of the pope and the court of France, by cementing a strong alliance with the princes of Germany.

He began with Alexander, over whom he had, at this time, a fair opportunity of holding the scourge of resentment, by giving him to understand that he would withdraw his obedience from him, and recognize Paschal III. an antipope, who had been set up against him, and even went so far as to notify these as his intentions to several princes of Germany. But Alexander, who knew perfectly well that the great interest he had with the bishops and clergy of England would fully secure him from any disagreeable consequences of this nature, affected to treat the menaces of Henry with great contempt; and sent a letter to the king, in which he enjoined him, by the duty and reverence he owed to holy church, to annul the Constitutions of Clarendon.

Whatever advantage the king had hitherto gained, he wanted to get rid of this troublesome business, which obstructed several great designs he had formed, and in particular the conquest of Ireland; he therefore took occasion from the truce then subsisting between him and Lewis of France, to desire the latter to appoint a place where they two might have an interview with the archbishop, to hear what he had to say in his defence. Lewis agreeing to this request, Becket appeared before the two kings, at a village near Paris; but the primate was so unreasonably obstinate and haughty, that the king of France and the legates could not help confessing that his behaviour was the only obstacle to a re-union. At this interview Henry put the desired pacification upon so fair an issue, that nothing but the most audacious and virulent rebel could have withheld his consent: "Let the archbishop (said the king) only act towards me as the holiest of his predecessors have behaved towards the meanest of mine, and I shall be satisfied." The two kings parted at night, without taking the least notice of Becket; and Lewis for some days, neither made him a visit, nor supplied him with provisions. But this seems to have been only a piece of dissimulation; for finding his account in tormenting the troubles in England, he soon after admitted the archbishop into his former familiarity and friendship. It was to no purpose that Henry sent the bishop of Seez and Geoffrey Riddel to expostulate with Lewis upon his maintaining and patronizing a man who had rejected every reasonable proposal that his sovereign had condescended to make towards a reconciliation; the French monarch only returned an evasive answer, which shewed him to have taken his party beyond recall.

Becket, relying on the friendship and protection of the French king, resolved to proceed to the utmost extremity of church-censure against the king and realm of England; a step which he had hitherto been restrained from taking by the inhibition of the pope.

A sentence of excommunication was, in those times of ignorance and superstition, a most dreadful punishment: besides depriving the person thus stigmatized of the use of the sacraments and other religious privileges, it expelled him in a manner from the bosom of civil society; his character was considered as infamous and detestable, and every one shunned him as if he had been infected with the plague; so that it was almost as terrible as what the Romans called interdicting from fire and water.

Henry, provoked at these proceedings of the archbishop, appealed to a future council, and sent the pope word, that, unless he immediately dispatched legates with power to decide the affair, he would, without any further hesitation, join the party of his rival and competitor in the pontificate. This menace threw Alexander into great perplexity, as he could not but dread the union of Henry with the emperor: accordingly he appointed Gratian and Vivian, two cardinals, his nuncios, to treat with Henry, and, if possible, obtain the restoration of the archbishop.

In the mean time Henry found himself disturbed by some commotions raised in Poitou and Guienne, by a number of discontented barons, who had entertained a secret grudge against his person; and they had met with so much encouragement from the French king, that, towards the latter part of this year, 1167, the counts of Angoulesme and la Marche, the viscount of Thouars, Aumeri de Lusignan, Robert and Hugh de Sully, and several others, broke out into open rebellion, and ravaged the country with great barbarity. Henry had the more reason to be incensed at this perfidious conduct of the French king, as the truce between the two crowns was not yet expired: he therefore, in the fury of revenge, put himself at the head of his troops, and marching against the rebels, reduced them to such straits that they earnestly wished to make their submission, but were withheld by reason of their having given hostages to Lewis for their not treating without his consent.

This being told to Henry, he resolved to remove that obstacle; and accordingly, having strongly garrisoned the castles he had taken from the rebels, he made his queen, and Patrick d'Evreux, earl of Salisbury, regents of the country during his absence, and went, in the spring of 1168, to confer with Lewis, at a place called Plesey, in order for an effectual pacification, or at least to renew the truce, then near upon its expiration. After much time spent in mutual upbraidings and altercation between the two kings, all that Henry could obtain was a lengthening the truce till the ensuing month of June.

Henry had hardly set out for this conference when he received news that the barons of Poitou, taking advantage of his absence, had risen anew, and treacherously murdered the earl of Salisbury; an act for which Henry would have taken an instant and exemplary revenge, had he not been obliged to direct his cares and attention to another quarter. The people of Brittany having taken up arms at the instigation of Eudo, count of Penthievre, with an intention to shake off their subjection to Henry, and actually entered into a treaty with the French court, and delivered hostages as in the case of Poitou.

Henry, ever active, vigorous, and expeditious in all his measures, lost no time in marching with an army into Brittany, where he soon took and demolished the castle of Jocelin and Avaliac, Eudo's strongest fortresses; reduced Vannes, with all the county of Penthievre, and half that of Cornouaille; and having laid waste all the rebels lands, marched back, and fell upon the country about Dinan and St. Malo, which he treated in the same manner. And now the French, thinking they might carry on a war with success while the Bretons, Poitevins, and their neighbours continued in their rebellion and diverted a great part of Henry's forces, the conferences for a further extension of the truce were broken off, and the war became immediately renewed.

The king of England prepared for it with his usual caution; and, not to have too many enemies on his hands at a time, he found means, by a considerable pension, to make up all difference with Matthew, count of Boulogne, who had, the year before, fitted out a fleet of six hundred vessels to invade England, but now engaged in the service of Henry. Accordingly, having got together a body of forces, he was on his march to join the latter, but was refused a passage through the territories of John, count of Ponthieu, and obliged to be at the trouble and charge of a sea-voyage.

Henry, resenting this refusal of the count of Ponthieu, fell upon that county, and ravaged it with fire and sword, burning above forty towns. But whilst he was thus employed, the king of France, making a sudden incursion into the frontiers of Normandy, surprized and burned Chênebrun, near Vernuëil. Henry, advancing to oppose the enemy, who retired upon his approach, cut off part of their rear, took the seneschal of the count of Flanders, with several other knights, prisoners, and over-ran the province of la Perche.

In these and the like skirmishes was the war carried on, without any action of importance; for though the two kings commanded their respective armies, and were equally valiant and expert in military operations, yet they both seemed industriously to avoid coming to a general engagement.

And here Henry gave a signal proof of his great prudence, and of his steady adherence to the principles of the religion he professed; for, notwithstanding the embarrassed situation of his affairs, and the great need he stood in of a powerful assistance to make head against the numerous enemies with which he was beset, he, with great nobleness of soul, rejected the offers made him by the emperor and princes of Germany, of sending him large succours, and making a powerful diversion in his favour, by invading the French king's territories, provided he would declare with them in favour of the antipope Paschal (Guy de Crema), and in case of his death (which happened soon after) for his successor Calixtus.

Queen Eleanor had gone over to England at the latter end of the last year, to prepare matters for sending away her daughter Matilda to the duke of Saxony, Saxony, to whom she had formerly been contracted, the elector of Cologne, and other ambassadors, having been sent to convey her to her husband. The young princess accordingly went to Germany this year, taking with her a prodigious sum of money for her dower, which had been raised by a general tax from all the knights fees in England, and by a fine of five thousand marks laid upon the Jews for liberty to reside and traffic in the kingdom.

The nuncios appointed by the pope to adjust matters between the king and Becket, arrived in the month of August of this year, at Domfront, in Normandy, where they delivered letters from his holiness to Henry, pressing him to restore the archbishop to his favour, and referring him to the bearers for a farther explanation of his desires. Henry hereupon called a council of his prelates, both English and Norman, at Bayeux, in which he declared that he was ready to comply with the pope's request and take Becket again into his royal favour, provided the nuncios would absolve all his nobles and prelates then present, of the excommunication which had been denounced against them by Becket, and go over into England to do the same there. The nuncios objected to this proposal, nor could they be brought to consent till Henry had fixed a day on which the reconciliation between him and the metropolitan was to take place.

Henry, to shew his readiness to stop the breach, through which so much confusion had made its way into his kingdom, consented to these terms; and the agreement was accordingly drawn up in writing by the bishops. The king having ordered a salvo for the dignity of his kingdom to be inserted, this was readily admitted by the bishops; but the friends and partizans of Becket, well knowing the treacherous use they themselves had made of their usual salvos for their order and the liberty of the church, to set aside the obligation of the most solemn oaths, excepted to it, as serving to establish the customs of the realm and banish the papal authority out of England. The nuncios insisted upon its being expunged, otherwise they would retract their promise. The archbishop of Rouen proposed to substitute another in its stead, by which the king should engage to restore Becket to his see, and his clergy to their benefices, in as full and ample a manner as they had enjoyed them before the beginning of the dispute.

On this occasion the king made no difficulty of complying with the proposed amendment, but still insisted that the salvo clause should remain entire; which the nuncios as peremptorily refused, and departed without doing any thing more in the negotiation. Hereupon Henry sent Reginald de Salisbury and Richard Barre to the court of Rome, to support this article, with orders to acquaint the pontiff, that if he would not take off Becket's excommunication, he should be obliged to provide for his honour and safety, and that of his dominions, in another manner.

Henry with reason imagined that the intrigues of the French court were the chief obstacles to the accommodation he so much desired, and therefore he exerted all his endeavours to subdue the revolted barons, from whose insurrection Lewis hoped to derive great advantages: and their confederacy being altogether dissolved by Henry's activity, and departure of Guy de Lusignan for Jerusalem, of which he was afterwards chosen king, made the king of France more tractable; and in a conference held in the beginning of January, 1169, at Montmirail, the two kings adjusted all their differences.

Henry had by this time made over Normandy, le Maine, and Anjou to his eldest son Henry; Poictou and Guienne, to his son Richard; and Brittany to Geoffrey, who held it as a fief depending upon Normandy, and swore fealty to his elder brother. Lewis, as lord-paramount of all these fiefs, confirmed this disposition, and young Henry did homage to his father-in-law Lewis, and his young son Philip Augustus, for Anjou, Maine, and Brittany, having taken the oaths for Normandy on a former occasion. Richard, who was contracted to Adalais, or Alice, another daughter of France, did homage for Guienne. Henry himself was restored to the office of seneschal or high-steward, which had been hereditary in the counts of Anjou; and on Candlemas-day served the king of France at table, in the same manner as has been since done by stewards of the household; the great offices of the crown and household not being then distinguished as they were afterwards.

In consequence of this treaty, prince Geoffrey, going in May to Rennes, received the homages of the nobility of Brittany: and as the king of England was not restrained by any article of the late treaty from punishing the insurgents of Guienne and Poictou, he demolished their castles, and obliged them to return to their allegiance. Then returning to Normandy, he built the strong fortrefs of Beauvoir, in Lions; made broad and deep ditches on the frontiers of his Norman dominions, to prevent the incursions of the neighbouring princes and petty counts; erected fisheries in the river Mayenne; and ordered those high banks (now called the Levée) to be raised along the north side of the Loire, to keep that river from overflowing its bed, which it had been wont to do, to the great damage of the adjacent country.

The peace between the two crowns did not, however, produce the like in church-affairs, the dispute between the king of England and the archbishop still continuing, notwithstanding that Lewis, who was now heartily reconciled to Henry, endeavoured to mediate a peace between them. Several conferences were successively held, but all without effect, through the extreme obstinacy and arrogance of Becket, who, though he would sometimes make a kind of submission, always took care to clog it with his old salvos, of the honour of God and his own order; but Henry would admit of no such evasion. At one of these conferences the pope sent a letter to Henry, in which he threatened to give Becket full permission to use the legatine power, with which he had invested him, to lay his kingdom of England under an interdict, in case he did not restore that prelate to his see. When this letter was delivered to Henry, he answered, that he would consult the bishops of England upon the subject, but fixed no day for an answer, so that all hopes of a reconciliation entirely vanished*.

Upon

* This contest furnishes us with a striking proof of the fatal effects of deviating from ancient forms, and introducing new precedents. In the Saxon times the clergy and laity took the oath of allegiance in the same form of words, without any variation. This form continued from the Conquest to the time of Henry I. when Anselm scrupled to take the oath, on pretence

Upon this occasion, however, the majority of the council seem to have been offended with Henry for his inflexibility, in not accepting of the archbishop's submission with the salvo tacked to it, inasmuch, said they, as his holiness, when he absolved the primate from the oath he had taken to observe the statutes of Clarendon, had laid him under a solemn promise not to enter into any new obligation without expressly saving the honour of God and his own order; and the archbishop of Rheims, with several other French prelates, wrote to the pope, acquainting him of the affair, and advising him to support Becket to the last extremity.

Never was ecclesiastical impudence and arrogance carried to so high a pitch! One priest, in a little corner of Europe, takes upon him to exact a promise from another priest, the subject of another prince, that he would never bring himself under an obligation to observe the laws of the land, under whose protection he lived, without reserving in his own hands a power of violating those laws whenever it suited his interest or inclination; the sovereign of this rebellious subject refuses to indulge him with such a dangerous liberty; upon which, all those of the fraternity of this latter join to accuse the prince of obstinacy and perverseness: what justice! what reasoning! But is it not still more astonishing, that most of our historians, who have mentioned this fact, should speak of it as if they thought the king ought to be blamed, and the primate commended, or at least pitied!

Henry, however, was fully sensible of the great interest the above-mentioned prelates had at the court of Rome, and therefore resolved to avert the fatal consequences which might ensue from an open rupture with that see. With this view he sent ambassadors to the pope, desiring a farther respite from the interdict for himself and kingdom, until other measures could be taken for a reconciliation. If any part of Henry's conduct in this affair was blameable, it was this mean condescension, and that which afterwards followed in recalling the reverend incendiary upon his own terms; since the king ought not to have gone so far, or else to have maintained his dignity and independence even at the hazard of his crown and life. But to return.

The pope complied with Henry's request; but, as the king was uncertain what turn affairs might take, he very prudently provided for the worst, by enforcing the regulations which had lately been made to prevent the bad effects of an interdict, with some small alterations, such as relaxing the severity of the penalty in certain instances. The return of such English clergy as were abroad was fixed to the thirteenth of January: after which it was criminal to make any appeal to the pope or archbishop, or to observe any mandate of theirs, &c.

tence of its being contrary to some papal decrees and ecclesiastical canons, made since the accession of William Rufus.

Other prelates, in imitation of his example, began to entertain the same scruples; and to the oath of fealty which they took to the king, they added a clause for saving their order and the honour of God. This, at first, was probably considered as no more than a harmless expedient, for satisfying the tender consciences of some weak but well-meaning bishops, whom the king was willing to oblige, little thinking they would ever make it a pretence for invalidating their oath of allegiance, for denying such prerogatives of the crown as did not tally with their interest, and for violating the laws of the land whenever they seemed to clash with papal decrees or canons.

Whether this clause was introduced in the reign of Henry I. or at the accession of Stephen, when the prelates dictated the

By this time, however, Henry was heartily tired of the dispute, and resolved to recall the archbishop without insisting upon his oath, or promise to conform to the Constitutions, which had been the source of so much altercation and anxiety. One reason for his acting in this manner, seems to have been, that he thought he should be better able to deal with that haughty priest in his own kingdom, than while he enjoyed the immediate protection of foreign potentates.

This resolution was so contradictory to what he had declared in the last conferences, that he found himself under the necessity of using artifice to bring about his purpose, without appearing to stoop too low, or to be influenced by fear, or the exigence of circumstances, in taking this new step. With this view, pretending a journey of devotion to St. Denis, he surprized the king of France with a visit at Montmartre, near Paris. Their conversation turned upon the difference between Henry and the archbishop; and Henry, that he might conciliate the favour of the French, artfully declared, in the presence of all that court, that he was willing to refer all the differences between him and Becket to the Gallican church, or to that of a certain number of learned men, collected from different quarters. These offers were so plausible, that Henry in a great measure regained the public esteem: and now the king of France, who was very desirous to compromise this matter between the two parties, sent to Becket, who was in waiting hard by, desiring him to commit to writing all his demands. These being drawn out, were as follow:

"That the king, for the good of his soul, would receive him again into his favour, according to the pope's command.

"That he would grant him, and all those who were banished the kingdom on his account, peace and security for themselves and their effects, without an evil or sinister meaning.

"That he should restore to him the church of Canterbury, and all the possessions thereto belonging, in the same state of freedom and liberty as he had ever enjoyed them since he was promoted to the archbishopric.

"That the king should permit him to dispose of all benefices and prebends thereunto belonging, and that had become vacant since his leaving the kingdom, as he should think fit."

To the two first articles Henry readily assented, but objected to the last, because he had already filled up these vacancies, and could not, consistently with the dignity of his crown, reverse his own acts; in order, however, to manifest his inclination to peace, he offered to present him with a thousand marks to defray the expences of his return, and enable him to satisfy his creditors.

terms in which they would swear allegiance, is a point that cannot be easily determined; but having prevailed for some time, it came at last to acquire the force of a law, by the Constitutions of Clarendon, in one of which the prelates are said, before their consecration, to take the oath of fealty "with a saving of their order." Hence it appears that Henry, by opposing this clause, did not mean to prevent the introduction of a new custom, but to abolish an old one: but when it is considered that he wanted to abolish it because it was applied to a purpose which it was never meant to serve, namely, to invade the prerogatives of the crown, and even the privileges of the people, and that Becket endeavoured to support it for no other reason but because it furnished him with a handle to effect these wicked ends; the reader will then be able to judge whether the conduct of the king, or the primate, was most to be condemned.

Becket

Becket pretended that these mean profits would amount to a large sum; but the king of France, and all the nobility, both French and English, there present, persuading him not to obstruct the peace of the church by insisting on restitution, he agreed to wave the demand, and only desired some security for the performance of the agreement. But upon being expostulated with concerning the indecency of requiring security from his lord and sovereign, he said he would be satisfied with the kiss of peace from the king's mouth; but when the mediators intimated this to Henry, he rejected the condition, alleging that he should readily do it, but having sworn in his anger never to kiss the archbishop, though he should be reconciled, he could not give him the kiss proposed, and it was on that account only that he declined it, and not from any remaining rancour or ill-will to the archbishop.

Lewis and the other mediators expressed some surprize at this refusal, which to them appeared somewhat mistrustful; and therefore they simply reported the king's answer to the archbishop, without interposing either their advice or request one way or the other. The haughty prelate thinking he had now the fairest opportunity of being revenged on Henry, whom he well knew to stand in need of a reconciliation, to make him perjure himself in the presence of so august and numerous an assembly, insisted absolutely on the kiss, without which he positively rejected the proposed accommodation. However he found himself greatly disappointed in his expectations; for Henry, who was not yet reduced to such distress, burned with indignation at this villainous artifice, which he plainly saw through, and quitted the assembly without offering any other proposition. Thus ended the conference held at Montmartre, on the eighteenth of November; which, though it did not produce a peace immediately, laid the foundation upon which it afterwards proceeded, and was at last finally adjusted.

Henry had no sooner left the council than he dispatched John of Oxford, dean of Salisbury, and the archbishops of Rouen and Seez, on an embassy to the pope, with an account of what had passed at the conference, and an assurance of his readiness to restore the archbishop; nay, in order to remove the only remaining objection, he proposed that his eldest son should in his stead give the kiss of peace, which Becket so eagerly desired.

Alexander, pleased to see the peace so far advanced, approved the articles; and, on January 19, 1170, sent from Benevento a commission to the archbishops of Rouen and Seez, and the bishop of Nevers, to see it perfected and put into execution. They were instructed to admonish Henry to grant the kiss of peace to Becket, as the pope would absolve him of the rash oath he had made: but in case that the king refused to comply, then the commissioners were directed to persuade the archbishop, in his holiness's name, to accept the kiss of peace of prince Henry; nor was the peace to be retarded, even though the king should delay the payment of the thousand marks; but if, within forty days after they should have communicated their commission, and the pope's monitory letter to the king, the latter should retract the promise he had made, they were directed to lay an interdict, without appeal, on all his foreign dominions.

While these matters were in agitation, Henry assembled the states of Brittany at Nantes, where they swore fealty to him and his son Geoffrey: and having settled the affairs of Normandy, set sail for England, where he arrived on the third of March, 1170, after an absence of near four years, though not before he had been well nigh shipwrecked in a violent storm.

His long absence in Normandy had occasioned many abuses, both in the government and finances, which it was become absolutely necessary to remove. Accordingly Henry's first act, upon his arrival, was to call a parliament, or great council of the nation, which assembled at Windsor in Easter week, 1170, in which the kingdom was divided into circuits, and certain earls, knights, and clergymen appointed as commissioners to make a progress through these divisions, and take security of all sheriffs and bailiffs, and inferior officers for their appearance in the king's court on a certain day, to give an account of their conduct; or in case they could not appear personally before the king, they were to send persons who were to be answerable for them.

They accordingly made their appearance on the fourteenth of June, the day prefixed; and, after undergoing a very severe examination, several of them were turned out of their office.

An old historian has given us the articles of their examination, which, as they throw a great light on the history of England at that time, I shall here transcribe.

I. The first article of enquiry was, What sums the sheriffs had, during the four last years, received of every hundred, township, and particular man, to the grievance of the public or of private persons; what they had taken by judgment of the county or hundred, and what without judgment; distinguishing the sums so taken into different lists, with the cause and evidence upon which they were taken?

II. What lands the sheriffs, or their bailiffs, had bought, or received in pawn or mortgage?

III. How much and what the prelates, nobility, knights, and corporations of the realm, and their seneschals, bailiffs, and ministers had received upon their lands, for the same time, from their several hundreds, townships, and vassals, by or without judgment; putting down all their takings in writing, with the causes and occasion thereof?

IV. What and how much the king's officers, entrusted with the rents and profits of vacant prelates, and the custody of honours, baronies, and escheats, had gained in their employments?

V. What had been given, in any place, to the king's itinerant bailiffs, or officers?

VI. What was become of the goods of such as had either suffered by the assize of Clarendon, or fled out of the kingdom on that (i. e. Becket's) account; what had been received of every hundred, township, and person: whether any one had been wrongfully accused in that assize, for reward, promise, hatred, or in any unjust manner; or if any accused person had been released, or had his judgment reversed, for reward, promise, or affection, and who received the premium; what had been received in every hundred and township, and of every man, for the aid to marry the king's daughter, and who received it?

VII. What and how much the foresters and their bailiffs, or under-officers, had taken, for the said term, within their several districts, in what manner or on what occasion soever; and if, for any reward, promise, or friendship, they had remitted any of the king's dues, and the forfeitures of forests, or pardoned any that had forfeited on account of harts, hinds, and other game; and if the foresters, or their bailiffs, after attaching, taking security, or prosecuting any one, had released him without trial or fine? All persons guilty of these practices, were to be noted down; and all accused of any fault, were to give security to appear before the king on the day he should appoint, to do right according to law; or, for want of such security, to be imprisoned.

VIII. Whether the sheriffs, or the lords of manors, and their respective bailiffs, had returned any thing they had taken, or had made their peace with people, upon hearing of the king's return, to keep them from laying their complaints before him or his justiciaries?

IX. Whether any person had, for reward or affection, been excused or abated any thing of what he had been at first amerced, and by whom this was done?

X. They were to enquire, likewise, into every diocese, what, how much, and for what cause, the archdeacons or rural deans had taken from any one illegally and without judgment? The whole to be written down and noted.

XI. The last point of enquiry was, what persons owing homage to the king, had not done it to him, or his son? And of these a roll was to be made.

By these it appears that the sheriffs in those days had a great power as well in judicature, which they enjoyed during the reigns of the Saxon kings, as in levying the most considerable branches of the revenue, in which they were employed after the Conquest. We have here also the nature and original of itinerant justices, of which I shall speak more at large in another place.

This inquisition produced the most salutary effects, to the great ease of the subject and the establishing public tranquillity. But this was not the only design Henry had in view in calling this court; he had conceived one of much greater importance, but which he thought proper to conceal till the accomplishment of it, lest the turbulent primate should fall upon some means to obstruct it. He well remembered the little regard the English had shewn to oaths of eventual fealty, in the case of his mother, the empress Maud, and therefore resolved to have the crown placed upon the head of his eldest son, Henry (now in the sixteenth year of his age), during his own life-time. With this view he adjourned the assembly from Windsor to London, for the fourteenth of June, the day fixed for the report of the grand inquest and the examination of the delinquents. The assembly would necessarily be very full, and perhaps the most numerous ever known in England; it was therefore the most proper for executing this great measure.

The king, as I have observed, seems to have been very careful in keeping his design secret till the very day of its execution, for the nobility and prelates imagined they were assembled for no other purpose than that of trying the sheriffs; and the young prince himself was ignorant of his intentions, until he arrived in England, two days before the coronation.

When the affair came to be proposed to the assembly, it met with no opposition, and the only difficulty was with regard to the prelate who was to perform the ceremony. It was generally understood to belong to the archbishop of Canterbury; but on this occasion, it was performed by Roger, archbishop of York, who had lately obtained from the pope legatine powers for Scotland, as also a bull granting him the eventual privilege of crowning the king of England, as some of his predecessors had done. Accordingly he placed the crown on the head of the young prince*, assisted by the bishops of Durham and London. The ceremony being over, William, king of Scots, and his brother David, with all the earls, barons, and franktenants of the kingdom, swore immediate fealty and allegiance to the new king. It was a new thing in England, to see a young prince vested with royal power in the life-time of his father, and therefore nothing could have been more happily imagined to pave the way for such a measure than the inquisition above-mentioned.

Young Henry, however, appears to have been little deserving of the great care his father took of his interests; on the contrary, he exhibited on this occasion a remarkable proof of that haughty and ungrateful disposition which afterwards caused his father so much trouble and uneasiness: the king, willing to confer every mark of parental love and distinction in his power on this his favourite son, would needs serve the first dish at his table with his own hands, at the same time saying, with a good-natured smile, "Son, you may now boast of being as honourably served as any monarch upon earth." Young Henry, instead of making the proper return to such an obliging instance of condescension in a parent, turned about to the archbishop of York, and whispered with a contemptuous sneer, "that he thought it no such mighty degradation, for the son of a petty count to serve the heir of a great king."

Becket, informed of what had been done with regard to young Henry's coronation†, foamed with rage and malice; but knew not what measures to take, in order to disturb the quiet of the kingdom, and frustrate the salutary effects the king hoped to reap from this wise precaution. At last he applied to the court of France, as the most likely quarter from whence he could hope for assistance in these his traitorous and iniquitous designs. Accordingly he endeavoured to incense Lewis against the king of England, by representing to him, that the latter had put a gross insult upon his daughter, by not sending for her over from Normandy at the same time with her husband, to be crowned together with him. Lewis, either giving into this belief, or being willing to thwart Henry, endeavoured to raise some disturbances; but they all proved of none effect, to the infinite mortifica-

† Which, though it was the first of its kind in England, was not without precedents in other countries. All the kings of France, from Hugh Capet down to Philip Augustus, had taken the like step; nor had it been attended with any bad consequences, as it unhappily afterwards proved to be in the present case.

tion and confusion of the busy prelate, who, finding himself thus baffled, had recourse to the mean arts of falshood and deceit; for he wrote to the pope, that young Henry had neglected taking the accustomed oath for preserving the liberties of holy church; and not only so, but had even sworn to obey the Constitutions of Clarendon, which were absolutely subversive of the papal authority. Alexander, who implicitly believed all that was told him by the archbishop, and fired with indignation at this insult upon the pontifical power, ordered the primate instantly to let loose the thunder of excommunication against all the English bishops who had assisted at that solemnity.

This was too pleasing food to the rancorous disposition of this insolent prelate for him to delay an instant to gratify his malice and revenge; and the spiritual anathema was on the point of being let loose upon the devoted objects, when Gilles, bishop of Evreux, who had attended at the coronation, and was sent by Henry to lay the whole transaction before the pope, made so true a representation to his holiness of every thing that had passed thereat, at the same time assuring him that the young king had taken the usual oath for the conservation of the church's privileges, that Alexander found he had been imposed upon; therefore he suspended his orders for a general ecclesiastical censure, and confined it only to the archbishop of York and the bishops of London and Salisbury, whom he forbade to exercise their sacerdotal functions till his further pleasure should be known.

Henry, having now effected his great point, returned to Normandy in the month of June, where, about the tenth of August, he fell so dangerously ill, that he was generally reported to be dead. While he continued sick he made his will, whereby he bequeathed England, with the dukedom of Normandy, and the earldoms of Anjou and Maine, to his eldest son, Henry; to Richard, the second, he left the dukedom of Aquitaine, and its all dependencies; he confirmed his third son, Geoffrey, in the earldom of Brittany; and to John, his youngest son, he gave the earldom of Mortaigne. It pleased Heaven, however, that these precautions proved at that time needless, for Henry soon after recovered. As soon as he was able to take the field, he put himself at the head of an army, against the king of France, and entered the duchy of Berry. Lewis was not long before he appeared in arms likewise; but very little was done on either side, though both armies lay for some time in sight of each other: at length the two princes concluded a truce, to be in force till the ensuing spring.

By this time matters between Henry and the archbishop were come to extremities. The latter had so incensed the pope against Henry, on account of the coronation of the young king by the hands of the archbishop of York, which Becket interpreted as an additional insult offered to the rights of the see of Canterbury, that every thing was ready for launching the flaming bolt of interdiction upon all the kingdom, when Henry, who, notwithstanding the other great qualities of his soul, had strongly imbibed the prejudices of bigotry, found his constancy shrink in the last trial, when the very day of interdicting his kingdom was fixed; and from this instant, from the gallant and brave opposer of the court of Rome, we are now to behold him crouching like an abject slave beneath the uplifted rod of papal tyranny. He appointed, he even entertained, another conference, which Fitz Stephens tells us was agreed to, and held at Fretteville, in a meadow, between Charton and Maine; here all differences were finally adjusted between the king and the archbishop. There were present at this conference, Henry, with some of his French and English nobility and prelates, on the one side; and on the other the archbishop of Sens, the earl of Blois, and most of the French nobility, both spiritual and temporal, together with Becket himself: Lewis of France was also to have been there; but having compromised his dispute with the king of England, who had promised him satisfaction for the pretended affront put upon his daughter, in not being crowned together with her husband, he thought it proper to absent himself, that Henry's clemency might appear the more free and unconstrained. The terms of the agreement were, that the king should receive the archbishop, and his exiled clergy, adherents, and relations, into his free grace and favour, and restore him to his rights and possessions in the see of Canterbury, to be by him held in the same manner as he held them for three months before he left England: that satisfaction should be made to the see of Canterbury for the violation of its rights in the coronation of the young king: mention was also made of the kiss of peace, but this Becket did not much insist upon. The principal points adjusted, Henry pressed Becket to go immediately to England; but he excused himself by saying that decency would not permit him to leave France till he had first waited upon Lewis, and others, who had shewn him so much friendship during his exile.

Meanwhile Henry saw himself on the eve of being engaged in a new war with the French king. He had lately paid a considerable sum to Henry de Vienne for Montmirail and the castle of St. Agnan, in Berry, which was the appennage of the duchy of Guienne; but he was hindered from taking possession by Theobald, count of Blois, who laid claim to those places, and was privately assisted with money and forces by Lewis: nevertheless, as neither party was fond of taking the field, the affair was compromised.

Becket's agents had, in consequence of the late treaty, been impowered to take possession of the archbishopric, and his clergy was restored to their benefices; but as six dioceses were vacant, the king resolved to supply them with prelates well affected to his person and government, before the return of Becket, who had formed a scheme to fill those vacancies with his own creatures. In order to prevent such a dangerous accession of power in a priest of his character, Henry ordered the bishops of York, London, and Sarum to repair into Normandy, with six deputies from each chapter of the vacant sees, that proper persons might be chosen for such important offices*. Geoffrey Ridel, arch-

* The filling up of vacant sees was considered as a right inherent in the crown, till the dispute about lay investitures in the reign of Henry I. when the choice of the chapter or convent became a necessary condition. The election, however, was not made by the suffrages of all the monks, or canons, but only by a deputation of their order. The king issued out a writ, requiring them to come to court, and there make choice of a proper person, with the approbation of the bishops, who attended him on the occasion; and when the deputies had agreed with the bishops in nominating a certain person, or recommending three, of whom the king might chuse one, the royal assent rendered the election complete. To one of his sons deacon of Canterbury, whom Becket looked upon as his bitterest enemy, was promoted to the see of Ely, though he died before his consecration; Reginald, son of the bishop of Salisbury, was elected into the diocese of Bath; and the other vacancies were filled up with prelates who were no great friends to Becket.

The archbishop having received pressing letters from the pope to set out for England, at the same time enjoining him to proceed with the greatest severity against the archbishop of York and the other four prelates concerned in the late coronation, he was eager to put his commission in execution before Henry could get over to England; and therefore notified to the king his being ready to depart, who thereupon gave him a letter to his son, for his readmission into England. It appears that Becket had carefully concealed from Henry his powers from Rome to inflict ecclesiastical censures on the five bishops, no mention being made of this matter in the king's letter to his son.

Henry sent John of Oxford, dean of Salisbury, to attend him to England, in the room of the archbishop of Rouen, who was to have gone, but excused himself on account of his great age and infirmities; and embarking at Whitland with a fair wind, he arrived at Sandwich on the first of December. Gervase de Cornhill, high-sheriff of Kent, and Reginald de Warenne, in quality of itinerant justiciaries, guarded the port with a number of armed followers; but Becket, in consequence of the king's express order, was exempted from the usual examination, and treated with greater respect and reverence than he deserved: for no sooner had he set his foot on shore than he dispatched away a messenger, with letters to the bishops of York, London and Sarum, notifying the suspension of the first, and excommunication of the other two.

Young Henry, who had always borne a great distaste to Becket, no sooner heard of these arrogant proceedings than he sent a message to him, remonstrating against the injustice and indecency of denouncing ecclesiastical censures upon persons who had been guilty of no other crime than that of setting the crown upon his head, in compliance with the orders of their lord and sovereign. But Becket, who had so lately triumphed over the father, hardly deigned to take notice of the son's complaint, returning for answer, that the sentence had been pronounced by a power superior to all kings.

Such a behaviour, one would have naturally imagined, seemed to set the archbishop and the young monarch at an eternal distance; but the former resolving to complete his farce, would needs go to salute Henry at Woodstock, where he resided, and to present him with three fine horses that he had brought over with him for that purpose; but his real aim in this visit was to make a triumphant entry into London, through which he was to pass. Accordingly he entered that city with a numerous and splendid train, and took up his lodgings at the bishop of Winchester's palace, from whence he proposed to set out for Woodstock the next day; but Henry, having gotten intimation of his design, and justly incensed at this ridiculous parade, which could answer no other end than to dazzle the eyes of the multitude, and was insupportable insolence in a man just pardoned by his sovereign for crimes of the blackest dye; Henry, I say, on these considerations, and from the hearty aversion he bore him, sent him an express order to repair forthwith to Canterbury, and there to remain. Though this was a great mortification to the proud prelate, yet he thought proper to obey the order, and accordingly set forward for the capital of his diocese, where he was received by the meaner sort of people with solemn processions and hymns of thanksgiving; whilst the more considerate were sorry, and ashamed to see him affect this air of triumph; and that, far from being humbled by his long exile, he was grown more haughty. This was soon more apparently visible, when, mounting his archiepiscopal chair, he solemnly excommunicated Nigel de Sackvil and Robert Brock, with several of the king's ministers, officers of the household, justiciaries, and the most considerable persons in the kingdom*. This proceeding plainly shewed the insincerity of his heart in the late accommodation, and that he desired nothing so much as to revive a quarrel in which he had already gained such advantage over his opponents, and even majesty itself.

In the mean time the excommunicated prelates were gone to carry their complaints to the king, who was still in Normandy. When they came into his presence they threw themselves at his feet, and complained in a very pathetic manner, that, by the peace he had lately made with Becket, the terrors and troubles of those who had sacrificed themselves to his interest, were increased.

Henry could not without being greatly provoked receive the account of the censures laid upon the three prelates; for when he had agreed, by the treaty of Fretteville, to make the archbishop of Canterbury reparation for the invasion of the rights of his see, he never thought that insolent ecclesiastic had in view to wreak such revenge on those who had done nothing but by his particular directions and orders. He looked upon this step of the archbishop as a prelude to the like censures upon other bishops, and upon all that had employments under him: he saw his whole realm disturbed, and his very crown struck at, by an insolent upstart, whom he had raised from nothing.

The king was keeping the feast of the nativity at Bures, near Bayeux, in Normandy, with his prelates and barons about him. His resentment had already been raised to a high degree, by the representation of the prelates, but when he received intelligence of the fresh instances of Becket's arrogance and presumption, in the cases above related, he gave a loose to his indignation, and cried out, in all the anguish of affronted majesty, "Is there not one faithful subject left about me, that will rid me of this turbulent priest, who is the plague of my life?"

These words were certainly highly indiscreet, and seemed to put a poignard into the hand of any assassin who thought he should serve the king, by murdering a person who ought to have been punished only by the laws; nevertheless, Henry by no means appears to have meant any thing of that kind, as his subsequent conduct shewed these ex-preffions were wrung from him in the first transports of his passion: unhappily they did not fall to the ground.

Four barons, or, as they are called, knights of the household, William de Tracy, Reginald Fitz Urfe, Hugh de Mereville, and Richard Brito, imagined, from the king's apparent commotion of mind, and the words he had let fall, that he would not be displeased if the archbishop was taken off. Whether they designed to kill him (or only to carry him off beyond sea, and there have confined him from all opportunities of raising any farther commotions in England) they swore to revenge the king's cause, and left the court privately on the twenty-sixth of December, took shipping at different ports, and, what is very extraordinary, met the very next day, and about the same hour, at the castle of Saltwode, six miles from Canterbury. They had not, however, kept their design so secret but that they were suspected of intending something ill; and the king being told of their departure, and the oath they had taken, dispatched messengers immediately to overtake them, and forbid their doing any violent action; but the couriers did not arrive soon enough to prevent its execution.

In the interim the king held a council, in which they deliberated on the proper measures to be taken for humbling the primate, when some were for prosecuting and putting him to death; others again, who were more prudent, represented that such a proceeding would be a direct violation of the late agreement: at length it was resolved to seize his person, and commit him to close custody. William de Magneville, earl of Essex, Saier de Quincy, and Richard du Hommet, were charged with the commission; and the latter of these going over to England, sent to Hugh de Gondeville and William Fitz John, counsellors to the young king, then at Winchester, to bring with all possible speed a party of knights from the court to arrest the archbishop of Canterbury, whilst himself kept watch on the sea-coast to prevent his escaping by any port; and the two first did the like on the other side of the water, at Whitsand and another harbour, to seize him if he should get over thither.

These measures for proceeding against Becket in a legal way were unfortunately rendered fruitless by the dispatch of the four barons, who being joined by twelve other knights at the castle of Saltwode, belonging to Ralph de Brock, proceeded directly to Canterbury. The chief business of these assistants seems to have been to keep all quiet within the town, whilst the four knights, entering the archiepiscopal palace with their followers, secured the great gates, and seized two or three knights of the archbishop's family. Then going to that prelate's apartment, they had a warm expostulation with him about his conduct, in which many bitter reproaches passed that enflamed the knights to a great degree: Fitz Stephens says, that what seemed most to incense them, was his maintaining that he had the spiritualities of his see from the pope, and that he held nothing of the king but his temporals, at the same time upbraiding two of them with having received favours from him while chancellor. Whatever was their original design, they were so incensed by these reproaches, that they resolved to take away his life. They were as yet unarmed, and whilst they were putting on their armour, the archbishop might have made his escape; but he either presumed too much on his sacred character, or aspired to the glory of martyrdom: notwithstanding the intreaties of the monks, who apprehended mischief, he determined to assist at vespers, and passed through the cloysters of the convent into the church, followed by the conspirators, and receiving four wounds in the head, dropped down dead before the altar of St. Benedict.

Thus fell Thomas Becket, the victim of his own pride, obstinacy, and revenge, the reigning passions that constantly engrossed his mind, and leavened all his actions; and which, having created him a number of enemies, put them likewise upon desperate measures to screen themselves from his fury, being persuaded that no quarter was to be expected from a man of his implacable disposition. His immeasurable pride and lust of power rendered him impatient of any superior. Unable to bear the least contradiction, and fond of having the direction of all affairs, whatever post he was in, whether ecclesiastical or civil, he treated all those that opposed him with a virulence of behaviour, and a severity of vengeance, which neither suited the character of a Christian bishop nor a decent member of society. When he had any point to gain, he advanced without scruple the most infamous falsehoods, and vouched them as truths under the sanction of the most sacred oaths. It is easy to produce many instances of such falsehood used by him to blacken the character of a great king and a most kind patron, who had raised him by his favours to an unmerited grandeur, out of those very epistles of his which it was thought proper to select and publish as the most favourable to his cause and character; though, taking away the pompous declamations with which they are filled, and the cant terms of the Divine Laws and the Law of God (usually in those ages substituted instead of Papal or Ecclesiastical Canons, which is their true meaning), they furnish but a very wretched apology for his actions: yet such was the blind superstition of those days, that this audacious incendiary, who had been publicly condemned as a traitor by all the lords spiritual and temporal, and who deserved to suffer legally, was canonized and revered as a martyr, about two years and as many months after his death, by pope Alexander (for the interest of the papacy, and to stir up others to the like excesses) without the usual process in such cases, or any formal examination of witnesses to his pretended miracles*, and the twenty-ninth of December was appointed, by a bull directed to all the clergy and people of England, to be kept an-

* Gervase informs us, that such multitudes of miracles were immediately wrought at his tomb, that the number and nature of them, instead of satisfying the world, would, in an age less credulous, have created a suspicion of their reality. Neither Christ nor his apostles performed so many to prove the truth of Christianity, as Becket did to defend the privileges and immunities of the clergy. The monks affirm, that he not only restored dead men to life, but that he even raised the very beasts. They farther add, that being exposed to view in the church, before he was interred, he rose out of his coffin, and went and lighted the tapers which had been extinguished; and that, after the funeral ceremony was over, he held up his hand and blessed the people. The fame of these miracles drew such an immense number of votaries from all parts of Christendom, that in the year 1420, no less than fifty thousand foreigners came on a pilgrimage to the shrine of this renowned martyr.

nually as a festival, in commemoration of Becket's martyrdom. Let us now resume the thread of our narration.

The conspirators, after the fact, reflecting on the nature and consequence of their action, retired to the castle of Knareborough, in Yorkshire, belonging to Hugh de Merville, where they staid near a year by themselves, without conversing with any one. At length, tired with their solitude, and in obedience to the king's command, they submitted to the pope's judgment, repaired to Rome, and afterwards made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, to expiate their offence.

Henry, being thus freed from the disturber of his quiet, was in hopes to enjoy some tranquility; but he found that Becket when dead created him no less trouble than when alive. His enemies, the chief of whom were the king of France and the archbishop of Sens, omitted not so favourable an opportunity to raise him new disturbances: they boldly charged him with being the author of Becket's murder, and pressed the pope to unsheathe the spiritual sword against him. The earl of Blois laid before his holiness the breach of faith on the part of Henry, by breaking his agreement with the archbishop, offering at the same time to assert upon oath, that Henry had given up the offending bishops to the justice of the church, and that he had promised to give Becket satisfaction for having caused his son to be prematurely crowned.

Though it was very difficult to prove that Henry had any hand in the assassination, yet Alexander was willing to embrace this opportunity of humbling a prince who had so long and so nobly opposed the insolent encroachments of the papal chair. Accordingly a day was appointed for excommunicating the king, and laying this kingdom under an interdict; but Henry, who naturally expected something of this kind, had in his own mind prepared against any disagreeable consequences. With this view, in the beginning of the year 1171, he sent to Rome a splendid and numerous deputation of his own subjects and servants, at the head of whom was the archbishop of Rouen; but the negotiation fell chiefly upon one Robert Barre, who appears to have managed it with great dexterity: the pope at first refused to see Henry's ambassadors; but when they found no other means would prevail, they began to intreat after the Roman manner (as Gervase expresses it), that is, they distributed large sums amongst the pope and his cardinals, which soon gained them an audience, the result of which was, that two cardinals should be sent to Normandy, to receive what Henry had to say in his vindication, and to examine into the manner and instruments of Becket's death. While the pope was in this yielding humour, the envoys took occasion to present a petition from the archbishop of York and the bishops of London and Sarum, praying for absolution, and declaring themselves to be ignorant of the pope's prohibitory letter in regard to young Henry's coronation; and affirming, moreover, to be in every respect innocent of Becket's death. Hereupon his holiness deigned to give them the desired absolution, and restored them to their ecclesiastical functions.

The two legates, who were sent by the pope to Normandy, were the cardinals Theodin and Albert. On their arrival, a conference was opened at Avranches, at which Henry and his son assisted, together with all the clergy of Normandy. Here all matters were made up between the king and the pope, on condition that the former should purge himself by oath of being accessory to that prelate's death, or commanding it. This he did in the church of St. Andrew, upon the holy Evangelists and the relics of the saint; and as a farther satisfaction, he swore to the following articles: "That he would never forsake pope Alexander, nor his catholic successors, so long as they acknowledged him a catholic king: that he would not obstruct the freedom of appeals to the court of Rome in all ecclesiastical causes; but if he suspected any persons, he might oblige them to give security that they would not, during their absence, attempt any thing to the prejudice of the king or kingdom: that in Christmas following he would undertake the crusade, and go to Jerusalem for three years; and in case he should be diverted from that expedition, by going into Spain against the Saracens, then he promised to give to the Knights Templars such sum as they should think sufficient to maintain two hundred soldiers for one year, for the defence of the kingdom of Jerusalem: that he would grant a free pardon to all clergy and laymen, who were in exile with archbishop Becket, and restore them to their former possessions and benefices: lastly, that he would restore the possessions of the church of Canterbury, if any had been taken from it, as fully as it enjoyed such possessions a year before the archbishop left England; and that the customs which were contrary to the churches of his lands, lately introduced, should be wholly abolished."

These articles were also sworn to by young Henry, excepting such things as concerned his own person. Several writers affirm, that by a secret article the elder Henry submitted to receive corporal punishment from the hands of priests and monks, at the tomb of the deceased prelate; which, if true, was a meanness unworthy a king, or a man: besides, there does not appear to have been the least occasion for so ignominious a concession, as he had absolutely purged himself from having an actual concern in his death.

Affairs being thus settled between the king and the pope, the legates, by their mediation, set a treaty on foot between him and Lewis, in which Henry consented to the immediate coronation of his daughter-in-law. Accordingly the young king and queen, who had come over to Normandy upon this occasion, instantly set out for England, attended by the archbishop of Rouen, and were solemnly crowned at Winchester on the twenty-seventh of August, 1172.

Thus ended the celebrated event of Henry's differences with Rome, the death of Becket, and the king's reconciliation with the pope and the French monarch, through the mediation of his holiness's legate; which, as they form in themselves a complete episode, I have kept as unmixed with other matter as possible, though they fall under different years. We shall now proceed to display other scenes, wherein Henry will shine in the full meridian of royal lustre.

The reader may remember, that in a note, to p. 249, we mentioned Henry's having formed a plan for the conquest of Ireland. He had actually obtained a grant, in 1155, for that purpose, from pope Adrian IV. under pretence of propagating the Gospel, and correcting the vices of the inhabitants.

bitants. The original pretext for this war, was, that the Irish had taken some natives of England, and sold them for slaves; but the motive that induced Adrian, who was himself an Englishman*, to favour Henry with a bull, was the hope of increasing the power and revenues of the see of Rome; for it was expressly stipulated, that the tribute of Peter-pence should be established over the whole island, as will appear by the bull itself, which we imagine the curious reader will not be displeased to have a sight of, as it will give him an idea of the unparalleled arrogance with which the popes in those days assumed the right of disposing of kingdoms and provinces, as if they had been masters of the whole world.

“The desire your magnificence expressed to advance the glory of your name on earth, and to obtain in heaven the prize of eternal happiness, deserves great commendations. As a good catholic prince, you are very careful to enlarge the borders of the church, to spread the knowledge of the truth among the barbarous and the ignorant, and to extirpate the weeds of vice in the garden of the Lord; for which purpose you apply to us for countenance and direction. We are confident that your enterprize will be crowned with success, inasmuch as you have undertaken it from the noblest motive; for whatever is taken in hand from a principle of faith and religion, is always sure to succeed. It is certain, as you yourself acknowledge, that Ireland, as well as all other islands, that have the happiness to be enlightened by the sun of righteousness, and have submitted to the doctrines of Christianity, are unquestionably St. Peter's right, and belong to the jurisdiction of the Roman see. We therefore think, after having maturely considered the matter, that it will be proper to settle in that island colonies of the faithful, who may be well-pleasing to God.

“You have informed us, most dear son in Christ, that you intend to make an expedition into Ireland, to subject the island to just laws, and to extirpate vice, which has long prevailed in that country. You promise to pay us, out of every house, an yearly acknowledgement of one penny, and to maintain the rights of the church, without the least infringement or diminution. Upon this condition we consent and allow, that you make a descent upon that island, to enlarge the bounds of the church, to check the progress of immorality, to reform the manners of the inhabitants, and to promote the growth of virtue and the Christian religion. We exhort you to do whatever you shall judge necessary to advance the honour of God, and the salvation of the people, whom we charge to submit to your jurisdiction, and own you for their sovereign lord, provided always that the rights of the church be inviolably preserved, and Peter-pence duly paid. If, therefore, you think proper to carry your design in execution, labour above all things to improve the inhabitants in virtue. Use both your own endeavours, and the endeavours of such as you shall judge worthy of being employed in this work, that the church of God be more and more enriched, that religion flourish in the country, and that the things tending to the honour of God and the salvation of souls, be disposed of in such a manner as may entitle you to an immortal fame upon earth, and an eternal reward in heaven.”

Before we proceed any farther, it will be necessary to give the reader some account of this people, the conquest of whom was attempted upon the slightest foundations, and effected with an ease that borders almost upon romance. This account we shall take chiefly from archbishop Usher and sir James Ware.

The Irish, like the old Britons, seem to have been of Celtic original, their language and manners greatly corresponding. Their form of government, at this time, like that of the ancient Britons, was a political confederacy, in which separate states were governed by different princes, who all had a dependence upon one. The knowledge of letters was introduced thither by Patrick, a North Briton, so late as the fifth century; and, with letters, he planted Christianity. Like those of the Scots, their high antiquities have been run up in the most fabulous absurdity by their authors, who were generally void of discernment, taste, or literature, but full of affectation, passion, and prejudice. The Scots, among the other Celtic nations, had settled here soon after the incarnation; and their two most learned antiquaries seem to have given up all pretensions to any knowledge of their history before the fifth century, at which time it was so over-run with ignorance, that they knew not the use even of common characters in writing, the alphabet itself being then first introduced among them. Ignorance begot superstition; and Ireland evacuated her saints in such plenty all over Europe, that it was called the native country of the holy. Their situation, however, and piety afforded the monks a safe retreat; and this gave them leisure to introduce a character in writing, which perhaps our Saxon ancestors copied. The invasion of the Norwegians and Danes, about the seventh century, and afterwards, broke into this asylum; and it is more than probable that the greatest part of the Irish coasts was peopled by Danes and Normans, commonly called Easterlings, who built the cities of Dublin, Limerick, Waterford, Wexford, and Corke, and reduced as much of the adjacent country as was convenient for their purposes. Having no bait for conquest, the native Irish living mostly in caves, and the few houses they had being made of hurdles covered with straw or rushes, the Easterlings seem not to have chosen to extend their conquest to the inland parts of the country. Their numbers were too inconsiderable to people it, their manners too barbarous to civilize it, and their necessities too pressing to be gratified by so unavailing a conquest. It is, however, very probable, that those Easterlings and foreigners had, about this time, mingled with the natives, and that in manners they were become almost the same. The fertility of the soil, the temperature of the air, the conveniency of its harbours, which to other nations bring glory and riches, were to the Irish matters of reproach. The fairest blessings of nature lay unimproved through indolence, nourished by pride. Their healthful vigour was unnerved by inactivity, and they seem to have been void equally of the virtues as the vices of the rest of mankind. Sir James Ware makes violence alone the right by which their kings reigned, and their only title to government, which must constantly have been bloody and precarious. Their ceremonies were more than savage: in short, it can scarcely be said, with any propriety, that they had among them a civil policy*.

* His real name was Nicholas Breakspeare; born in the farm of Langley, belonging to the abbey of St. Alban, in which his father was a servant and lay-brother. Nicholas going to Arles, in Provence, was admitted in quality of servant

Power, however supplying the place of government, there were, in the time of Henry II. five kings among them, or, according to others, seven, Connaught, Corke, Munster, Leinster, Ossory, Meath, and Ulster. But it is probable that two of those kingdoms were sunk into others, since Giraldus Cambrensis, our best authority, mentions only five kingdoms. The king of Connaught was, not from any superiority arising from virtue or election, but from barbarous power, the chief of the rest: his name was Roderic; the name of the king of Leinster was Dermot Mac Morrogh; and O'Rourk was king of Meath: the king of Connaught, because of his superiority, is sometimes called king of Ireland. Omachla, the wife of the king of Meath, had an intrigue with Dermot Mac Morrogh; and the husband, who it seems was no stranger to it, being obliged to go upon an expedition at some distance from his own territories, shut her up within a bog, which lay in an island inaccessible, as he thought, to his rival; but Dermot found means to elude the precaution of O'Rourk, and carried off the willing fair one. This indignity fired the king of Meath, and Roderic, king of Connaught, joining in his resentment, Dermot, who was ill-beloved by his people, after various combats, with unequal force, was obliged to take shipping, and throw himself upon the protection of the king of England.

* It may be proper here to give an abstract of what the ingenious Ware has said with regard to the Irish antiquities. That in their histories there is much falshood. That it is probable they had their origin from Britain, both by reason of the vicinity of Britain, and the easiness of the passage; as also from the conformity of the language and customs with those of the ancient Britons. That to assign the exact time when Ireland was first inhabited, cannot be expected. That, of old, the most potent of their kings (for Ireland was then a pentarchy) assumed to himself the government of the whole island, and was called king of Ireland; and, by some, king of kings; as one to whom the inferior kings allowed the supreme rule. That they obtained the monarchy, not by any solemnity of coronation or anointing, nor by any hereditary right, or propriety of succession, but only by force of arms. That most of those kings died violent deaths; and as, among the Romans, Galba killed Otho, Otho Vitellius, &c. so many of those kings of Ireland, who had stained their hands in the blood of their predecessors, were rewarded alike. That the custom of creating kings in the north of Ireland was this: the whole people of the country being assembled, a white beast was set in the midst of them, to which the candidate, making his approach like a beast upon all fours, professed himself to be a savage beast; and presently the beast being killed, cut to pieces, and boiled, he bathed himself in a chaldron of the broth, prepared for him, and, together with the people, feasted upon the flesh of the beast, and drank of the same broth wherein he had been washed, putting his lips to it, without any vessel, or the use of his hand; which done, his kingdom was confirmed to him. That in the election of Oneal, a shoe was thrown over the head of the elect. That Legarius was the son of Oneal; that he reigned anno 463. That he purposely omits the predecessors of this Legarius, because most of what is delivered of them is either fabulous or very much intermixed

This happened in the year 1167, and Henry was at that time in Normandy; but his affairs would not permit him to enter into the cause of Dermot with the vigour he otherwise would have done. The opportunity, however, was very inviting; and Henry, being willing to make the most of it, gave him a brief, declaring that he had taken him into his royal protection, and giving leave to all his subjects to assist him. Dermot immediately passed over to Britain, where he tarried for some time at Bristol, for the conveniency of hearing how his affairs went in Ireland. Here he caused his brief from the king to be read in public, and was extremely profuse in his promises to all who should assist him in the recovery of his kingdom. At first he was treated with great contempt, and met with no success; but the novelty of the thing excited the curiosity of many, particularly of Richard, earl of Striguel, surnamed Strongbow, called by some of our historians and antiquaries Richard earl of Pembroke. This nobleman had great ambition, and large possessions in Wales, where his tenants were numerous, and the situation of his estate convenient for a passage to Ireland. The bargain between him and the monarch was soon struck; and it was agreed, that in the spring 1168, the earl should assist Dermot to recover his country, upon condition that the latter should give him his daughter in marriage, and leave him heir to his dominions. Robert Fitz Stephens, a young nobleman of great activity and valour, son to the constable of the castle of Aber-teivy, in Wales, now called Cardigan, had succeeded his father in the command of that castle. His mother was Nesta, daughter to Rees, king of South Wales, whose first husband was Gerald, constable of Pembroke castle: thus this lady, who had been mistress to Henry I. was wife to two noblemen, and the mother to the Fitz Gerald. Fitz Stephens, of whom I now speak, had been, through treachery, delivered into the hands of Rees ap Griffin, who was at that time with fables, and without chronology. That the petty kings of particular provinces are sometimes falsely called kings of Ireland (he instances in several.) That what was taken from strangers, as though done for the public good, was esteemed commendable; but that their judges, called Brehons, at certain appointed times, in the open air, and usually on a hill, seated on clods of earth, determined what controversies happened among their neighbours, according to the custom in use among them. That the inheritance of the deceased was equally divided among the sons, both lawfully and unlawfully begotten. That there were, indeed, in Ireland walled towns before the coming of the English, anno 1170, as Dublin, Limerick, Waterford, Wexford, and Corke; but that they were built by the Easterlings, or Danes, who had conquered those parts of the island; but that the native Irish had no walled towns; and their houses were neither marble nor brick, nor subterraneous caves or dens, but made of hurdles, and covered with straw or rushes. That from this poor sort of buildings among the ancient Irish, it comes to pass that we have so few signs remaining of any houses or castles, built by the kings of Ireland before the coming of the English: that, therefore, when Roderic O Connor, king of Connaught, in the year 1161 (or not very long before) built a stone castle at Tuam, it was so new and unusual in those times, that the Irish called it the Wonderful castle. That when Malachias O Morgair, archbishop of Armagh, who was cotemporary with St. Bernard, began to build a stone oratory at Benchor, like those he had seen in other countries, it was the wonder of the natives. And, in fine, that at Temoria, now Tara (the principal residence of the Irish kings, the seat of justice, the place appointed for national assemblies, and where, if we believe Dr. Kennedy, the Royal book, or touchstone of all others were preserved), there is not the least sign or remainder of an ancient building to be seen.

Abercromby's Hist.

meditating

meditating to take up arms against Henry. As Fitz Stephens had great interest and alliances in that country, Rees offered him liberty, upon condition that he would fight on his side with him, against the English government. This proposal being rejected by Fitz Stephens, she continued upon a kind of recognizance to Rees, till the arrival of Dermot at St. David's, where he intended to take shipping for Ireland. Rees ap Griffin being a relation to Dermot, the latter had interest enough to prevail with Rees to give Fitz Stephens liberty to assist him in regaining his dominions. The young man, fond of an opportunity in which he could give so fair a display of his valour, without affecting his honour or allegiance, readily embraced the proposal; and, by the mediation of the bishop of St. David's his uterine brother, Fitz Gerald, and he engaged upon their own credit to carry over a certain number of men to the assistance of Dermot, on condition that the latter should give to him and Maurice Fitz Gerald the city of Wexford in fee, with the two hundreds adjoining. Dermot, having thus settled his affairs, embarked privately at St. David's, and went over to Ireland, where he lay in concealment at Ferns, near Wexford, till next spring.

In the spring of 1168, Robert Fitz Stephens, in pursuance of his engagement with Dermot, embarked for Ireland, with his brother Fitz Gerald, attended by his nephew Meyler Fitz Henry, Milo Fitz David, and Hervey de Montmorency, or Mount-morrice, with sixty knights and three hundred archers, and landed at Bannogh-bay, not far from Waterford, where being joined by Maurice Pendergast and a small body of troops under his command, and afterwards by the forces of Dermot, they advanced to the siege of Wexford, which they soon reduced. Immediately after its reduction, the Irish monarch, agreeable to his promise, put it into the hands of Robert and Maurice, together with the adjoining territories; and bestowed two other districts, near the sea, betwixt Wexford and Waterford, upon Hervey de Mount-morrice, from whom they devolved to the family of Ormond. The party of Dermot being considerably increased since his late successes, he marched at the head of three thousand men against Donald, the petty king of Ossory, and one of his tributaries; but the latter had taken such precautions against the expected visit, that the invaders, despairing of success in that part of the country, resolved to retire. In their retreat, however, they found themselves greatly harassed by the enemy, who, flushed with the little advantage they had gained over a flying foe, followed the chase with so little prudence, that Dermot and Fitz Stephens, perceiving their disorder, determined to turn it to their own advantage, and, having gained a level part of the country, they suddenly faced about, and falling unexpectedly upon their pursuers gave them a total defeat. This check obliged the king of Ossory to sue to Dermot for peace, which was granted him on his swearing fidelity, and giving hostages.

The king of Connaught, alarmed at the progress of the English arms, called a council of the chief men in Ireland, to consult of measures for driving out the invaders. It was here unanimously resolved to fall upon Dermot, whom they considered as a traitor to his country, with their united forces, at one and the same time. Had this plan taken place, there was the greatest probability that both Dermot and the English would have been entirely driven out of the land; for no sooner were the resolutions of this assembly known, than those who had been either dazzled or intimidated by the successes of the enemy, and had declared for Dermot, were now ready to desert him, upon the apprehension of being subjected, through his means, to foreign masters. In a word, the king of Leinster now found himself abandoned by every one but the English; and Fitz Stephens, alarmed at this change of disposition in the natives, thought it most prudent to take possession of an advantageous situation, near Ferns, where he pitched his camp, and strongly fortified it. Roderic, finding the enemy thus inaccessible, knew it would be in vain to hope for success from the most vigorous assault, and therefore had recourse to negotiation, offering Fitz Stephens a considerable reward to draw off his troops and abandon Dermot; but all in vain. At length he applied to Dermot himself, to whom he represented, in the most forcible manner, the great imprudence he was guilty of, in bringing in foreigners, who would not fail to turn the dissensions of the natives to their own advantage, so as to make themselves masters of the whole country. This prediction, whether the effect of the spirit of prophecy, or rather of prudent foresight, was fully verified in the event. For the present, this argument had such weight with the king of Leinster, added to a promise made him by Roderic, that he should have the peaceable possession of his dominions, that, once more shifting sides, he concluded a peace with Roderic, and promised to join him in driving the strangers out of the country.

Whether this tergiversation of Dermot proceeded from natural inconstancy, or from a remorse at the calamities he had brought on his country, he certainly shewed himself a faithless ally to the English, who had come over solely upon his invitation; and his disinheriting his own children in favour of foreigners, as well as his invasion of another man's bed, were acts of perfidy and unnaturality: yet even these failings might have been overlooked, had he stood firm to his engagements with Roderic; but Maurice Fitz Gerald soon after arriving from England with ten knights, thirty horsemen, and three hundred archers, Dermot was so elated with this accession of strength, that he renounced his late engagement, and, joining the English, went and laid siege to the city of Dublin, which in a few days he reduced; though, upon the delivery of hostages, he left it in the possession of Hasculf, the Danish prince, to whom it belonged. These successes, which ought to have united, served to divide the Irish. Public spirit, the only cement of patriotic union, was to them unknown; dissensions, inspired by revenge, envy, and avarice, prevailed among their chiefs, and Ireland fell to the English, though after a less glorious struggle, through the same vices and oversights which had before made Britain a prey to the Roman invaders. A war now broke out between Donald O'Brien, king of Limerick, son-in-law to Dermot, and Roderic, king of Connaught. Donald, who was the weakest, immediately called in the English to his assistance; and Fitz Stephens, marching to his relief, defeated Roderic's army in several engagements, and forced him to retire back into Connaught.

In the mean time, Dermot, having recovered possession of his own kingdom with so little difficulty, aspired to the conquest of Connaught, and by that means to make himself sole monarch of Ireland. This project he imparted to Robert and Maurice; but they not chusing to risk the certain possessions they had gained, by engaging in precarious schemes, advised him to press the earl of Striguel to make good his engagements, which he had hitherto neglected, and to come to their assistance with a powerful force.

Richard Strongbow, earl of Striguel and Pembroke, was, of all Henry's subjects, the most obnoxious to him: the latter was jealous of the great power and abilities of Richard, and had strictly prohibited him from engaging in this expedition; but the earl, in hopes of making his fortune, upon the receipt of Dermot's letters went to Normandy, to solicit the king's leave to fulfil his engagements, into which he had entered in virtue of the royal brief; and having received an ambiguous answer, which he construed into an assent, sent over Raymond le Gros, with ten cavaliers and seventy archers, intending to follow soon after with greater forces. Raymond landed in the beginning of May, 1170, at Dundevil, four miles from Waterford; the inhabitants of which place, hoping to destroy him before he could be farther reinforced, attacked him with a body of three thousand horse and foot; but were, after a sharp dispute, entirely defeated with the loss of a thousand men, by Hervey de Mount-morrice, who had come accidentally with a party of his followers, to visit Raymond.

Richard himself landed on Sunday, August 23, with two hundred knights and one hundred archers, near Waterford; and carrying the place by storm the Thursday after their arrival, took in it Reynald, prince of the Danes of that city, and Malachy O'Brien, a petty Irish prince. After this the earl solemnized his marriage with the fair Eva, and they were both publicly declared heirs of Dermot's territories, though the son of this last, who had been left by his father in the hands of Roderic, king of Connaught, as an hostage for his father's performance of the late treaty, was still living.

And now the earl, with his father-in-law, marched to Dublin, which they took, about the end of September, by storm, Hasculf, with many of the citizens, making their escape in boats to the Orkades, or Orkneys. Soon after they made an incursion into Meath, wasting the country with fire and sword: but winter now setting in, Dermot returned to Ferns, and Strongbow to Waterford, leaving Miles Cogan governor of Dublin.

The rapidity of these conquests did not a little excite the jealousy of Henry, who began to apprehend, that if Strongbow should acquire the sovereignty of Ireland, he might become as formidable to the crown of England as himself and his predecessors, since their accession to the English throne, had been to that of France. To prevent this, Henry, by a proclamation, ordered all his subjects to return out of Ireland by the Easter following, and forbade the sending any more supplies thither. The earl, startled at this resolution of the king, sent over Raymond to Normandy, where Henry then was, with letters, full of submission and duty, professing himself ready to resign into the hands of the king all his late-made acquisitions in Ireland.

This prudent measure had the desired effect. Henry was so highly pleased with this instance of the earl's loyalty and submission, that he not only ordered his lands in England and Normandy, which had been sequestered, to be restored to him, but likewise created him seneschal or constable of Ireland: and Dermot dying at Ferns, on the fourth of May, A. D. 1171, earl Richard saw himself by that event lord of all Leinster, and the most powerful prince in the island.

In the interval, Hasculf having gotten together a numerous body of forces from the Orkneys and Hebrides*, made a descent, with a fleet of sixty ships, at the mouth of the Liffey, and attacked Dublin; but being defeated by Miles Cogan, was taken and put to death. This unsuccessful expedition was, however, only a prelude to a much greater enterprize, formed by Roderic, king of Connaught, for driving the English out of Ireland, in which, beside the great levies he made in his own territories and the neighbouring provinces, amounting to thirty thousand men, he was assisted by Godred, king of the Isle of Man and of the western islands. Thus reinforced, he invested the city of Dublin, and continued the siege for two months, in hopes of obliging the inhabitants to surrender for want of provisions. But Strongbow having found means to throw himself into the town with a small supply of forces, and finding that there were no hopes left but to force a passage through the enemy sword in hand, he sallied out very early one morning, with a body of ninety of his most trusty knights and their esquires, and fell upon the enemy so unexpectedly and with such impetuosity, that the troops of the confederates, not prepared for such a visit, were in a short time put to a general rout, followed by a terrible slaughter, Roderic himself escaping with great difficulty.

The next day Richard marched to the relief of Robert Fitz Stephens, who was besieged in Carrick, near Wexford, by the Danes of those parts, and Donald, a bastard son of king Dermot; but before the earl arrived, Fitz Stephens had surrendered, on condition of being transported to Wales. After this the affairs of the English in Ireland remained for some time in a doubtful inactivity.

Henry, whom as I have observed before, looked with a jealous eye upon the successes of Strongbow, was not so well satisfied with his offers of submission, but that he was desirous seeing how things went on with his own eye, and therefore determined to pass over into Ireland in person. Previous, however, to this step, he sent Hervey de Mount-morrice over to Waterford, with letters, charging the earl of Striguel, upon his allegiance, to repair to him, and give an account of his conduct. The earl was in no condition to disobey such a summons, and therefore instantly went over to England, and waited upon Henry at Newnham, near Gloucester, where he then kept his court, after having settled his affairs in Normandy, and committed the government of that duchy to his son and co-partner in the throne. There Henry obliged the earl to renounce all his pretensions to Dublin and its dependencies, with all the maritime places he held in Ireland, at the same time confirming to him his other possessions there.

Henry, intending to finish the conquest of Ireland in his own person, assembled a numerous army; and, in his march through Wales, received the submission of Rees, and the son of Owen Guineith, with whom he compromised all differences, in order to prevent their sending any succours to the Irish.

Gytten Owen, the last eminent poet and antiquary among the Welsh bards, informs us, that, about this period, one of the sons of Owen Guineith, named Madoc, having been deprived of his inheritance by his brothers, equipped a few ships, and sailed with his adherents to the north of Ireland, in quest of some new habitation; and then steering westward, arrived at an unknown land, which was probably the coast of Florida, or some more northern part of America. Leaving most of his people behind him, he returned to Wales, and gave such an advantageous account of this new country, that he prevailed upon a great number of families to follow his fortune; and embarking these on board of ten ships, he again set sail for his infant colony. Smollett gives it as his opinion, that this settlement must have been destroyed in the sequel, and that in all likelihood the second embarkation perished at sea, "otherwise (says he) they could not have been so entirely cut off from all communication with their mother-country, but that some kind of correspondence would have been maintained, or at least some vestige of them have remained on the spot where they fixed their habitation." Nevertheless, there seems to be great probability in the above account; and what adds to it, is the number of British words which are to be found in the language of the Americans, and in the names of places, such as the island of Coroeso, Cape Breton; the river Gwyn-dor; and Pengwyn, the White Rock. Besides, whoever attentively peruses the late accounts that have been published of the manners of the North Americans, will find a strong resemblance between the customs of these savages and those of the ancient Britons, to whatever cause it may be assigned.

But now to return to Henry. Arriving at Pembroke, he embarked about the beginning of autumn, 1171, with his forces on board of four hundred vessels; and, after a quick and safe passage, landed next day in Ireland, about eight miles from Waterford. The first act of the Irish, after his landing, amounts to a proof of Gervase's assertion, that those people had been privately tampered with by Henry, and had actually invited him over, chusing rather to live under his government than that of the earl of Pembroke; for he was by them presented with the brave Fitz Stephens, whom, as a disobedient traitor, he sent to prison loaded with chains. Soon after, Dermot Mac Carty, king of Corke, did him homage, gave hostages, and agreed to pay an annual tribute.

After about a fortnight's stay at Waterford, he marched with his army to Lismore and Cashel, where he received the submission of Donald, king of Ossory; Malachy or Melachlan O'Phelan, king of Decies; Reynald, prince of Waterford; and Donald O'Brien, king of Thomond or Limerick.

All these toparchs he treated with great kindness, and made them some valuable presents; but, at the same time, he took care to put strong garrisons into Corke, Limerick, and Wexford. Thus securing himself against all the interest of the earl of Striguel, he returned to Waterford, where he restored Fitz Stephens to liberty, but stripped him of all his acquisitions.

Having thus taken every necessary precaution to guard against a revolt, he marched through the province of Ossory to Dublin, where he arrived on the twenty-first of December; and while he staid there, he saw all the kings of the island arrive at his court, and with emulation strive who should first swear allegiance. Roderic O'Connor, monarch of Ireland, finding himself deserted by all the other sovereigns, was at last obliged to make his submission: accordingly he met Hugh de Lacy and William Fitz Adelm, Henry's ambassadors, on the banks of the Shannon, where he took an oath of allegiance to the king of England, and engaged to pay him an annual tribute.

Thus Henry, without the effusion of a single drop of blood, became master of Ireland in less time than was sufficient to travel over it, and most of the tributary princes attended his court, which he kept at Dublin, during the Christmas holidays; his palace was indeed homely, being, according to Brompton, built only of wattles; but his manner of living was magnificent, which struck the Irish, who had no ideas of grandeur, with great esteem and respect.

The clergy, who, ever since Henry's application to the pope, in the beginning of his reign, had always laboured to subject their country to the English, met in a general council at Waterford, in the month of March, A. D. 1172; and in this assembly, which was very full†, they sealed their subjection, by severally delivering him writings, in which they acknowledged him their sovereign master, and submitted to him and his heirs for ever. These instruments were transmitted to Rome; and Alexander, who was glad of such addition of power and interest to the see of Rome, readily confirmed his title.

During the winter which Henry passed in Ireland, he employed his time in settling the government of that country. He made Hugh de Lacy, one of his most approved servants, governor of Dublin, and invested him with all the county of Meath in hereditary fee, to be held by the service of one hundred knights or horsemen: he likewise made him justiciary or lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The cities of Waterford and Wexford were rebuilt and given to Robert Fitz Bernard. At length, finding that the state of affairs in England and Normandy required his presence, he left Ireland on the seventeenth of April, in the morning, and landed that same day at Portfinan, near St. David's in Pembrokeshire; and as he was extremely desirous of ending his unlucky dispute with the court of Rome, he immediately set out for Normandy, to meet the two cardinals, Albert and Theodun, who had waited for him there till their patience was tired, when he compromised all matters relating to the dispute with Becket and the pope, and the death of the former, in the manner already related.

† At this council Christian, bishop of Lismore, presided, as the pope's legate; and Ralph, abbot of Buldewas, archdeacon of Llandaff, and some of the king's chaplains, were sent to assist at it, in order to promote a design which Henry had formed, of bringing the church of Ireland to a perfect conformity with that of England. Hib. expugn. lib. i. cap. 35, &c.

Let us now attend Henry in his domestic concerns, where we shall discover the causes of all that unhappiness which clouded the latter part of his reign.

During his absence from England, a conspiracy was formed against him, which was so much the more dangerous as his queen and own sons were the authors: besides, it was countenanced by some of the principal barons of the realm, and several foreign princes. Queen Eleanor was moved to it, according to some historians, by her jealousy of Henry's amour with the fair Rosamond, daughter of Walter de Clifford, a baron of Herefordshire†: but it was more probably owing to her resentment at his leaving her no share in the administration of her paternal dominions on the continent. Henry, the king's eldest son, a young prince of a very haughty temper, was weary of bearing the regal title without the authority: Richard, naturally turbulent and restless, was tired with being under the discipline of the king, who, indeed, had made him earl of Poitou, but suffered him not to enjoy that dignity: Geoffrey had still more cause to complain than his brothers; he saw himself deprived of the government of Brittany under the specious pretence of a guardianship, for which he thought he had no longer occasion. The English nobles engaged in this confederacy from the hopes of enjoying greater credit and authority under young Henry than under his father. Lewis, king of France, saw, to his great mortification, Henry not only triumphing over his difficulties with the church, but likely to add a great accession to his power by the conquest of Ireland: unable to check him by his arms, he sought to do it by artifice, but after an unnatural and unjustifiable manner, by engaging in a project with a rebellious wife and children against their king, their husband, and their parent. With this view he sent a letter to the king of England, expressing an earnest desire to see his son-in-law, and his daughter, whom he had parted with when she was very young.

Henry, who had just made up matters with Lewis, through the mediation of the pope's legates, could find no pretext to hinder this, and the young pair set out for Paris, where they were magnificently entertained by Lewis, who now employed every artifice most likely to enflame the mind of the young king against his father: he observed to him, that he possessed only the shadow of royalty; that his power was more limited than that of a private nobleman, and his appointment not much more extensive; concluding his insinuations with a hint which he thought the most likely to rouse the ambitious spirit of the giddy Henry, namely, that he was actually entitled to the government of the kingdom ever since his coronation. These suggestions had their desired effect; the vain and disobedient prince looked upon himself as injured while any authority remained with his father, and took the unnatural resolve, from that instant to endeavour to strip him of power and authority, to whom he stood indebted for his existence and dignity.

And now the elder Henry began to grow uneasy at his son's staying so long at the court of a prince, whose jealousy of himself he well knew, and whose insidious arts he had more than once experienced. He therefore sent an order to the young king to return to Normandy, who obeyed the mandate: but it was only to offer an insult of the grossest kind to his father; for no sooner was he arrived than (pursuant to the advice which had been given him by Lewis) he demanded to be put in possession of the duchy of Normandy, or of the kingdom of England; a request which the father rejected with indignation and anger.

In the beginning of the year 1173, the king, accompanied by his queen Eleanor, and his eldest son, set out for Montferrand, a small town in Auvergne, where he was to hold a conference with Hubert, earl of Maurienne, concerning a treaty of marriage between the daughter of that earl and prince John, his fourth son. But as this affair could not be concluded to the satisfaction of all parties at the first conference, Hubert accompanied the king to Limoges, whither he went to receive the homage of Raymond, count of St. Giles, for the earldom of Falaife. Here Hubert urged Henry to declare what he would do for the prince his son, on account of the marriage. Henry named Chinon, Landun, and Mirabel, with their dependencies, as a settlement; but the young king laid hold of this opportunity strongly to oppose his father's will, alleging that it was an unheard-of thing, for an appennage to be settled on the youngest son, whilst he refused to do the same, during his life, for the eldest, who bore the title of king without having wherewithal to support him agreeable to his character. This opposition created a great coldness between the father and the son, and, added to his late peremptory demand of Normandy, made the former from that time suspect that some evil designs were hatching. To prevent the worst, he removed from about the young king's person every one whom he thought most likely to have given him bad advice, and in their room filled his court with those whom he knew to be devoted to himself. The event sufficiently shewed how well he judged of mankind; for in a very short time young Henry, though very closely watched by his father, made his escape to the court of France, just at the proper crisis of concerted rebellion; for queen Eleanor, who was then in England with her two sons, Richard, duke of Aquitaine, and Geoffrey, earl of Brittany, having early intelligence of Henry's escape, sent over both those princes to join in the confederacy, or rather conspiracy, against her husband.

† Rosamond must have been, by this time, in the wane of her beauty, inasmuch as the youngest of the two sons she bore to Henry was now turned of twenty years of age. The names of these two sons were, William Longue Espée, who was afterwards created earl of Salisbury; and Geoffrey, who was this year elected bishop of Lincoln. Both these noblemen continued to serve their father with great fidelity and success. Geoffrey, especially, distinguished himself so remarkably for his attachment to his father, that the king bestowed upon him the following encomium, viz. "that he had proved himself to be his true and legitimate offspring, whilst his other sons had acted as if they were really bastards."

Henry is said to have concealed his fair mistress in a labyrinth at Woodstock, from the jealous researches of his queen, who nevertheless, according to the common report, found means to discover her retreat, and take her off by poison. This account, however, is founded upon no better authority than that of the old ballad, composed upon the subject. But if we may believe Brompton, Rosamond did not die in 1173, nor was she poisoned by queen Eleanor. This author expressly says, that after Henry had imprisoned queen Eleanor, he continued to keep Rosamond publicly for a considerable time. This famous lady was buried in a church belonging to Godstow nunnery, near Oxford. There are no vestiges of the labyrinth remaining, but her monument has been lately repaired and beautified.

Lewis of France was not the only prince who was jealous of the elder Henry's growing power; William, king of Scots, saw it, and trembled: Henry had not yet put him in full possession of Northumberland, and he had not laid aside his claim, though he had his arms; but now he thought he had a fair opportunity of employing both. Accordingly he followed young Henry over to Paris, under pretence of renewing the famous league between the Scottish and French nations, and to balance the growing power of Henry, who was considered by them as the common enemy. At the same time several other noblemen, both in England and on the continent, actuated differently by hopes and fears, joined in the scheme to put a check to Henry's ambition.

Upon the elopement of the young Henry, the king his father sent to the court of France, to demand him; but received a very insolent answer from Lewis. Upon this he gave orders for fortifying all his castles upon the frontiers; and, being conscious of the powerful confederacy formed against him, he took into his pay twenty thousand Brabanders, all veteran troops, whom, by his liberality, he attached to his person and fortunes. It is not likely that Henry's true sense of honour would have permitted him to employ men of their character*, at any other period; but amidst this general defection of his subjects, he could not have taken a more prudent measure; for by this time the spirit of disloyalty had spread into England, where the earls of Chester and Leicester† had publicly declared in favour of the young king; and several barons in Normandy having betrayed the castles committed to their charge, he was obliged to garrison the rest with part of his Brabanders, and to keep a body of the same troops always about his person, ready to march at an hour's warning, wherever the enemy should offer to invade his dominions. At the same time, that he might omit nothing requisite to provide against the impending danger, he sent ambassadors to the court of Rome to solicit the pope in his favour; and filled the vacant see of Canterbury with Richard, prior of Dover‡, a person inviolably attached to his interest; and also imprisoned his queen, Eleanor, whom he looked upon as the principal author of all this conspiracy: she was taken in man's disguise, attempting to escape out of England and join the princes her sons.

Mean while young Henry, who continued at Paris, acted as if he had been sole king of England: he received the homage of his vassals, made grants and donations of the crown-lands||, assigned pensions out of the public revenues, under a new great-seal which he had caused to be made for this purpose. A great council of the French peers, both spiritual and temporal, was now held at Paris, at which the young king assisted as a peer of France. Here it was resolved that a general confederacy should be entered into against Henry, and Lewis was himself the first to take an oath to assist young Henry to the utmost of his power to force his father to resign to him the kingdom of England: in this he was followed by the rest of the assembly, and young Henry with his two brothers, on their parts, swore in like manner, and gave security, that they would never depart from the alliance they had contracted, nor make peace with their father, without the consent of the king and court of France.

The utter ruin of the elder Henry seemed now at hand, considering the number and power of the enemies he had to struggle with at once; and he stood in need of all his resolution to bear so many vexations, and of all his prudence to ward against the complicated treasons of those who were his opposers. Quickly after the breaking up of the French council, the confederate princes attacked him in several places: Richard repaired to Guienne, where he raised the greatest part of the country in rebellion; Geoffrey stirred up an insurrection in Brittany, and put himself at the head of it, with a design to wrest the government of that earldom from his father; Normandy was attacked by the king of France, assisted by the earls of Flanders, Boulogne, and Blois; the king of Scotland made an irruption into the northern parts of England; and a French army, headed by the earl of Leicester, landed in England, in expectation of a general revolt of the English against the king. The particulars of so dissipated a war are needless, and would be difficult to be recounted; I shall therefore only observe, that Henry, whatever weakness he might have shewn in his quarrel with the pope, appeared in a very different light on this occasion; never did his virtues shine forth with greater lustre than when he saw himself reduced to extremity: animated with fresh courage at sight of the impending danger, he managed his affairs with so much firmness, prudence, and forecast, that, in spite of all the obstacles which started up incessantly and from all quarters, he obtained in the end a glorious advantage over all his enemies. The king of France was obliged to abandon the siege of Verneuil, after it had cost him much time and many lives: an army of ten thousand Brabanders, sent by Henry into Brittany, vanquished the rebels there, and obliged them to return to their duty: the earl of Leicester was defeated in England, and taken prisoner, by Humphrey de Bohun, the king's general, who took the opportunity of a truce made with the king of Scotland, to give the earl battle§. As soon as the truce was expired, William renewed

* A kind of banditti, or free-booters, who lived upon plunder, and were always ready to engage in the service of any prince who could pay them punctually. They were called Brabanders, because the chief of their leaders were natives of the province of Brabant; but the main body of them consisted of the refuse of France, Germany, and the Low Countries. Though they served for hire, yet, when they were well paid, no natural subjects could behave with greater fidelity; and though accustomed to plunder, yet, in time of action, they were most rigid observers of military discipline.

† The rest of the conspirators in England were, Robert, earl of Ferrers; Hugh Bigod, earl of Norfolk; Roger de Mowbray, Thomas de Muschamp, Robert de Lund, Richard de Merville, Gervase Poynell, &c. In Normandy, several surrendered their castles to young Henry, Guy and Geoffrey de Lusignan: and the same in Anjou and Guienne. Ralph de Fougeres raised an insurrection in Brittany; as did also Eudo, count of Perhouet, or Penthievre.

‡ It was first offered to Roger, abbot of Bec, in Normandy, but on his refusal given to this Richard.

|| To William, king of Scotland, he granted all Northumberland as far as the Tyne: to his brother, the earldom of Huntingdon and Cambridgeshire: to Hugh Bigod, the castle of Norwich: to Philip, earl of Flanders, a thousand pounds a year in England, and all Kent, with the castles of Dover and Rochester: to Matthew, earl of Boulogne, the manor of Kirke-ton, in Lincolnshire; with the earldom of Mortaigne, and honour of Haie: to Theobald, earl of Blois, two hundred pounds in Anjou, and the castle of Amboise. Hoved.

his ravages in Northumberland; but whilst he was intent upon the plunder, he unfortunately, or rather imprudently, suffered himself to be surprised by the English general, who routed his army, and took him prisoner ¶. The Scots pretend this was during the truce, but the English affirm that it was after the expiration: however this might be, the brutality of the English to their royal captive is inexcusable; they put him upon a horse with his feet tied under the creature's belly, and thus ignominiously conveyed him to Richmond castle, there to be kept till Henry's pleasure should be known*.

Whilst the arms of Henry were thus crowned with success in England, he was employed on the continent in reducing the revolted cities and provinces. Though he could not be in every place at once, yet he ordered it so, that in a few months, either by himself or his generals, he became master of the principal places in Guienne, Xaintonge, Anjou, Poictou, and Brittany. These successes quite broke the measures of the confederates, and dissipated those apprehensions he had justly conceived in the beginning of the war.

In the mean time, Philip, earl of Flanders, who had sworn on the Gospels that he would, within a fortnight after Midsummer, subdue all England for Henry the son, joined this prince with three hundred and eight choice men, who was himself at the head of an army of French and Flemings, ready for making a descent upon England. Accordingly they marched in concert to Gravelines, in order to embark; but contrary winds prevented them from putting to sea. It is hard to say what the event might have been, had not this obstacle happened. However, the elder Henry, who was now in Poictou, upon hearing of the intended invasion, settled his affairs with amazing expedition, and embarking at Barfleur, landed, together with his queen and the earls of Leicester and Chester, all three prisoners, on the eighth day of July, 1174.

The greatest princes must sometimes submit, in certain exigencies, to comply with the humours, and conform to the notions of their subjects, however mortifying it may be to the ideas of their own consequence, or disgusting to their good understanding. This was, at this time, Henry's case: Thomas Becket had been lately canonized, and was now in all the odour of sanctity. The ridiculous stories of his pretended miracles had gotten possession of the people of England, and he was become the great object of their devotions, and their favourite patron and intercessor with Heaven. The king had lain under severe suspicions of being accessory to his death; nor were the commonalty thoroughly satisfied with the purgation he had made by oath: this was the only point in which his conduct seemed the least reprehensible, nor could his subjects prefer any other cause of complaint or reproach. In order, therefore, to remove any ill effects of those suspicions, and also to ingratiate himself with the people by striking in with the reigning mode of their devotion, he was no sooner landed, than, deferring all other business, he set out immediately to pay his homage to the shrine of that reputed saint at Canterbury. No sooner did he come within sight of the cathedral, which was three miles distant, than he alighted from his horse, and walked bare-footed to the tomb of the saint, his blood, drawn by the sharp stones, marking every step: there he ingloriously prostrated himself, while he received on his bare back three, some say five, lashes from each bishop, abbot, and monk there present; after this, he lay all night on the pavement without any thing under him, and spent all the next day in fasting, as he had done the day before: afterwards he made a solemn procession round all the altars of the place; and then, retiring to the shrine of the sainted rebel, he offered a gift of forty pounds per annum for finding perpetual lights at his tomb. To such meannesses was this great king reduced, by the unnatural behaviour of his own family, and the perfidy of a neighbour and ally!

On the morrow he returned to London, where he received the agreeable news of the taking of the king of Scots: great care was taken on this occasion to magnify the new saint's credit in the celestial court, by remarking that Henry was indebted for the success of his arms to St. Thomas's intercession †. It was farther affirmed, that the king himself was so persuaded of it, that he had the strongest opinion of his sanctity ‡.

Henry, a few days after his arrival in London, marched against Hugh Bigod, one of the most powerful of the English malecontents, and invested his castle of Framlingham. Bigod knew too well whom he had to deal with, to attempt holding out to extremities: he entered upon a capitulation, and, upon his delivering up the castles of Framlingham and Bungay ||, he obtained pardon for himself, and leave for a body of Flemings under him to depart to their own country. Henry then went to Northampton, where he was presented with the king of Scots, who was brought before him in an ignominious manner; and Hugh, bishop of Durham, who had, during the troubles, affected an entire independency, now delivered into the king's hands the castle of Norham and Alverton; as the earl of Leicester's officers did those of Leicester, Mount-Sorrel, and Groby: at this time likewise Mowbray was constrained to deliver up the castle of Thirsk, and the earl of Ferrers, those of Stotville and Duffelde.

Thus, in less than a month, all England, from the most imminent danger of being lost to the elder Henry, was reduced to tranquility under his government. This threw such a damp upon his enemies spirits, that the king of France was glad to dispense with the earl of Flanders' Quixotic oath, on condition that the latter would join him in carrying on the war with vigour in Normandy.

* He was afterwards conveyed to Normandy, and imprisoned at Falaise, with the earl of Leicester.

† It happened that very day the king left Canterbury, being the thirteenth of July, the king of Scotland was taken prisoner, which the monks imputed to Becket's merit: and the same day also his son Henry's ships, wherewith he intended to pass into England, were dispersed by a storm. R. Diceto.

‡ It appears, from a story told us by Geraldus Cambrensis, that Henry submitted to this ignominious penance, not from any superstitious notions of his own, but merely in order to gratify the people. John, bishop of Norwich, having a suit with William, earl of Arundel, had laid him under excommunication. The earl came to prefer his complaints to the king, who was then attended by his prelates and nobility; and Henry, in the hearing of them all, turned to his prelates, and said, "I would advise you, bishops, to be more cautious how you meddle with my barons, and not to excommunicate them so rashly; for though one of you may have succeeded in so doing, you will not all, if you should chance to be killed for such insolent attempts, arrive at the honour of martyrdom."

Accordingly

Accordingly the troops, which were lying at Gravelines, returned back and joined Lewis, who went and laid siege to Rouen, of which he hoped to make himself master before Henry could come to it relief; but the brave resistance of the inhabitants baffled his designs. Upon the first notice of the siege, Henry put to sea with a strong body of forces, and was so expeditious that he arrived in Normandy before Lewis had made any progress. His sudden coming struck such a terror into his enemy, that he raised the siege, and fled with the utmost precipitation, leaving all his baggage behind him.

Soon after this, the archbishop of Sens and the earl of Blois offered their mediation to bring about a peace between Henry, his sons, and the French king. A conference was accordingly agreed upon, at Gisors, on the eighth of September, 1174*. Both kings were heartily weary of the war: Lewis, now above sixty years of age, despaired of accomplishing what he had projected in the beginning of his quarrel; he found the confederacy, by which he thought to have pulled down Henry, had rather fixed him more firmly on his throne; and feared, with reason, that in case he should die during the course of the war, he should leave his son, Philip Augustus, then only ten years of age, too much embarrassed to hope for success. On the other hand, the king of England was equally inclined to peace: he earnestly wished to deprive his sons of their only refuge, the protection of France. Richard, his second son, a prince of a fiery and restless temper, was the only person that opposed the desired pacification; but neither his two brothers nor the king of France thought proper to protract the war to oblige him: they consented therefore to a truce, during which they left Henry the father at full liberty to reduce his obstinate son to reason, promising faithfully to give the latter no assistance, who at last, seeing himself destitute of support, threw himself at his father's feet, on the twenty-third of September.

If Henry had a weakness, it was that of being too indulgent to his children: he received his unnatural son with a paternal affection, as if he had never offended him; and a meeting of all parties was appointed on Michaelmas-day following, between Tours and Amboise. As the parties stood affected, it was not difficult to settle the articles of agreement, which were thirteen in number, and in substance as follow:

By the Ist, the sons of Henry renounced all the engagements they had entered into against him.

By the IId, they absolved all their tenants and barons from the oaths they had entered into against the elder Henry, and returned to their allegiance.

By the IIId, all the elder Henry's tenants and barons were to re-enter upon those estates they held fifteen days before the rupture. The same provision was made for the barons, and others, who had followed the princes against their father.

The IVth provides an absolute pardon, without reserve of ill-will and malice, on the parts of the kings, elder and younger, to all parties who had taken up arms, upon their future good behaviour.

By the Vth, the elder Henry gives to the king his son two convenient castles in Normandy, and fifteen thousand Anjovine pounds: to Richard he gives two convenient castles in Poictou, to be held so as no damage may thereby accrue to his father, with half the revenues of Poictou: to his son Geoffrey (who, it seems, had not yet consummated his marriage with the daughter of the earl of Brittany) he gave half the revenues of that earldom; and upon such consummation, promises to give him the whole.

By the VIth, a provision was settled for the prisoners; but the king of Scots, the earls of Leicester and Chester, with Ralph de Fougères, were expressly excluded from all benefit by it: and it was provided that Henry the elder should exact pledges from as many of them as he thought proper, and as were able to give them; while the others were to swear fealty to him anew.

By the VIIth, all castles, fortified in the time of the war, were to be reduced to the same state they were in fifteen days before the rupture: but this was left to the elder Henry's pleasure.

By the VIIIth, the younger Henry promises to execute faithfully all his father's charitable and other donations.

By the IXth, he promises faithfully to observe his father's will, in the provision for his son John, viz. one thousand pounds yearly out of his estates in England; with the castle and earldom of Nottingham, and their dependencies; and the castle of Marlborough, with its dependencies; and out of Normandy, two castles, such as his father should appoint, with one thousand pounds of Anjovine money; out of Anjou, one thousand pounds of Anjovine money out of the estates belonging to the late earl of Anjou, with one castle; and one castle in Maine, with another in Touraine.

By the Xth, all forfeitures were pardoned, incurred in consequence of any subjects leaving the king; and they are not accountable for any effects they might have carried off: but in all capital cases, and breaches of the peace, they were to put in sureties for standing their trials according to the laws of the land. Likewise all forfeitures incurred before the war broke out, were recoverable; and all pleas and suits commenced before the rupture, were to remain in statu quo.

The like provision was made, by the XIth, with regard to those who were in courts of justice before the war, and had gone off to join the young king.

By the XIIth, king Henry the younger promises an exact observance of the above articles, as did his brothers, promising, at the same time, never to offer, by violence, to extort from him any conditions other than what were then and there expressed; and never again to withdraw their allegiance from their father and lord the king.

By the last article, the two princes, Richard and Geoffrey, became the king their father's liegemen.

Thus Henry, by his admirable prudence, unshaken fortitude, invincible courage, and amazing activity, triumphed at last over all his enemies, after having defeated a conspiracy perhaps the most dangerous that ever was formed against any prince in Christendom; and no part of his conduct did him so much honour as the magnanimity and moderation he manifested towards those who had laboured his destruction. The princes of Galloway having shaken off the Scottish yoke, and asserted their independency, Henry had, from the dictates of sound policy, supported them in their revolt; but no sooner was he informed that Gilbert, one of the chieftains of that country, had most inhumanly put his own brother Uchtred to death, than he broke off all connection with such barbarous people, and compromised his difference with William, king of Scotland, who was still a prisoner at Falaise, and whither a great number of Scotch prelates, earls, and barons assembled, for settling the terms of their sovereign's release; and a convention was signed, by which all ambiguity in former conventions between the ancestors of either party was wholly removed; and William did homage to the king of England for Scotland and all his other territories, as he did likewise to young Henry, saving the allegiance due to the king his father: he also undertook for all his nobility and clergy, that they should swear fealty to the king of England; and that the church of Scotland should be subject to that of England. English felons, taking refuge in Scotland, were not to be harboured there. The vassals of each king were to enjoy the lands which they held in either kingdom. And the castles of Berwick, Roxburgh, Jedburgh, Edinburgh, and Stirling were to be put into Henry's hands, as a security for the performance of the articles. David, earl of Huntingdon, brother to the Scottish king, did also homage to Henry, and was delivered as an hostage, with four earls and sixteen barons, until the castles should be surrendered: and the Scottish prelates and nobility engaged to stand by Henry, as well against the king of Scotland if he broke the convention, as against all his other enemies. The castles being shortly after delivered, and Henry being now perfectly secure on that quarter, suffered William to return to his kingdom.

Having conducted Henry to this happy conclusion of his troubles, we will now return to Ireland. Notwithstanding the facility with which Henry had made the conquest of that country, the natives were far from being easy under their new masters. Probably these latter might have been guilty of some excesses and acts of oppression towards a people whom they looked upon as vanquished vassals. Whatever might have been the cause, the Irish, soon after the death of O' Rourk, entered into a general confederacy to expel the English from amongst them; a resolution warranted by all the laws of policy and liberty. These preparations, however, soon came to the knowledge of the English government; and about Michaelmas, 1173, Henry, having triumphed over his enemies, sent Strongbow back to Ireland, with the title of guardian of the realm, and a grant of the town of Wexford and the castle of Wicklow, to reward his services. But Richard did not chuse to accept of the government until Raymond le Gros was joined with him in commission; and as soon as he received Dublin from Hugh de Lacy, the late guardian, he entrusted the command of the army to his colleague, who was no less beloved by the soldiers for his humanity, than admired for his courage and intrepidity.

Raymond was no sooner put in possession of his post than he resolved to distinguish himself by some memorable action. He first invaded Ophaly, which he plundered; and having refitted his men with arms and horses, he fell upon and took Lismore. But the Irish all this time were not idle: the people of Corke had fitted out a strong naval armament; and having notice that Raymond was sending the booty he had got at Lismore, round to Waterford by sea, they resolved to intercept his ships, and accordingly put to sea, under the command of one Gilbert Fitz Cutzer; but Adam de Hereford, who commanded Raymond's fleet, gave them such a warm reception, that the Irish admiral was killed, and most of his ships destroyed.

Soon after this Raymond was called over to Wales by his own private affairs; and the earl of Pembroke not chusing to take the whole command upon himself, associated with him Hervey de Mount-morrice, whom he knew to be unexceptionable to Henry. By this general's advice the earl marched to Cashel, where he ordered all the forces that were about Dublin to meet him; and he was also joined by a body of Easterlings, as they were called, being partly Danes and partly Norwegians, who had made an accommodation with the English, and were by them permitted to live undisturbed in and about Dublin, upon condition of performing military service when called upon.

The junction of these people with the English did not a little alarm the Irish malecontents, who dreaded the total subversion of their scheme by such an addition to Strongbow's force. It was therefore determined to prevent it, if possible; and Donald O' Brien, the active king of Limerick, took his measures so well, that he came upon them early one morning, in their quarters at Ossory, where they had halted on their march to join Richard; and after a smart engagement, in which Donald lost four hundred of his own men, he killed their four commanders, and put them to a total rout: Strongbow upon this retired in haste to Waterford.

This success was a signal to the Irish to fly to arms in all quarters; and Roderic O' Connor, the king of Connaught, passing the Shannon, destroyed all the English possessions in Meath, and advanced even to the gates of Dublin. Richard, alarmed at these disasters, sent messengers to Raymond, promising him his sister Basilea in marriage, if he would return with all the forces he could raise.

Raymond, who was in possession of a plentiful fortune, through the death of his father, had resolved to retire from service; but as he had long entertained a passion for the lovely sister of Strongbow, love got the better of his inclination for ease and retirement, and embarking with his cousin, Meyler Fitz Henry, thirty knights, one hundred horse, and three hundred Welsh archers, he arrived at Waterford, from whence he was accompanied by the earl to Wexford, where his marriage with the fair Basilea was consummated; and, that he might give the Irish as little respite as possible, he marched directly into Meath, drove Roderic out of that country; and, about the beginning of October, 1174, he made himself master of Limerick by storm, where he found a large booty; and having left a strong garrison in the place, under one Miles, he returned to Leinster, where he put his troops into winter-quarters.

It was one of Henry's great weaknesses, to be immoderately fond of power, and to look with a jealous eye upon merit, even when exerted in his service: under him danger attended success, and envy glory. He had given an instance of this in his behaviour to Strongbow at his first engaging in the Irish expedition: and now Hervey de Mountmorrice, who was jealous of the fame of Raymond, and of the high esteem in which he stood with the soldiery, persuaded Henry that he and Strongbow had intentions to undermine his title to Ireland, and to set up an independent authority of their own in that island. The king, whose mind was too susceptible to impressions of this nature, immediately sent four commissioners over thither, two of whom had orders to conduct Raymond to England, and the other two to observe the motions of Strongbow. We shall now leave them on their way to Ireland, and take a view of what Henry was doing in Normandy.

He kept his Christmas, in 1174, at Argentun, in that duchy; and in February of the ensuing year he had an interview with the French king at Gisors, where all disputes between the two crowns were amicably adjusted. The castles erected during the late war were demolished, and the strongholds in Anjou and Poitou were provided with sufficient garrisons, and furnished with plenty of ammunition. After Midlent, the king returned to Caen, and sent to his son, who was then at Rouen, to come to court, in order to go over with him to England; but the young king refused. This he did through the suggestion of the king of France, who endeavoured to persuade him, that if once his father had got him into England, he would confine him in prison; but at length his father's affectionate messages melted his stubborn heart into compliance, and young Henry came and did his father homage; after which, with the old king's consent, he had a conference with Lewis. The father and son then kept their Easter at Cherbourg; and after that had an interview, at Caen, with Philip, earl of Flanders, who, on resigning the charter he had got from the young king, was, by the elder Henry, confirmed in the pension of a thousand marks. These affairs settled, both kings embarked at Barfleur, and landed in England the ninth of May, A. D. 1175.

The August following he summoned William, king of Scotland, and his nobility, to meet him and his son at York, in order to ratify the convention of Falaise. They accordingly appeared, put themselves under the protection of England, and renewed their oath of fealty and submission to the elder Henry; who now withdrawing his protection from the prince of Galloway, gave William leave to march against and subdue him. From Scotland we will now remove to Ireland.

As soon as Henry's commissioners* arrived at Wallingford, and had communicated their orders, Raymond made preparations to set out for England, and was ready to embark when advice came that Donald, prince of Thomond, with an infinite multitude of people, had invested Limerick, and the garrison, having consumed most of their provisions during the winter, stood in need of immediate relief. The earl of Pembroke was eager to march without loss of time, but the army refused to stir without their beloved chief, Raymond;

who was willing, if the commissioners would allow him, to undertake the service. They readily giving their assent, in consideration of the exigence of circumstances, he set out at the head of eighty knights, two hundred other horsemen, and three hundred archers, and was joined on his march by Murchard and Donald, the petty kings of Kilkenny and Ossory, with a body of Irish. The prince of Thomond, upon receiving intelligence that Raymond was on his way to give him battle, raised the siege, and advanced to meet him in a very difficult pass, near Cashel, which he rendered still more so by throwing up ditches, and lining the banks with trees cut down and laid across the roads, to interrupt the troops in their march.

Notwithstanding these precautions, Raymond found means to force this pass, and falling upon the enemy with great fury, put them to flight, and entered Limerick in triumph. This threw the prince of Thomond into the greatest consternation, and finding it in vain to resist the military skill and prowess of Raymond, he offered to renew his submission to the English government, swore allegiance to king Henry, and gave hostages for his fidelity.

After this, Raymond marched to the assistance of Dermot M^c Carty, prince of Desmond, who was in danger of being deposed by his own son Cormack O' Lachlan. The English general advancing towards Corke, expelled Cormack, re-established the father in his dominions, and returned to Limerick laden with riches and glory.

Richard Strongbow, earl of Pembroke, had been dangerously ill for some time, and dying at Dublin on the first of June, 1176, without male issue, his daughter Isabel became heiress of all his possessions in Leinster. His sister Basilea took especial care to conceal her brother's death till she had sent advice of it to her husband Raymond, who immediately consulted with his friends what measures were best to be taken on the occasion; when it was agreed by them all, to be absolutely necessary for him to repair immediately to Dublin, to take care of the government now devolved to him by Richard's death, and to use all possible expedition, before that event should be known to the Irish; but the great difficulty was, how to leave a sufficient garrison, and find a proper governor for Limerick, a conquest Raymond could not bear the thoughts of giving up: in this exigence of circumstances, therefore, he found himself under the necessity of feigning a confidence in Donald, prince of Thomond, and to intrust him, as a baron and vassal of the crown of England, with the custody of the place; but not till he had first taken from him new hostages and fresh oaths to restore the town to the king upon demand. But no sooner had the English passed the bridge in their march to Dublin, than the perfidious Donald set fire to the city in four different places, and ordered part of the bridge to be broken down, to prevent the English from immediately returning to punish him.

Henry no sooner received the news of Strongbow's death†, which was by no means displeasing to him, than he sent over William Fitz Adelm and John

* The names of these commissioners were, Robert Poer, Osbert de Hereford, William de Bendinge, and Adam de Germeine.

† Geraldus Cambrensis has left us the following chaacter of this great nobleman: "Richard Strongbow, earl of Striguel and Pembroke, was (says he) generous and gentle, and had great command of persuasive language: in peace he was rather submissive than assuming, and had more of the soldier

John de Courcy to receive the government from Raymond, and they were accompanied by Robert Fitz Stephens and Miles Cogan. Raymond, to give the best testimony of his loyalty, and the deference he thought due to his sovereign's will, resigned into Fitz Adelm's hands all the forts, cities, and hostages belonging to the English in Ireland.

During these transactions, Henry's attention was chiefly employed in regulating the civil policy of England. With this view he called a general council of the prelates and barons, on the twenty-fifth of January, 1176, at Northampton, to consider the laws and statutes of the realm. Here the several constitutions made at Clarendon, with regard to laymen and criminal matters, were enforced and amended; and others revived, that had been neglected. Henry had experienced, in a very sensible manner, how dangerous it is to deal with a discontented nation; moreover, his three sons, who had availed themselves of the public discontent, were still young and active, and, in appearance, not much altered in their dispositions by his late peace with them; he thought therefore, in order to prevent them from engaging in a fresh rebellion, it was his interest to gain the affections of the English, by reviving the laws of Edward the Confessor. As these laws were very advantageous for the subject, in comparison of those of the Norman kings, which tended solely to the augmenting the revenues of the prince and stretching the royal prerogative, both nobles and people had long wished for their revival; they had even used some endeavours, in the foregoing reigns, to get them restored, but with little success: nothing therefore could be more grateful to the English than to see them in force.

In order to put the wholesome laws in execution, which he had thus enacted or revived, he caused the kingdom to be divided into six parts each of which had three itinerant justices assigned to it, all of which were knights or barons. To preserve so memorable an institution, and to satisfy our readers, we shall give the division, and names of the first justices.

The reader may perceive that this division of the kingdom into counties, does not greatly differ from what still subsists. As to Copland, which is named as a distinct county, it probably formed the northern part of Lancashire, joined to the southern parts of Westmoreland and Cumberland. The other variations are easily seen.

As to the disputes about church-matters, which came before this assembly, or parliament, as also the statutes here enacted, they will fall more properly under that division of our history where we treat of the state of religion, laws, &c. during this period.

In this great council at Northampton, king Henry restored Robert, earl of Leicester, to all his estates in England and in his French dominions, except the castles of Mount-forrel and Pasche: the like he did also to Hugh, earl of Chester, and to William de Albiney he gave the earldom of Suffex. At the same council likewise, Rees ap Griffin, king of South Wales, David ap Owen, king of North Wales, Cadwallan, prince of Dehnain, Owen de Cavellian, Griffin de Bromfield, Madoc ap Gewelrog, and other noblemen of Wales, came and did homage, and swore fealty to Henry, who then gave Rees ap Griffin Merionethshire, and David ap Owen Ellesmere. At the same time that he was conferring these grants, he made a strict inquisition into the state of the castles throughout his kingdom, having perceived that great abuses had been introduced, through the neglect of that plan of government which he had laid down in the beginning of his reign. He therefore called a council, more than seventeen years of age, upon a certain occasion fled from an army of the Irish, as they were advancing to battle; but hearing that they had been beaten by his father, he returned, and mingled with others in congratulating the success of the day. Strongbow, however, thinking that the reproach of cowardice was indelible, pronounced sentence, that the youth should suffer death, by being cut asunder in the middle with a sword; which was instantly executed.

or parliament, at Windsor, about Michaelmas of this year, 1176, in which commissioners were appointed to make an iter, or circuit, through the kingdom, carefully to examine into the state of all castles in the realm, and to seize for the king's use all those which had been built upon lands appertaining to the crown, or were held by persons not properly qualified, and especially all forts that had been erected since the beginning of the late troubles, either for him or against him, by whomsoever held: and with so much firmness did he proceed in this affair, that might have cost infinite difficulties and uneasiness to any prince but Henry, that he even took from his favourite, Richard de Lacy, his castle.

And now young Henry, shewing some signs of discontent at not being admitted to so large a share in the government as he thought himself entitled to, the father, to find him employment, gave permission to the young king and his brother Richard for raising troops in his French dominions, and reducing the Poitevins, some of whom had joined with his disbanded mercenaries the Brabanders, and had invaded his foreign dominions. The two young princes executed this commission with great honour to themselves, and in a short time reduced the rebels to reason.

Whilst the king was employed in these public affairs, the princess Joanna, his daughter, was demanded in marriage by William the Good, king of Sicily. Notwithstanding that this match was in every respect highly advantageous for the young princess, yet Henry would not take a step of so great consequence without the advice of his parliament, which, indeed, he appears to have consulted on every interesting occasion. He therefore summoned a council at London, who approving of the proposal, he dispatched ambassadors to Sicily, to settle the marriage-articles; after which he sent away the young queen with a splendid retinue.

The year 1177 opened with the siege of Auxerre, in France, by prince Richard. The place, though resolutely defended by its viscount, was so warmly pressed that it was obliged to surrender in less than a fortnight. In about the same time the same prince made himself master of Bayonne; and, flushed with his great success, he carried his arms even to the frontiers of Spain, where he took some towns, and obliged the inhabitants of the adjacent country to promise upon oath that they would not molest the territories of the king his father. While Richard was thus numbering his days by conquests, his brother, the young king Henry, reduced the castle of Dole, which had been wrested from the king of England. It does not appear that Geoffrey had any share in these military exploits; he and his brother John, who was too young to take the field, remaining at home with their father.

While Henry's two sons were thus enlarging his power on the continent, he himself was engaged in an affair of a very extraordinary nature, of which he was made sole arbiter. There had been a dispute some years between Alphonso, king of Castile, and his uncle Sanchez, king of Navarre, about some territories usurped by the latter upon Alphonso, during his minority, in revenge of a like usurpation made by one of the ancestors of the former. At length they agreed to refer all their differences to the king of England, obliging themselves to abide by his award. Several bishops and great men were sent over by both parties to receive Henry's decision, with advocates to plead their cause, and two champions, famous for valour, and nobly equipped, in case he should adjudge the controversy to be decided by single combat. Upon the arrival of this respectable embassy, the king summoned all his prelates, earls, and barons of England to meet at London in Easter week, 1177, to assist him in the requested decision; when the facts being stated on both sides, without any contradiction to one another, he adjudged to each of the kings the respective territories that had been usurped upon them (which they received with great satisfaction) and dismissed their ambassadors with magnificent presents. Henry's decree on this occasion did great honour to his justice and discernment; and, indeed, so high did he stand in the esteem of all Europe for his great wisdom and integrity, that his relation to the king of Castile (who had married one of his daughters, named Eleanor) was no objection to Sanchez accepting him as the final judge of their differences.

During the sitting of this council, a brother of Robert, earl of Ferrers, happened to be killed in a nocturnal ramble at London, which seems at this time to have been very ill governed. It had, for a considerable time, been the custom for a number of the sons or relations of the most eminent citizens to rove through the streets in the night, committing a thousand riots, and disturbing the quiet and even endangering the lives of the more peaceable part of the inhabitants. Henry had before endeavoured to put a stop to these excesses, by hanging up some of the most notorious of the rioters; but this last accident determined him to strike at the root of such disorders; and so strictly did he apply himself to this laudable undertaking, and with such wholesome rigour, that the city in a great measure recovered its quiet.

After Easter, the king made a progress into the North, during which he took proper precautions for the peace of that part of the kingdom, by making such alterations and removals, both in England and the cautionary forts of Scotland, as to him appeared most suitable to secure his interest there.

While he was at Oxford, he nominated his son John king of Ireland: this young prince, who was now arrived at the age of eleven years, was his father's darling. At the same time Henry rewarded Robert Fitz Stephens and Miles Cogan suitably to their great merits in the first expedition into Ireland, by bestowing upon them all the kingdom of Corke, excepting the city of that name and its adjoining hundred. The earl of Chester had also all his estate restored to him, on condition of his going over and assisting in the entire reduction of that kingdom.

And now the mutual jealousy and disgust that had for so many years subsisted between the kings of England and France, and which the repeated treaties made between them had only checked, but never eradicated, drew towards a rupture on the following occasion. A marriage had been for some time negociated and agreed upon between Henry's second son, Richard, and Alice, daughter to the king of France. The young lady had been some time in England, and Henry, who was of an amorous complexion, is said to have looked upon her with desires that, considering the situation of circumstances, stances, were little less than incestuous. But whether it was from this cause, or that having smarted so lately by having matched his eldest son in the family of Lewis, he was therefore little inclinable to make any farther alliances of that kind, he had, under several frivolous pretences, delayed to fulfil the marriage-contract between the betrothed pair. The chief pretext he made use of, was that Lewis had not fulfilled his part of the agreement, by delivering up the French Vexin to young Henry, and the city of Bourges to Richard: he also sent ambassadors to the court of Lewis, demanding that his daughter-in-law Margaret, who had gone thither without his consent, might be sent back. Little regard being shewn to this requisition on the part of Lewis, Henry repaired to Stoke, in Hampshire, near Portsmouth, where his fleet lay ready for the embarkation of his forces; and going on board, he landed about the end of July at Shapure, in Normandy. Soon after, a negociation was set on foot between him and the king of France, through the mediation of cardinal Vivian, the pope's legate, who, on this occasion threatened to denounce ecclesiastical censure against Henry and his kingdom, unless he immediately solemnized the nuptials of his son Richard with the princess Alice; but Henry continuing to insist that Lewis should give up the city of Bourges and its appurtenances, and also deliver up the French Vexin to the younger Henry, husband to Margaret Alice's sister, Lewis, not chusing to part with such valuable possessions, dropped all farther insisting on the match, and a treaty was finally concluded between the two kings on the following conditions: I. That both kings should take upon them the cross. II. Mutually to assist each other. III. To abolish all disputes with each other, excepting in some trifling matters, which were referred to arbiters on both sides. IV. That in case of the decease of either party, the survivor should have the whole command of the expedition. V. That in case both should die, proper persons should be named to command upon their demise. VI. That the governors, who were to act during their absence, on both sides, should be instructed to defend each other against all enemies. VII. That tradesmen, merchants, and others, with their effects, should be free from all molestation in the dominions of either party.

Henry, at his return from this conference, sent his eldest son into Berry, and Richard into Guienne, to suppress some commotions in those parts; and hearing that the former had made but a slow progress in that work, he levied an army in Normandy, and marched himself at the head of it into that province, where he soon reduced Chateauroux. From thence he advanced to la Chastre, with an intent to lay siege to it; but the lord of the place, who had carried off the daughter of Ralph de Deols, and detained her in his custody, prevented it by waiting upon Henry at Chinon, and delivering up the young heiress with the lands of inheritance, said to be worth as much as the revenue of Normandy. After this, the king marched into the Limousin, where he punished the barons of that country, for the late insurrection. And coming, after Martinmas, to meet the king of France at Greissac, in Auvergne, he had the satisfaction, in an assembly of the counts and barons of the province, convened in their presence, to hear them declare that all Auvergne belonged of right to the dominion of the dukes of Guienne, except the bishopric of Clermont, of which the king of France was declared lord-patron: Lewis not agreeing to this verdict, six referees were named, to determine the affair. Henry had now nothing more to do in those parts, but to receive the strong castles of Turenne from the viscount of that territory. He also bought the county of la Marche from Andebert, its earl, to whom he promised to pay fifteen thousand Anjouin pounds, twenty palfreys, and twenty mules. From thence he returned to Angers, where he kept his Christmas, with his sons Richard and Geoffrey.

This year the affairs of Ireland were as follow:

Fitz Adelm, the new governor, had made himself so hated and despised by both the English and Irish, that there was great danger of a total revolt in that country. Courcy, the second in command, was a brave and vigilant officer: he had for long time beheld with concern, though without opposition, the bad measures followed by Fitz Adelm, who regarded nothing but the indulging his passions and pleasures at the expence of the lives and properties of the unhappy natives who were under his command. At length, however, roused by the general voice of murmur and complaint, he resolved to take a bold step, which was to head the English forces without any commission from Fitz Adelm, and attack the kingdom of Ulster. No sooner had this gallant officer signified his intention, than numbers of the English crowded to range themselves under his standard; but he wisely considering, that success does not depend always on numbers, especially in a sudden expedition, but rather on the fidelity and dauntless bravery of a few well-trained veterans, chose only twenty-two knights and three hundred men at arms; and with this handful of forces he went and laid siege to Downe, the capital of Ulster, of which he presently made himself master. But while he was taking the necessary precautions to secure this conquest, by erecting a fort within the city to bridle the inhabitants and serve as a retreat to his own party in case of danger, he found himself on a sudden attacked by Dunleve, the petty king of Downe (who had retreated at the approach of the English), and Roderic, king of Connaught, at the head of ten thousand Irish. Courcy was not a man to suffer himself tamely to be pent up within walls, and therefore, making a vigorous sally, he fell upon the Irish in their camp, and, after an obstinate contest, obliged them to draw off their forces. After this he fought several battles against the Irish, whom he constantly defeated, notwithstanding the great superiority of numbers on their side, and who were so discouraged by their bad success, that they at length made very little or no resistance, and Courcy found himself at leisure to erect forts, and take every necessary precaution, for the security and establishment of the English government.

While these things passed in one part of the island, Miles Cogan had not been inactive in another; he had entered the country of Connaught, where he had some success; but, in his retreat, was fallen upon by Roderic and his forces, whom he dispersed, and brought his army back in safety to Dublin.

The mismanagement of Fitz Adelm became now so insupportable, that Henry was obliged to recall him, and put one Hugh de Lacy in his place.

At

At the same time he appointed Robert Poer to the government of Waterford and Wexford.

Henry employed his time during the remainder of his stay in Normandy, in regulating the course of justice, and providing for the security of the frontiers, by charging trusty and experienced persons with the care of the one and the defence of the other. To secure the peace of the country, he procured from the king of France letters of protection, by which that monarch declared himself ready, during Henry's absence, to assist his officers in its defence, whenever they should apply to him for that purpose; letters usually granted in those times from one king to another, when engaged together in a crusade. Having taken these wise and necessary precautions, he set out for England, where he arrived on the fifteenth of July, 1178, and on the sixth of August knighted his son Geoffrey with great solemnity, at Woodstock; who, soon after the ceremony, went over to the continent to distinguish himself by feats of arms in the tournaments which at that time were a prevailing fashion among the young military people of rank, both in France and Normandy. The rest of this year is not distinguished by any event worthy the notice of an historian; but in the beginning of the ensuing year, 1179, the younger Henry returned to England, leaving his brother Richard in Poictou.

About this time the king of France, perceiving himself broken with age, formed the design of resigning his crown in favour of his son, Philip Augustus, according to the custom of his predecessors; but a violent distemper which seized the young prince, and made him almost despair of his life, obstructed his project. Lewis was so affected with his son's danger, that he resolved, contrary to the advice of his council, to undertake a pilgrimage to the shrine of Thomas Becket, to obtain the intercession of that saint for the young prince's recovery. Henry met him at Dover, and conducted him to Canterbury, where they both offered up their devotions at St. Thomas's altar; and Lewis made a present at his tomb of a massy cup of pure gold, and gave to the monks one hundred modii (that is seven thousand two hundred gallons of wine), yearly, and freed them from all toll or custom for whatever they should buy in his kingdom: all which he confirmed by a charter under his great seal*.

It is more than probable that Lewis was instigated to take this journey by other motives than what he set forth to the eye of the world. The elder Henry seems to have been of this opinion, for, under pretext of doing him all possible honours, he scarcely ever suffered him out of his sight; and after only four days stay in England, the French monarch returned home. Henry the younger would needs accompany him back to France, to assist at the coronation of young Philip, now perfectly recovered, at Rheims†.

This year Richard de Lucy, who had been long Henry's first minister, now stooping under the weight of years and cares, resigned his office, and retired to an abbey at Lewes, in Sussex, which he himself had founded. Upon his resignation, Henry called a great council at Windsor, in which he made a new partition of the circuits all over England, dividing the whole into four parts, and assigning to each proper judges, as follow:

Justices.	I.	Shires.
Richard, bishop of Winston, Richard, the king's treasurer, Nicholas Fitz Torold, Thomas Basset, Robert Whitefield.		Hampshire, Wiltshire, Glocestershire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Devonshire, Cornwall, Berkshire, Oxfordshire.
Geoffrey, bishop of Ely, Nicholas, the king's chaplain, Gilbert Pipard, Reginald de Wichbach, the king's clerk, Geoffrey Hosee.	II.	Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Northamptonshire, Leicestershire, Warwickshire, Worcestershire, Herefordshire, Staffordshire, Shropshire.
John, bishop of Norwich, Hugh Murdoc, the king's clerk, Michael Belet, Richard del Pec, Ranulph Brito.	III.	Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Hertfordshire, Middlesex, Kent, Surry, Suffex, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire.
Godfrey de Lucy, John Cummin, Hugh de Gaerst, Ralph de Glanville, William de Bendinge, Allen de Furnellis.	IV.	Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Yorkshire, Northumberland, Westmoreland, Cumberland, Lancashire.

None of our historians have attempted to assign any reason for this alteration of the divisions.

Lewis, king of France, being now upon his death-bed, his anointed son Philip took upon him the government; but being himself governed wholly by the advice of his namesake and godfather, the earl of Flanders, he exercised several acts of oppression, and even obliged his mother to quit the kingdom, after having disgraced all her friends and relations. In this extremity she had recourse to young Henry, who then resided in Normandy; and he being disgusted with the revolution in the French ministry, prevailed upon his father to head the party of the exiled queen.

With this view the elder Henry went over to Normandy, before Easter, in 1180, and had an interview with the queen of France, and her brothers, the counts of Blois, Chartres, and Sancerre,

* If this act of modish devotion was imagined to be of any use to the son, it seems to have been of little to the father, who, before he got to St. Denis, was seized with an apoplectic fit, which terminated in a palsy that took away the use of his right side, and hindered him from being present at Philip's coronation. who promised to be ruled by his councils, giving hostages for the performance of their agreement. Hereupon Henry raised a numerous army to support their pretensions; but was opposed by Philip in person, before he could make any progress. This check determined the king of England to propose a conference with his brother of France, between Gisors and Trie, where he made up matters between Philip, his mother, and family; and it was agreed that the queen should return to Paris, and receive seven livres* per diem for her subsistence, during the life of her husband; and after his death, enjoy the lands assigned for her dowry.

At this conference the count of Flanders did homage to the king of England, on the renewal of a former convention, by which he received from Henry a pension of a thousand pounds, in consideration of his furnishing five hundred knights to serve the king fourteen days, whenever required. The count of Clermont likewise swore fealty to the English crown, the articles of the last peace between the two kingdoms were confirmed, and the kings renewed the mutual protection of their realms†.

After having thus settled matters with the court of France, Henry acted as mediator between Henry, duke of Saxony, his son-in-law, and the emperor: the former having been exiled by the emperor for seven years, had taken refuge at the court of Normandy; Henry now interceded for his pardon, and his intercession being seconded by the pope and the king of France, the emperor at length consented to remit four years of the term prescribed for the duke's banishment.

Henry then provided for the due administration of justice in England, by promoting Ralph de Glanville to the rank of high-justiciary of the kingdom. This eminent lawyer strictly adhered to the laws of Edward the Confessor, collected in the time of the Conqueror. The public money, which had suffered the most shameful adulteration, was now recoined, and the utmost rigour of the laws exerted against all debasers of the specie, the care of which was committed to Philip Aumari, a native of Sens.

In the beginning of 1181, the elder Henry, resolving to return to England, published a proclamation commanding all freeholders and burghers of his dominions on the continent to provide themselves with arms, offensive and defensive, in proportion to their substance: an ordinance which afterwards took place in England, according to the regulation of the assize of arms, which was executed under the inspection of the justices of the circuits. This law plainly demonstrates how much the king depended upon the affection and loyalty of his subjects, whom he very prudently thought much better qualified to defend their own properties than those venal mercenaries who are found necessary by tyrants only, to assist them in trampling upon that liberty which they undertake to defend. While Henry lay at Barfleur he effected an accommodation between the French king and the count of Flanders, who had quarrelled about the influence of the queen-mother: and towards the end of August he landed in England, attended by the king of Scots, whom he had summoned to meet him in Normandy on some ecclesiastical disputes which had happened between the Scots and the English.

This year, 1181, was distinguished by the death of two great priests, pope Alexander III. and Roger, archbishop of York.

While Henry was employed in making many excellent regulations for the better government of his dominions here and on the continent, Hugh de Lucy, whom he had a few years before made his lieutenant in Ireland, continued to rule that country in such a manner as tended most to the interest of his master, the happiness of the people, and his own honour: but having inadvertently married the daughter of Roderic, king of Connaught, his enemies (for superior merit ever has its enemies) took this occasion to poison the mind of Henry with the falsest suggestions against this able and faithful servant. Henry, who too readily hearkened to such representations, thought proper to recal Lucy, and put another in his room. But the event soon proved the error of the change: the people began to murmur; faction, which had crouched beneath the wholesome rigour of wise laws, now raised its baneful crest, encouraged by misrule and indolence. In a word, every thing was falling into confusion, when the king, who was ever ready to repair his faults, restored Lucy to his high station, joining with him in commission one Robert de Shrewsbury, as his coadjutor and counsellor. Hugh upon this returned back to Ireland, and soon changed the face of affairs for the better.

Henry's affairs were now in so flourishing a condition, that he might reasonably have expected a quiet of some years continuance; but this pleasing prospect was clouded by the unnatural ambition and conduct of his sons. The elder Henry was not ignorant of their sentiments; and though he carefully concealed his fears, he was apprehensive that another conspiracy like the former, would rob him of his crown in his old age. In this state of things, he thought the most effectual way to screen himself from their practices, would be to sow dissension among them, well knowing they were neither of them formidable asunder. For that purpose he went over to Normandy towards the end of the year 1182, where he hinted to his eldest son Henry, that his brothers ought to do him homage for the dominions they possessed, or at least whose titles they bore. The young king readily swallowed the bait, and resolved to demand homage of his brothers; but they were by no means disposed to comply. Richard affirmed that the duchy of Guienne, which was to be his portion, was not a fief of the crown of England: in this he was right. Geoffrey, however, had not altogether the same reason to be excused, since he knew the duchy of Brittany held of Normandy; but it was necessary the king should resign Normandy to his eldest son, otherwise he could have no right to demand homage: mean time the father had no intention to divest himself of that duchy, before his death, in favour of a son whose ambition had embittered all his days. On these reasons Geoffrey eluded his brother's demand: he feigned, moreover, to re-

* About five shillings and six pence of our present money.

† Hoveden, and most of our other historians, have referred the peace which was signed by the two kings, to the September following; but it appears, from the date of it as published by Rymer, that it was made at the latter end of June, and during the life of old Lewis, who died on the eighteenth of September following.

main respectfully attached to the king his father; though he at the same time privately held with his brother Richard, whose case was the same as his own.

Young Henry, whom the king his father had politicly engaged in this dispute, soon discovered his motive: and acting with the most profound dissimulation, whilst he pretended to be incensed with his brothers, he privately took measures with them to bereave the king of the supreme power, which this undutiful son had long wished to be invested with; but, as confederates in iniquity are seldom to be bound by the ties of blood, honour, or even of interest, Richard, the second son, having taken disgust at the overbearing behaviour of his elder brother, deserted his cause, and threw himself upon his father's mercy, who received him with that kindness and benevolence which he had ever shewn towards his children.

Henry and Geoffrey, having now thrown off the mask, made themselves masters of the town and castle of Limoges, and declared openly against their father. The king, willing to bring them to a sense of their duty without coming to extremities, went in a peaceable manner, with his son Richard, and summoned the castle; but, to his infinite grief and surprize, he was answered only by a shower of arrows, several of which narrowly missed putting an end to his life.

The young king, at several different times, made concessions to his father and threw himself upon his mercy, and as often broke out again into his former unnaturality and rebellion: at length, ashamed of his weakness and double dealing, he vowed to take up the cross. His father, who in truth tenderly loved him, endeavoured to dissuade him from this resolution; but finding him obstinate, he acquiesced, assuring him that his equipage should surpass in magnificence that of any prince who had embarked in the enterprize. But the shame of deserting his party again got the better of the young prince, and he again revolted from his duty. The elder Henry finding that he could no longer put the least confidence in his oaths or submission, kept more upon his guard, and put it out of his power, or that of his brother Geoffrey, to execute any of their designs.

Mortified at repeated disappointments, and vexed to see all the measures which his malice suggested against his too indulgent parent, baffled, young Henry fell sick at Martel, a castle in the neighbourhood of Limoges, of a fever. Perceiving himself lost to all hopes of recovery, he sent to desire the king his father to come to him, that he might ask his forgiveness for his past rebellions and undutiful behaviour. But the king, afraid to trust himself in the power of those about his son's person, sent in his stead a bishop, together with his ring in token of his blessing and pardon. The bishop found him almost expiring, and received his dying request, that his father would forgive all his offences and malevolence towards him; that he would pay his knights and attendants their wages; and deal mercifully with the barons of Guienne, and others, whom he had drawn to side with him in his rebellious proceedings. All this the old king readily promised; and sent a messenger to acquaint him, that he might depend on his strict performance of his last desires; but before the arrival of this person young Henry was dead.

His death, which happened on Saturday the eleventh of June, 1183, in the twenty-eighth year of his age, freed the king his father from danger with which this unnatural son threatened him: for had he not been taken off by Providence in the height of his crimes, he had determined to come to a general engagement the Monday following, and to have used his sword in the field against the life and honour of a father, whose greatest failing was an excess of fondness for him and his other children.

Tyrrel gives us the following relation of the manner of his death. Finding that he had but a few hours to live, "He called to him the bishops and other religious men that were near him, and first in private, and then in public, confessed his great sin in rebelling against so indulgent a father: and then, after absolution, putting on sack-cloth, and causing a rope to be tied about his neck, with very penitent expressions, he entreated the bishops and others then present, to pull him out of the bed to a couch, or pallet, hard by, which he had ordered to be made of ashes; and being laid thereon, and having received the eucharist, he expired. When his servants had embalmed his body, and wrapped it in bull-hides, they put it in a leaden coffin, and buried his brains and bowels at Castel-Martel, where he died: then they carried the corpse towards the city of Rouen, to be there interred according to his last will; but while they, by the way, rested at the city of Mans, and placed the corpse in the cathedral church of St. Julian, the bishop, clergy, and people of that city would not suffer it to be taken away, but, to shew their affection to the deceased prince, there honourably buried it. But when the people of Rouen heard of it, they were much incensed, and threatened, that unless the body was speedily delivered to them, they would come and take it away by force. The king being informed of this, commanded the corpse to be taken up again, and delivered to the people of Rouen, according to his last will; which was accordingly done, and the body was buried there, in the church of St. Mary."

Young Henry had a son, born at Paris in 1177, and named William; but the child not living above three days, this restless prince now died without issue; and his widow Margaret was, in a few years, married to Bela, king of Hungary.

When the elder Henry first heard of his son's death, he appeared inconsolable; he burst forth into such excessive lamentations for the most unnatural of sons, as would scarce have been excusable if vented even for the most deserving. But his passions were strong as well as tender; and the first emotions of nature are irresistible, till a little time allows reason an opportunity of interposing its good offices for the relief of the afflicted. Thus Henry, when recovered from the first transports of his sorrow, though he still felt the pangs of a parent, forgot not what was due to the character of a king: he carried on the siege of Limoges so vigorously, that it was at last surrendered, and the other places held by the malecontents soon followed its fate. Geoffrey, upon this, was forced to submit; and Henry seemed, by his spirit and perseverance, once more to rise superior to all the attempts of his enemies.

These and some other transactions foreign to the history of England, detained Henry in France till the month of June, 1184.

The

The death of young Henry put a stop, for a while to the troubles that had so long disturbed the royal family. Richard, though naturally impetuous, remained some time quiet, to see how the king would behave to him, now that he was become his heir apparent.

During this tranquility at court, and in the beginning of the year 1185, Heraclius, patriarch of Jerusalem, arrived in England, accompanied by the great-masters of the orders of Knights Templars and Hospitallers, on an embassy from Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, to solicit Henry's aid in behalf of the Christians of the Holy Land. The patriarch, on this occasion, presented the king with the keys of the Holy Sepulchre and Tower of David, in token of their desire of having him for their sovereign, as being grand-son to Fulk, earl of Anjou, who had been king of Jerusalem. Henry, who had not the least desire to accept of the diadem of so unprofitable a kingdom, deferred giving an answer to the envoys till he had taken the sense of the nation in parliament assembled. Accordingly an assembly of barons and prelates was held at Clerkenwell, where Heraclius, in a very moving speech accompanied with tears, described the calamities under which the Christians of Palestine then groaned.

But when this matter came to be thoroughly canvassed, it was the general opinion of the assembly, that it was not proper for Henry either to accept of the crown of Jerusalem, or to go in person on an expedition to the Holy Land, since by his coronation-oath he was obliged, before all other things, to protect his own kingdom. The patriarch was not a little chagrined at this resolution of the council, and he could not forbear venting some part of his uneasiness; but Henry, to make the disappointment as easy to him as possible, offered him a large supply of money; but this was not thought equal to the presence and assistance of a prince of the house of Anjou. Accordingly the ambassadors intreated Henry that, as he could not go in person, he would at least send one of his sons: hereupon prince John, throwing himself at his father's feet, humbly prayed that he might be permitted to engage in that expedition. But Henry, who had other business in reserve for him, and who, moreover, loved his children too well to send them abroad on such visionary schemes, cast about how he might best elude the young prince's desire, without absolutely affronting the ambassadors: his wit presently suggested an expedient to him, and he told them, that he did not chuse to come to a resolution till he should have consulted the king of France concerning it; and, to blind the patriarch by a shew of earnestness in his cause, he set out with him for Normandy. The two kings had a conference upon the subject at Vaudruëil, the result of which was, that both consented to send large supplies of men and money, but neither of them would go in person.

Pope Lucius was not well pleased with Henry's refusing to take the cross, and shewed his resentment by denying him certain requests, which he would have granted had he not been dissatisfied: however, not to break entirely with him, he consented to his crowning his youngest son, John, king of Ireland, to whom he sent for that purpose a crown of peacock's feathers richly interwoven with gold. In granting this favour he expressly reserved a penny from every house in Ireland yearly, and several other advantages; procuring in exchange for his consent, which cost him nothing, a very considerable addition to his revenues. As soon as the king received the pope's answer, he knighted his son John, and sent him governor into Ireland, not daring to have him crowned there, lest Richard should make it a pretence to ask the same favour in England, and likewise being averse to the marks of dependence on the papal see that were annexed to the pontiff's consent. John went over to take possession of his new government in Easter-week, 1186, attended by four hundred knights, or men at arms, most of them Normans, a great body of infantry, and some civil officers. John, on his arrival, was received by the people with great marks of respect, as a person whom they looked upon as their future sovereign. But the levity of the Normans, and the inexperience of John, disgusted the Irish so much, that they were on the point of forming fresh confederacies against the English, when Henry, apprehending the consequences, recalled his son: a conduct which can never be sufficiently admired, thus to deprive a darling child, who had never offended him, of a place of so great dignity and profit, because he found him unfit to fill it with credit to himself, or satisfaction to those under him.

Henry continued in Normandy from the end of March to the beginning of the next year, during which time he restored the king of Scots, who had never interfered in the dissensions between him and his sons, to the great earldom of Huntingdon. After this he had a conference in relation to the affair so long depending between the French princess Alice and Richard; but, notwithstanding that Philip offered the most advantageous terms to have the match consummated, Henry never would give a direct reply; which has, not without reason, given most writers occasion to represent his connections with that lady, and his conduct to his son, in the most disgraceful and unnatural lights. Finding himself too warmly pressed, both by his son and the king of France, he hastily returned to England, without declaring any fixed resolution: his pretence was an insurrection raised by the Gallowingsians, in Scotland; but he no sooner approached that country, than Roland, the prince of Galloway, came and made his submission. Soon after, William, king of Scotland, marrying Ermengarde, grand-daughter of Roscelin, viscount of Beaumont, and Constance, the natural daughter of Henry I. the king gave a rent of one hundred marks, with fifty knights fees, as a portion to Ermengarde; and at the same time delivered up to William the castle of Edinburgh, which he had kept in his own hands ever since the treaty of York. The nuptials were solemnized at Woodstock, in the presence of Henry; but scarcely were the rejoicings on that occasion over, when Henry received news of the death of his son Geoffrey, earl of Brittany, a prince in whom pride, dissimulation, and perfidy were equally blended; and who had a principal share in causing those troubles that had clouded part of his father's reign. He had lately demanded the county of Anjou, and met with a denial, because Richard would not consent to the alienation of that province. Exasperated at the refusal, he retired to the court of France, and agreed to hold Brittany in vassalage of Philip, and shake off all subjection to his father, provided the French

French monarch would assist him with an army to invade Normandy. But the execution of this perfidious design was anticipated by death*.

This prince left behind him a daughter, named Eleanor, and his wife Constance big with-child, who was quickly after delivered of a son, named Arthur.

Henry was very desirous of having the guardianship of these infants, for a pretence to keep Brittany. With this view he took a journey thither, in expectation of obtaining the consent of the states: but Constance, his daughter-in-law, strongly opposed it. She affirmed, that, being mother of the children, it belonged to her to take care of their education; moreover, she maintained, they had no claim to any thing till after her death, since their father was earl of Brittany only in her right†. But Henry, as grand-father, insisted upon the natural title to the guardianship of his grand-children. The states of Brittany, who were more afraid of his power than convinced by his reasons, were in great perplexity: justice and their own interest required that Constance, to whom the earldom belonged by inheritance, should have the government; but, on the other hand, it was dangerous to send away the king without some satisfaction. In short, they found an expedient, which the king assented to, as finding that he could not obtain more: this was, that the countess should be made guardian of her children, and it was decreed that all orders and public acts should run jointly in the name of her and her son; but with this proviso, that nothing of moment should be transacted without the advice and consent of the king of England. Before he quitted Brittany, Henry caused the states to swear fealty to young Arthur, as their sovereign; being apprehensive, in case Constance should marry again and have children by a second husband, she would prefer them before those of the first.

Henry would not, perhaps, have been so easily satisfied, had he not been afraid that Philip, king of France, would have interposed in the affair. This prince, though young, was meditating grand projects: he could not patiently behold so many of the best provinces of his kingdom in the hands of the English; and, since his accession to the throne, had formed a design to wrest them out of their hands, and for that purpose eagerly sought for a proper opportunity. Pursuant to this resolution he imagined that the dissention, which at this time prevailed between Henry and his son Richard (on account of the latter having refused to cede Anjou to his brother Geoffrey), was too favourable a juncture to be neglected. He was persuaded these princes being divided and unarmed, and not suspecting they were going to be attacked, he might have a fair chance to strip them of some part of their dominions in France, before they could be in a condition to defend them. In this belief he made extraordinary preparations, and, as soon as he was ready to act, summoned Richard to appear and do him homage for Poitou; and required Henry to restore the Vexin, with all the dowry of Margaret, his eldest son's widow. But here Philip found he had taken his measures wrong; for Henry and Richard uniting for their common interest, kept him so employed, the one in Normandy, the other in Guienne, that he was forced to sue for a truce, which was granted him for two years.

Having experienced how difficult it was to compass his ends so long as Henry and his son continued united, he did not long defer his endeavours to foment discord between them; and the better to insure success to his project, he took occasion, during the truce, to invite Richard to pay him a visit at Paris, where he gave him the most cordial reception, and even shared with him all the familiarities of life. These caresses wrought the desired effect on the mind of the young prince, who never once suspected the motive. In a little time he entertained so strong an affection for Philip, that he made him the confident of all his heart-burnings against his father, which confidence Philip took especial care to turn to his own advantage: he affected to have his interest greatly at heart; he lamented that a prince of such promising hopes should be kept under guardianship, like an infant, by an ambitious father, who consulted only to aggrandize and enrich himself at the expence of those who were the nearest, and ought to be the dearest to him; and he failed not to dwell upon the old subject of rancour, that of Henry's so unjustly and iniquitously keeping from his son the person who had been betrothed to him for several years as his bride: in a word, the politic Frenchman omitted no one circumstance he thought most likely to work up Richard's mind to the pitch of discontent and rebellion which was so necessary to his purpose: Richard gave into the snare, and his disposition of mind became such, in a short time, as gave Philip the greatest hopes of attaining his ends.

In the mean time Henry grew extremely uneasy; he apprehended some mischief hatching, and endeavoured several times to detach Richard from his intimacy with Philip. Instead of making a proper reply to these wise and parental admonitions, Richard still continued at the court of France, and even found means to seize upon some of his father's treasures on the continent, which he employed in fortifying his castles in Poitou, and renounced his allegiance to his father, unless he would immediately consent to his coronation.

Henry had smarted so sensibly from the experiment of that kind which he had made in favour of his eldest son, that it was not to be supposed he would willingly repeat it in behalf of the passionate and headstrong Richard, and he therefore refused the proposal. However, as he was unwilling to provoke him by any unnecessary severities, he employed every gentle method to bring him back to his duty: he dispatched a trusty messenger to represent to him, that he had imprudently given into the snare which had been spread for him by Philip, whose sole aim was to sow dissention between him and his father, that he might make an advantage of their misunderstanding. At last the young prince seemed to be sensible of his errors, and, repairing to Angers, submitted to his father, binding himself by a solemn oath, that he would never more deviate from his allegiance: but, notwithstanding this promise, he soon after received the cross from the archbishop of Tours, without the king's consent or knowledge.

* He was unhorsed in a tournament, and so much bruised that he fell ill of a fever, which carried him off in a few days. He was generally distinguished by the appellation of the Child of Perdition. He died on the nineteenth of August, 1187.

† She was daughter to Conan le Petit, earl of Brittany.

Towards the latter end of the year 1187, Philip raised a great army, and made a formal demand from Henry of the places he held on the presumption of Alice's marriage with his son Richard, or that the marriage should be immediately consummated. Upon Henry's continuing to evade this demand, Philip actually began hostilities; but just at that time the animosity of the two monarchs was for a while suspended, upon the melancholy news that the city of Jerusalem was taken by the great Saladin, sultan of Babylon, and that Guy de Lusignan, the last that swayed the sceptre of that kingdom, was in the hands of the Infidels. As the union of the Christians had formerly been the means of conquering Palestine, their dissention was the cause of its destruction, after they had been in possession of it near a century. This news, which threw the princes of Europe into great consternation, was particularly fatal to pope Urban III. who died of grief. He was soon followed by Gregory III. his successor, who sitting in the papal chair but three months, made room by his death for Clement III.

The two kings of France and England were sensibly affected with the calamities of the Christians in the East, and upon this occasion they resolved with one consent to drop their private quarrel for the cause of God (for so it was termed in those days), and hold a conference, to consider of means to remedy this misfortune. At this interview, which was held between Gisors and Trie, on the twenty-first of January, 1188, their first business was to renew the truce; after which it was agreed between Philip, Henry, and the earl of Flanders, that they should all take the cross*. A convention was then entered into between the two kings, for establishing a land-tax towards defraying the expences of this important expedition; and it was resolved that a tenth of all rents and chattels, as well of the clergy as laity, should be raised in their territories†.

Henry having given orders for raising this tax in his foreign dominions, sailed from Dieppe to England, landing on the thirtieth of January at Winchelsea. Immediately on his arrival he summoned a general council of his prelates and nobility, which met on the eleventh of February at Gedington, now Gaitown, in Cheshire, where it was agreed to levy a tenth of all rents and moveables, of arms, houses, cloaths, vestments, jewels, and of every other commodity, except the corn of that year's growth; and this was to extend to Jews as well as Christians, and to be paid by the Candlemas following: but all those who engaged in the crusade were exempt from this tax, and even permitted to levy a tenth upon their vassals and tenants, and to mortgage their own estates for the space of three years. The king sent Hugh, bishop of Durham, and some other noblemen, to press William, king of Scotland, to raise a like tenth in his dominions, which he readily promised, being, like most other princes in Europe, infected with the reverence of religious knight-errantry, so prevalent in those days. He accordingly summoned a general assembly of all his prelates, earls, and barons, and an infinite number of his vassals and free tenants, and proposed the matter to them in presence of Henry's ambassadors. After mature deliberation, the council rejected the proposal, and resolved to grant no tenth; declaring, moreover, that "they would never give it, even though the king of England, nay their own lord the king of Scotland, should attempt to force them to it:" nor could all the persuasions of William, or the intreaties of the English deputies, make them change their resolve. A remarkable instance this, of the independency of the Scottish parliament, which was undoubtedly formed upon the plan of that of England; and of their power in granting money, and laying taxes upon the subject.

Henry, vexed at the refractoriness of the Scots, seems to have vented his disgust upon his own subjects, by exacting the contributions with the utmost severity. Gervase of Canterbury says, that he sent his collectors throughout England; and pitching upon the richest persons in every city, for instance, two hundred in London, and one hundred in York, obliged them to be answerable for the sum taxed upon their respective cities; such as refused were imprisoned until they had paid the utmost farthing. The same author adds, that the English paid above seventy thousand pounds towards this tythe, and the Jews in England sixty thousand pounds; which, according to the present value of money, amounts to very near two millions.

About two or three months after this transaction, almost all Poitou took up arms against Richard, upon a very frivolous occasion. This prince, who was engaged in the crusade, having occasion for a sum of money to equip him for the expedition, came into Poitou to raise it. While he was employed in this affair, an officer belonging to Raymond, earl of Thoulouse, passing through his territories, and giving him some cause of disgust, he committed him to prison. Raymond, upon notice thereof, ordered, by way of reprisal, two Poitevin gentlemen to be arrested as they were returning through Thoulouse, from a pilgrimage to St. Iago de Compostella. These violent proceedings caused a very warm quarrel between the two princes; and Richard, out of pique, took occasion to revive the pretensions of the house of Poitou to the earldom of Thoulouse. This furnished him with a pretence to enter earl Raymond's country with a powerful army, where he soon made himself master of Moissac, and several other places. The earl finding himself so unjustly engaged in a war, and not doubting but that Henry of England was privy to the proceedings of his son, he demanded the assistance of France.

Philip had been treating for some time with the barons of Berry, and with those of Auvergne, to debauch them from their allegiance to the king of England; and they, gained by his promises, were ready to join him, and deliver up their castles for his service. This treaty, however, had not been conducted so secretly but that it came to the ears of Henry, who sent to upbraid Philip with this breach of faith, and at the same time to clear himself from having the least hand in the invasion of the count of Thoulouse's territories, which he declared to have been undertaken by Richard without his knowledge. Philip finding his clandestine measures discovered, and having more at heart to add one town to the domains of France, than to recover all Palestine out of the hands of the Infidels, thought fit at last to throw off the mask: he had sworn to suspend all differences, and forbear hostilities, until the crusade was over; he had, as a sworn brother in that enterprize, undertaken the protection of Henry foreign dominions; but, forgetting all obligations of honour and conscience, he, under colour of assisting the earl of Thoulouse, his vassal, now fell with an army into Berry, which he over-ran, taking a great many of its principal places, or having them delivered into his hands by those of Henry's French subjects whom he had drawn from their allegiance. He then burnt Mount-Richard, and took several towns in Auvergne.

The beginning of this war furnishing us with no remarkable events, we shall only take notice of its consequences, which proved very fatal to the king of England. Whilst it was vigorously prosecuted on both sides, all on a sudden, when Henry least expected it, his son Richard left him, and went over to the king of France. This probably was owing to the intrigues of Philip, who suffered no opportunity to escape him of encouraging Richard in his rebellious disposition. But historians not having unfolded to us the secret springs of this defection, we shall not amuse nor mislead our readers with empty or ill-founded conjectures. This, however, is certain, Richard pretended to have two causes of complaint against the king his father: the first was, that he detained from him the princess Alice, and had even offered Philip, who pressed to have the nuptials solemnized, to marry her to prince John, upon more advantageous terms: whether this was fact, or Philip had imposed upon him by a falsity, he pretended to believe that a project had been formed to deprive him of his birth-right, and place his younger brother on the throne. The other occasion of complaint was, that Philip having offered to consent to a truce, Henry had refused it, affirming that it was better to conclude a peace and adjust their respective pretensions before they went on their expedition into the Holy Land: this displeased Richard, as he would thereby have been obliged to restore his conquests in Thoulouse, of which, by a truce, he might still have kept possession. To crown his unnatural treachery and rebellion, Richard now, without the knowledge or consent of his father, swore fealty and homage to the king of France.

Notwithstanding this provocation, Henry, who now saw plainly the engagements into which Richard was entered with Philip, was yet obliged to agree to a truce until the middle of January following. To this he was particularly induced by finding that Richard had gained over most of his provinces in France to side with him, by which Henry was almost disabled to maintain the war: nay, the revolt was so general, that, keeping his Christmas at Saumur, he had the mortification to see himself attended only by three or four nobles.

But Henry's vexation was farther increased by the ill success of the following campaign; for in the spring of 1189, Philip, taking the field, reduced la Ferté, Bernard, Montfort, Malestable, Beaumont, and Balon: then, taking the route to Tours, wheeled about unexpectedly, and marched directly to Mans, where Henry was quartered with seven hundred knights, and a small body of forces.

The sudden appearance of the enemy threw Henry's followers into such confusion, that Stephen de Tours, seneschal of Anjou, setting the suburbs on fire, the flames were suffered to spread over the walls, and occasioned a conflagration in the city. Geoffrey de Brueillon endeavouring to stop the progress of the enemy, by breaking down a stone bridge built over the Sarthe, was attacked, wounded, and taken prisoner; and his men flying in disorder, were pursued by the French to the city, which they entered along with them in the general confusion. Henry finding it impracticable to rectify the disorder occasioned by the fire and the enemy, retired with his troops towards Fruelles, leaving thirty knights, and twice that number of soldiers, in the tower of le Mans, which, having been furiously battered three days was obliged to surrender.

Henry, whose presence of mind never abandoned him amidst the greatest dangers, immediately resolved to take such measures as might prevent the farther progress of the enemy: accordingly, next day, he dispatched William Fitz Ralph, seneschal of Normandy, with William Mandeville, earl of Essex and Aumale, to defend that province; and ordered his chancellor, Geoffrey, to proceed with the main body of his army to Alençon: he himself repaired with a small train to Angers, and was soon after joined by Geoffrey, with a party of knights, at Savigny.

In this wretched condition of his affairs Henry had recourse to the pope (Clement III.) desiring him to interpose his authority, and procure a peace. But this method proved ineffectual: indeed the pope sent legates into France, who threatened Philip and Richard with excommunication, as being the causes of preventing the carrying on the expedition to the Holy Land; but these menaces fell far short of the imagined effect. The French monarch, with great spirit, replied, "that the pope had no right to intermeddle in the affairs of his kingdom, especially when the business in hand was the chastising a vassal who had taken up arms against his lord:" adding, with an insulting air, "that he supposed the smell of Henry's sterlings had made the legates so warm in his cause." Richard is said to have been so much incensed at the interposition and threats of these churchmen, that he drew his sword and would have run Agnani, one of the legates, through, had he not been prevented by those present.

In the mean time, Philip and Richard proceeded in their conquests with little or no opposition. Several great Norman barons delivered up their fortresses and joined the confederates; the castles of Tours, Roche l'Eveque, Montoire, Chateau du Loir, Chaumont, Amboise, and Roche Corbeau, surrendered without resistance: in a word, Henry found himself, in his old age, abandoned by his friends and subjects, and on the point of being stripped of his dominions, his crown, and perhaps his life, by an unnatural son; for it is more than probable that his person might have fallen into the hands of his enemies, had not the neutral princes, who were feudatories to the crown of France, thought it high time to interpose. The earl of Flanders, the duke of Burgundy, and the archbishop of Rheims now applied to Henry to accept an accommodation upon the best terms he could get. The distressed monarch, dreading the consequences of so unfortunate a war, and finding the the pope could do him no service, was forced at length to comply. The place appointed for the treaty was Azay, near Tours. Most of the articles of the treaty were left to the arbitration of the king of France, who transmitted them, by the hands of the count of Flanders, attended by the duke of Burgundy and the archbishop of Rheims, to Saumur, where Henry then resided, in order to receive his approbation. Henry, who was in no condition to refuse any terms which his enemies might think proper to impose, acquiesced in the articles, such as they had been agreed upon by the legates, the nobility, and prelates of both kingdoms, at the place of conference. This treaty has been very erroneously given by many of our modern historians, we shall therefore insert it as it stands in Hoveden, who set down the articles from the minutes which were drawn up at the meeting.

Conditions of Peace between HENRY, king of England, and PHILIP, king of France.

"This convention is between the aforesaid king of France, and king of England, and Richard, earl of Poictou, with their archbishops, bishops, earls, and barons, at the feast of the apostles Peter and Paul, at a congress between Tours and Arasie, where the king of England entirely puts himself under the conduct and upon the will of the said king of France; that is to say, the king of England did then repeat his homage to the king of France, because, in the beginning of the late war, the king of England had defied the king of France, and the king of France had refused the king of England's homage. It was then likewise stipulated by the king of France, that his sister Alice, whom the king of England had in custody, should be delivered to the keeping of one of five persons whom earl Richard should chuse. The king of France next stipulates, that he shall have an oath of performance on the part of the king of England's subjects, for the delivery of his said sister to earl Richard, upon his return from the Holy Land: and farther, that earl Richard shall receive the homages of his father's subjects, both in England and upon the continent; and that no baron, or knight, who in this war had left the king of England and come over to earl Richard, shall return to the king of England before he is within a month of his departure for Jerusalem, which will be about the middle of Lent. At which time the aforesaid kings, and Richard, earl of Poictou, shall be at Vezelay; and all the burghers of the king of England's own towns shall be free throughout all the kingdom of France, according to former customs, nor be impleaded in any matter but in felony. The king of England is to pay to the king of France twenty thousand marks of silver; and all the barons of England are to swear, that if their king should refuse to observe those terms, that they will observe them with the king of France and earl Richard, and to the utmost of their power assist them against the king of England. And the king of France and earl Richard shall keep in their hands the cities of Maine and Tours, with the castles of Ligdi and Trou; or, according to the king of England's option, the king of France and earl Richard shall hold the castle of Gisors and the castle of Pacey, until the performance of the above articles, according to the disposition of the king of France."

This treaty was first ratified at Azay, on the thirtieth of June, 1189; and on the fourth of the succeeding month was signed by Henry, in another conference held at the same place, and at which he assisted in person. Here he met with a mortification that was more severe to him than all his other misfortunes: he discovered, that, during the late war, his beloved son John held intelligence with Philip, and was concerned in all his brother's plots to dethrone a father, who had ever shewn a tender affection for him. This stroke was too much for human nature, already bowed down with old age, infirmities, and a series of ill success, to support. His grief threw him into so violent a rage, that he cursed the day of his birth, and laid his own irrevocable malediction, and prayed for that of God, upon his sons. He then departed, in all the anguish of a fallen king and a forsaken father, to Chinon; where, shortly after, perceiving his end to approach, he caused himself to be carried into the church, before the altar, where, after confessing himself, he expired of a broken heart, on the sixth of July, 1189 (being two days after he had signed the articles of Azay, and) after reigning thirty-four years, seven months, and four days, and in the fifty-seventh year of his age. No sooner was the breath departed from the royal corpse than, like that of his great-grand-father the Conqueror, it was deserted by all the late attendants, but not till some of them had, with the most shocking and indecent insolence, stripped it of all its coverings, leaving it exposed naked in the church; at length, one of the pages, less brutal than the rest, returned and threw over it a short mantle. It was afterwards conveyed, by the care of his natural son Geoffrey, to the abbey of Fontevraud, in a magnificent manner, and there interred*.

Such was the end of Henry II., one of the most illustrious princes of his time, both for greatness of genius and extent of dominions. He was temperate to a degree of abstinence in his living; robust and vigorous in his constitution; eloquent and persuasive in his discourse; infinitely good-natured, and the politest prince of his age; very compassionate to all in distress, and ready at all times to give them relief. He had great natural parts, with a solid judgment; and these improved by an uncommon share of learning for the times he had lived in. He was endowed with an extraordinary memory, insomuch that he never forgot any person he had ever seen, or any thing he had either read or heard, worthy notice: by this means he was perfectly well versed in history, and had to assist him the experience of all ages. In the field, his courage, which yielded to none, was tempered with that prudent caution which constitutes the good general: he excelled in military skill, and was ever collected amidst the greatest dangers of the field. He never engaged in a war without an absolute necessity; nor ever terminated one without giving signal proofs of his lenity to a vanquished enemy. He was wise in council, moderate in prosperity, firm in adversity. Not satisfied with enacting good and wholesome laws, he took care to see them executed with the greatest punctuality: for this purpose he made frequent progresses through all the different parts of his dominions, inspecting the behaviour of his officers and magistrates, and severely punishing those who were either negligent or unjust in the performance of their duty. His religion was that of the pious and sensible Christian; as such he despised all ostentatious shew of devotion, and the modish custom of founding monasteries and endowing them with privileges destructive of order and discipline. Fitz Stephens, one of the most zealous partizans of Becket, in the height of that quarrel and of his own sufferings, being banished on that account, gives this character of him: "He was (says he*) endowed with so many and such excellent gifts, both of nature and grace, that there was not a prince in the world comparable to him: and if he had but shewn a little more deference to the church, no encomium could come up to his merit." And here it must be confessed that affair was of a very delicate nature; and, considering the notions and circumstances of the times, any other king must have sunk under it. His sole view in opposing the insolent demands of Becket, and his colleague pope Alexander, was to serve the church of England, to assert her independency, and to make the metropolitical church of Canterbury the dernier ressort in all ecclesiastical matters, without any appeal to Rome: so that Henry was really the champion for those rights and liberties of the church of England and of the see of Canterbury, which Becket laboured with all his might to subvert, and subject to the court of Rome†.

But as no human character can attain to perfection, we find this great monarch's virtues alloyed by many frailties and infirmities. His fondness for power and his passion for women, proved the sources of those numerous calamities which disturbed his reign, and embittered his private life. But as the monks thought themselves slighted by him, and hard treated in the person of their champion, Becket, they have been very industrious in propagating many idle stories to the prejudice of this excellent prince's character, which seem to have been too readily credited by our historians. The accusation upon which his enemies seem to lay the greatest stress, is his unnatural and unlawful commerce with the French-princess Adelais, or Alice, his son Richard's betrothed wife: but most of their endeavours, instead of proving his guilt, have only demonstrated their own malevolence and rancour; for, in the first place, it should be considered that Henry was so continually taken up with business, that he had scarce a moment unemployed, much less was he master of sufficient leisure to pass in amorous dalliance; in the next place, Henry had the greatest reason to be apprehensive of another alliance with France, and therefore was actuated by the dictates of the soundest policy in preventing, if possible, this match. As to Richard's repeated demand of her, it appears to be little more than grimace; accordingly, as soon as his father Henry was laid in his grave, his behaviour shewed his complaints in general to be only pretences to colour his rebellion: he had earnestly desired leave to consummate his marriage with Alice, and accused his father of injustice in obstructing his happiness; yet when, on his accession to the crown, the pretended happiness was in his power, he thought no more of it; on the other hand, his jealousies and fears of his brother John's supplanting him in the succession vanished as suddenly; for, instead of returning to England immediately, as he would certainly have done had he been apprehensive of that prince forming any cabals, he staid above a month in France after Henry's death, without shewing the least uneasiness on that account. Upon the whole, I think we may candidly infer, that the story of Alice being debauched by Henry, or any other person, to be mere surmise, and an effect of the impertinent guesses of people, in order to account for an event, the reasons whereof they did not understand. Lastly, as the frailties of kings are ever more conspicuous than those of private persons, and excite the curiosity of the world in a much higher degree, it is very strange if Henry (as some pretend) had a son by this princess, no memorial of him, not so much as his name, should be ever preserved by any writer, nor any notice taken of him by his father, or the sons or successors of that father, who, in the language and according to the practice of that age, would have called him their brother, and treated him as such in many respects.

However this matter was, or whatever other failings Henry might have had in common with the rest of mankind, thus much may be asserted with truth, that his virtues were beneficial to his subjects, and his vices pernicious only to himself: in a word, he was the king, the priest, and the father of his people.

As to his political character, that will more clearly appear, when we come to give an account of the many excellent laws and regulations he made during the course of his reign.

It now remains that I should speak of Henry's family and issue.

By his queen Eleanor, the sole heiress of William, duke of Aquitaine, and the repudiated wife of Lewis VII. (or the Young) king of France, he had,

1. William, his eldest son, who died an infant, in the second year of his father's reign.

2. Henry, his second son, who was born the twenty-eighth of February, 1154, at London; and was, when but a child, married to Margaret, daughter to the king of France, by Constance, his second wife.

3. Richard, born at Oxford, in the palace called Beaumont, A. D. 1157, and succeeded his father on the throne.

4. Geoffrey, who was born the year following; and was, in right of Constance, his wife, earl of Brittany and Richmond, by whom he had a daughter named Eleanor, and a posthumous son called Arthur; of both whom more will be said in the following sheets.

5. John (surnamed Sans Terre, or Lackland, on account of the little provision made for him during his father's life), who mounted the throne upon the death of his brother Richard.

King Henry had likewise three daughters:

1. Maud, or Matilda, the eldest, born A. D. 1156, who was married to Henry, duke of Saxony, in 1167; but she died immediately after her father.

2. Eleanor, born A. D. 1162, and married to Alphonso, king of Castile, A. D. 1176.

3. Joan, or Joanna, born A. D. 1165, and married to William, surnamed the Good, king of Sicily, A. D. 1177.

* Epist. St. Th. lib. i. epist. 103.

† See Anglia Sacra, vol. ii. p. 523, 524.

Besides his lawful issue, Henry had two natural sons by Rosamond above-mentioned.

1. William Longue Espée, to whom Richard I. gave the earldom of Salisbury, with Ela, daughter and heiress of William d'Evreux.

2. Geoffrey, who was first bishop-elect of Lincoln, in 1174, and continued so till 1181; and in the reign of his brother, king Richard, he was elected archbishop of York, against a powerful opposition.

There was also one Morgan, a Welshman, provost of Beverley, who pretended to be a natural son of king Henry, by the lady of sir Ralph Blewet, knight. In 1213 he was elected bishop of Durham, by the unanimous consent of the monks of the chapter; and going to Rome for consecration, the pope offered to confirm his election if he would disclaim his pretended birth, and acknowledge himself to be the son of Ralph Blewet: but Morgan refused the proposal, declaring that he would not renounce the honour of being sprung from the blood-royal to obtain any dignity whatever. The pope's offer seems to imply, that there was no other proof of Morgan's being a son of Henry, than his own assertion, otherwise he could not regularly have given him such an alternative: but all ages have produced some wrong-headed mortals, who, without any foundation but their own vanity, have either believed themselves, or endeavoured to make others believe, that they were sprung from royal origin.

Some historians relate, that in the reign of Henry II. there was found in the abbey-churchyard of Glastonbury a grave containing three bodies, laid one upon another, each in a separate coffin. It was pretended the first contained the remains of Guinever, second wife of the great Arthur; the second those of Modred, his nephew; and the third the body of Arthur himself; this latter being distinguished by a leaden cross, with this inscription, "Here lies the illustrious king Arthur, in the isle of Avelon." As to the account of the supernatural size of his bones, it is justly deemed fabulous.

About 1176, being the twenty-second of Henry's reign, London bridge was began to be built with stone, by Peter Coleman, a priest: the king contributed to the advancement of so good a work; a cardinal, who was then legate here, and the archbishop of Canterbury, gave a thousand marks towards it. The course of the river Thames was, for the time, turned another way by a trench dug for that purpose, beginning at Battersea and ending about Rotherhithe. The bridge was thirty-three years in building. Stowe's Survey.

In 1177, king Henry laid the foundations of Warwick castle. Idem.

In 1178, the Jews obtained permission to have a burial-ground near every town where they dwelt. Before, they had but one in England, which was at London. Brompt. & Hoved.

About Christmas, A. D. 1179, being the twenty-sixth of Henry II. faith Roger Hoveden, at a place called Oxenhall, near Darlington, in the bishopric of Durham, the earth was on a sudden raised to a prodigious height, and remained several hours in that position; when it as suddenly sunk down again with an horrible noise, leaving a deep chasm or pit, which continues to this day; and Mr. Camden, in his Britannia (new edit. p. 774.) supposes it to be the wells that are now called Hell Kettles.

In 1185, there was a violent earthquake, which overthrew the church of Lincoln, and other churches: at the same time there was an almost total eclipse of the sun.

RICHARD I. surnamed COEUR DE LION. A.D. 1189.

RICHARD, who was on the continent at the time of his father's decease, no sooner received the news of that interesting event, than he hastened to have an interview with king Philip of France, in order to do him homage for his Norman dominions, as also to return him thanks for the protection himself and his brothers had, from time to time, received at his hands. A conference was accordingly held between the two kings at a place between Chaumont and Trie, on the twenty-second of July. Here Philip insisted upon the restitution of Gisors and other places; but, instead of them, the king of England agreed to pay him four thousand marks of silver, over and above the twenty thousand his father Henry had engaged to pay by the late treaty*.

This matter settled, Richard next repaired to Rouen, to receive in that city the ducal crown of Normandy, and to be girt with the sword of that duchy, agreeable to the forms of investiture at those times. This twofold ceremony was performed by the archbishop of Rouen, in the presence of the bishops, earls, and barons of Normandy. Here he made a stay of near six weeks, by which he plainly shewed that he was under none of those apprehensions about the succession in England, which he had, during his father's life-time, so often used as a pretext for his refractoriness and rebellion. The behaviour of the English, indeed, upon his accession was such as left him no room for such apprehensions, for, as soon as Henry II. was dead, they executed the orders sent by Richard from Normandy, with as much readiness and punctuality as if he had been long in possession of the throne.

His first care, upon finding himself invested with regal power, was the releasement of his mother Eleanor, who had now been a prisoner (of state, indeed, and so more at large than others) for upwards of sixteen years. With her liberty he bestowed on her the administration of the government here, during his absence; and, moreover, he gave her authority to pass a general act of amnesty; and settled on her, for the maintenance of her person and dignity, the sums which Henry I. and king Stephen had granted to their queens for a dower, besides what Henry II. her husband had allowed her.

RICHARD I.

Eleanor, who herself had experienced the deprivation of that most inestimable of all blessings, liberty, no sooner was invested with these powers, than she hastened to throw open all the prison-gates throughout the kingdom, and to remit all forfeitures claimed by the law. This endearing and popular act was a very proper prelude to the oath of allegiance which she soon exacted from all degrees in the nation to Richard, as king of England. At the same time the earl of Leicester and others were restored to their estates, of which they had been deprived by the late king.

And now Richard, having settled all his affairs in Normandy, embarked at Barfleur, on the eleventh of August, and on the thirteenth landed at Portsmouth, where he was met and attended by the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishops of Rochester, Lincoln, and Chichester. From thence he went to Winchester the next day, where he took an account of his father's treasures: and on this occasion he gave such an instance of a tyrannical and arbitrary exertion of power as afforded his subjects but a melancholy presage of his future reign.

Stephen de Tours was a man of low birth, but great talents, and had, by his capacity, diligence, and fidelity, recommended himself so much to Henry that he had made him seneschal of Anjou, and entrusted him, not only with the government of several important fortresses in that province, but also with the keeping of his treasures; and, as a farther mark of his regard and esteem, had given him a lady of noble birth and great fortune (who was a king's ward) in marriage. This man Richard seized upon, loaded with irons, and confined him in the castle of Winchester till he had delivered up not only all the forts and castles in his custody, but also all his own fortune, amounting to forty-five thousand pounds, Anjouin money: then he caused him to be divorced from his wife, because she was of noble descent, and he of inferior and ignoble birth; and declared he would, by his own authority, annul all such unequal marriages. It may, perhaps, after this treatment, appear strange that Richard should continue this person in his post as governor, and afterwards employ him in the management of the revenues of Anjou; but it is not the only instance of the inequality of this prince's behaviour.

His good-sense and judgment, however, appeared more conspicuous in his very next act, which was that of degrading and banishing from his court all those who had rebelled against the king his father. This has, by many writers, been brought against him as a charge of ingratitude; but his own words, on this occasion, will be the best excuse for, or rather panegyric on, his conduct: Guy le Val the younger, Ralph de Fougeres, and Judael de Mayenne demanded to be restored to their lands and castles (which being forfeited by former rebellions, had been seized by Henry), in recompence of their services to Richard in his last revolt; Richard accordingly put them in possession thereof, agreeable to his convention with them at the time they abandoned the late king to side with him; but he turned them out again the very next day, saying, "That such who had deserted their liege-lord and assisted others against him, deserved only to be rewarded in that manner."

The jealousy which he had expressed of his brother John, seemed now to be totally annihilated, or to have given way to the more politic consideration of making a friend of the only adult heir apparent to the crown; for, soon after his return to England, Richard increased (or rather formed) his appenage by grants of the estate of William Pepperel, and the castles of Marlborough, Luggershall, le Pec, Bolsover, Lancaster, Nottingham, Tuxhill, and Wallingford, with all the honours and forests annexed to those castles; to which, in the overflowings of his new-conceived kindness and affection, he added the earldoms of Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Derby, and Lancashire, with the still greater earldom of Gloucester, and the heiress of that family in marriage; by all which honours John was made master of considerable parts of the realm, at the very time when the king, as we shall hereafter see, had in view to leave the kingdom to embark on a long, remote, and hazardous expedition.

It has been already observed, that the queen-mother had, previous to the arrival of Richard in England, secured the oaths of allegiance from the several orders of the state in his behalf; nothing therefore now remained but to have them renewed and ratified, which was accordingly done on the third of September, when he was solemnly crowned by Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, at Westminster, having removed thither from Winchester. On this occasion his oath was conceived in the following terms: "That he would duly serve almighty God, with the church and her ministers, all his life: that he would exercise right justice and equity to his people: that he would abolish all evil laws and bad usages, if any such had been introduced into the kingdom, and enact good laws, which, without fraud or mental reservation, he would keep." After this the prelates and nobles did him homage, and swore fealty to him as their liege-lord and sovereign. His coronation was performed with great pomp and magnificence; and, as it may be amusing to the curious reader to compare the manner of performing that ceremony in ancient and modern times, we have given a description of it in the notes, not to interrupt the thread of our narration*.

While

* The archbishops of Canterbury, Rouen, Triers, and Dublin, with the other bishops and abbots, having the cross, holy water, and censers carried before them, received the duke at the door of his privy chamber, and conducted him, with a solemn procession, to the abbey-church of Westminster. In the middle of the bishops and abbots went four barons, each carrying a golden candlestick with a taper. After them came Geoffrey de Lucy, bearing the royal cap; and John de Mareschal next, with a massy pair of gold spurs; then William, earl of Pembroke, with the royal sceptre; after him William Fitz Patrick, with a golden rod having a dove on the top: then three other earls, viz. David, brother to the king of Scotland, as earl of Huntingdon; prince John, earl of Lancaster and Derby; with Robert, earl of Leicester; each bearing a sword upright, the scabbard richly adorned with gold: after them came six earls and barons, bearing a chequered table, on which were laid the royal robes and other regalia: then followed William Mandeville, earl of Albemarle and Essex, bearing a large crown of gold set with precious stones: next came duke Richard himself, with the bishop of Durham on his right hand, and the bishop of Bath on his left, and over him a canopy of state was borne by four barons: and last of all followed a great train of earls, barons, knights, &c. In this order he came into the church, where, before the high altar, laying his hands upon the Evangelists and relics of saints, he took the solemn oath above-recited. Then they put off his garments from his middle upwards, except his shirt, which was open on the shoulders, and put on his shoes, which were of gold tissue, and the archbishop of

While the king was at dinner with his nobles in Westminster hall, after his coronation, an accident happened, which proved very fatal to the Jews then residing in London, and also to numbers of their brethren in different parts of the kingdom. Richard, it seems, either from the aversion he had for that people, or (as appears most probable from the other part of his order) to prevent the confusion arising from a crowd, had caused proclamation to be made, that no Jews nor women should be suffered to appear about the abbey-church or hall of Westminster, during the time of celebrating divine service and performing the ceremony of his coronation. Unfortunately it happened that a number of Jews had repaired to London upon the change of government, to consult with their brethren what present it would be necessary to make to the new king, upon his accession, and in the name of their nation, in order to gain his good graces, and obtain his protection for carrying on their business as traders in the kingdom. Notwithstanding the late proclamation, several of the Hebrews, who had been charged with the money their sect were to offer the king on this occasion, thought themselves, on account of the agreeable errand they were come upon, exempted from the general prohibition, and therefore attended, to the number of an hundred, about the gates of the hall, to watch for the king's coming out, to tender him their present and compliments of congratulation; but the richness of their dress, and the disregard they appeared to shew to the royal mandate, added to the hatred of infidelity, at that time the ruling passion of the public, awakened in the English all the fury of resentment against these enemies of Christ, as they were termed, and the populace, rising in a tumultuous manner, fell upon the poor defenceless Hebrews, of whom they killed several. Their fury gaining strength by the easiness with which they indulged it, they proceeded to murder all the Jews they met with, and, after plundering and pillaging their houses, set them on fire. The tumult became now so general, that Ralph de Glanville, the high-justiciary, was obliged to march into the city to appease it; but his presence proved of little effect, the conflagration and carnage continued till the next morning, when the Christian mob thought proper to disperse, but not till they had sacrificed the lives and effects of some thousands of these their poor unhappy fellow-creatures to their blind and enthusiastic fury.

Richard, who had been acquainted with the intention of the Jews to present him with a free-gift, was so incensed against this unseasonable persecution of them, and the insult offered to his authority by raising a commotion the very day of his inauguration, that on the morrow he caused several of the ringleaders of the tumult to be arrested, and hanged up, as a terror to others: at the same time he published an edict, strictly forbidding any insult to be offered to the Jews, whom declared to be under his immediate protection.

The soul of Richard was now wholly engrossed with the purpose of making an expedition to the Holy Land in person, and he therefore began to consider how to make preparations suitable to so great an undertaking. He had already seized upon his father's treasures, in the custody of Stephen de Tours, and had also fleeced that officer of a pretty round sum; and the bishop of Ely happening to die much about the same time, without a will, Richard seized on his estate, which was very considerable. Yet these were very weak aids to what he stood in need of, and therefore he made bargains with some of his richest prelates and nobles, for estates and honours to be granted to them, on their paying him the stipulated sums: nay, to such an height did he carry his mean venality, that the great-seal of England was next put up to auction, and purchased by William Longchamp, the first minister, for three thousand pounds; and when Ralph de Glanville, the honest justiciary, expostulated with him on these proceedings, so derogatory to his own dignity and so oppressive to the subject, Richard told him plainly, "that, could he find a buyer, he would sell the city of London itself." This drew from the upright minister some farther remonstrances, which Richard, less patient of admonition than his father had been, resented highly, and, glad of an opportunity to strip this old servant of his well-earned substance, he took from him his post of high-justiciary, and then threw him into prison, from which he could not procure his release till he had paid into the king's coffers fifteen thousand pounds, an immense sum in those days. He was succeeded in his office by Hugh Pudsey, bishop of Durham (who had purchased the earldom of Northumberland of Richard), and William de Mandeville, earl of Essex and Albemarle, the former of whom gave a thousand marks for that employment, and the latter died soon after in Normandy. By these means the king raised a greater sum of money than any of his predecessors had ever possessed. But he had still another expedient in reserve: he obtained a bull from pope Clement, empowering him to excuse from the crusade such as had taken the cross, and were judged necessary to be left at home for the defence of the kingdom; and many of those whose first transports of zeal were now cooled, were glad to pay a considerable sum of money to be absolved from their hasty vow. While he was thus heaping up money, the clergy were zealously labouring to of Canterbury anointed him in three places, viz. on the head, the arms, and the breast, which unctions signify glory, fortitude, and wisdom: then covering his head with a linen cloth, he set the cap thereon which Geoffrey de Lucy carried; and when he had put on his waistcoat, and on that his dalmatia or upper garment, the archbishop delivered to him the sword of the kingdom, to subdue the enemies of the church: which done, two earls put on his spurs, and he was led, with the royal mantle hung on him, to the altar, where the archbishop charged him, on God's behalf, not to presume to take upon him this dignity, unless he resolved inviolably to keep the vows and oaths he had just then made; to which the king answered, that, by God's grace, he would faithfully perform them all. Then the crown was taken from beside the altar, and given to the archbishop, who set it upon the king's head, delivering the sceptre into his right hand, and the royal rod into his left. Thus crowned, he was brought back to the throne with the same solemnity as before. Then mass began; and when they came to the offertory, the king was led by the bishops of Durham and Bath to the altar, where he offered a mark of pure gold, as his predecessors were wont to do, and afterwards was brought back to his throne by the same bishops. After mass he was attended, thus royally arrayed, to a chamber adjoining, in like procession as before; whence (after a short repose) he, with the same procession, returned into the choir; and having put off his heavy crown and robes, he went to dinner. At the coronation feast, which was kept in Westminster hall, the citizens of London were his butlers, and those of Winchester served up the meat. The archbishops and bishops sat down with the king, whilst the earls and barons served in the king's palaces, as their places and dignities required. Hoved. Tyrrel, &c.

procure him soldiers; the pulpit resounded with the great merit of serving in the holy war; the confessors enjoined no penances but what tended to promote the grand design of recovering the Holy Land out of the power of the Infidels. By these means the army soon became very numerous, and so much better provided with all things, as there was not an officer or common soldier but what furnished himself with common necessaries, either from his own purse or with the assistance of his friends.

While Richard was thus employed in making preparations for his voyage, Philip, distrusting his fickle nature, with which he was well acquainted, sent over Rotrou, count of Perche, to acquaint him that the king of France and his barons had, in a general council held at Paris, sworn to meet at Vezelay, in Burgundy, by the close of the ensuing Easter, at which time and place Richard and his followers were summoned to attend, that the two kings might set out together on the expedition. Upon this, in the month of November, Richard convoked a parliament at London, in which he gave the fullest assurances to the king and people of France, that the court of England was determined to fulfil all its engagements with regard to the crusade.

As Richard appeared so eager in the pursuit of any means that might procure him ready money to defray the expences of his intended voyage, William, king of Scotland, thought it was his interest to improve this opportunity, and accordingly, in a conference which he had with Richard at Canterbury, he offered him ten thousand marks to deliver up Berwick and Roxburgh and desist from his claim to the sovereignty of Scotland. Richard very readily accepted the offer, gave up the two places, and, by an authentic charter, discharged the king of Scotland, and his successors, from the homage which he had sworn to Henry II. "which (to use the words of the charter, given us at large by Hoveden) had been extorted from the king of Scotland by unprecedented writings and dures."

About this time likewise Richard, to swell the hoard which he afterwards so ridiculously dissipated, squeezed three thousand pounds out of his natural brother Geoffrey, whom he had made archbishop of York, for his lay-fees and an exemption from forest-laws. In short, there is hardly any possibility of enumerating the various expedients he set on foot for heaping up money; I shall therefore content myself with observing, that the gross sum computed to be raised by Richard on this occasion did not amount to less than one million one hundred thousand pounds in ready money and plate, which, at a moderate computation, may be estimated at seven millions and an half of our money*.

But the desire of accumulating riches did not so much engross the king's mind as to make him inattentive to the dictates of sound policy, in providing for the security of his dominions during his absence. To that end he sent his brother John, with a strong body of forces, against the Welsh, who, upon the death of the late king, had began to infest the English borders, and had actually taken the castles of Tenby, St. Clair, Abercarran, and Llanstephan, and over-run the counties of Pembroke and Caermarthen. Upon the approach of the English army, the invaders retired into their own country, and soon after made peace, and gave hostages for their due observance of the articles†.

There was yet another quarter from which Richard had reason to expect disturbance; this was the differences among his ambitious churchmen, of which we shall see farther in the ecclesiastical period of this history: these, however, he composed to his satisfaction; and on this occasion he gave a shining instance of that independency he was resolved to maintain against the attempts of the papal see; for the pope having sent over a legate to determine a quarrel between the archbishop of Canterbury and the monks of Christ-church, orders were sent from the English court to him, upon his arrival at Dover, to proceed no farther till the matter was determined in the great council of the nation; and a parliament being accordingly convoked, matters were compromised by their authority, without any intervention of the legate, who had the mortification to see his powers on this occasion despised and set aside.

Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, having entered an interdict against the marriage of prince John, the king's brother, with Avifa, the heiress of Gloucester, on account of their consanguinity‡, Richard was desirous of having that matter finally adjusted before he left England; accordingly, the affair being brought before this parliament, the prelate was obliged to accept of an appeal to the pope, and withdraw his interdict, upon which John solemnized his nuptials.

Richard's last care was to provide for the administration of the realm in his absence; and in this provision he acted from the dictates of his own caprice, against the advice of the nobility and the sense of the whole nation. The guardianship of the kingdom he conferred on William Longchamp, bishop of Ely, a Frenchman of low extraction, without either credit or authority; and with him joined Hugh Pudsey, bishop of Durham, as justiciary in the northern counties; to the former he committed the custody of the tower of London,

* Among other oppressive and scandalous means used to raise these sums, it was pretended that the great-seal of England was lost: another great-seal was therefore made, and orders were issued for all persons to have their charters or grants renewed under that seal, at a certain expence, otherwise they would be invalid. Richard's undertaker for all this, was the chancellor Longchamp, bishop of Ely, who thereby rivetted himself in his master's affections.

† An eminent free-booter, so well known to after-times by the name of Robin Hood, at this time infested the country of England. He had none of the low pilfering qualities of modern thieves, for we are told that he was the most generous and gentle of all robbers, taking only from the rich, sparing always the poor, never shedding blood, and forbearing all acts of violence to females. His retinue was seldom less than two hundred strong and resolute men; his residence was generally in the forest of Sherwood; and his principal associate, or lieutenant, was one John (from the figure of his body probably) surnamed the Little. So dissolute was the government of Richard at this time (all regard of public justice, and all attention to public security, being swallowed up by his blind furious passion), that no steps appear to have been taken to crush this audacious robber, whose rapine was open and avowed, and who is said to have been of noble blood; so that there is great room to conjecture, that he paid contributions to the ministry for toleration in his profession.

‡ She is called by Sandford, Isabella, third and youngest daughter and co-heiress of William, earl of Gloucester, son of Robert Consul, natural son of Henry I. by Nesta, daughter of Rees ap Tudor, prince of South Wales; so that Henry I. was great-grand-father to both the parties.

and to the latter the keeping of the castle and forest of Windsor: and Hugh Bardolph, William Marechal, Geoffrey Fitz Piers, and William Briwere were appointed their assistants and counsellors in the exercise of government.

All these necessary precautions being now taken, there remained nothing to detain Richard in England: he therefore embarked at Dover, attended by David, earl of Huntingdon, brother to the king of Scotland (who had been sent by that prince at the head of five thousand men, to assist Richard in his expedition), on the eleventh of December, and landed at Calais on the same day, where he was received by Philip, earl of Flanders, who attended him into Normandy, where he kept his Christmas.

On the thirteenth of January, 1190, Richard and the king of France had an interview together, at Gué St. Remi, in order to adjust every thing necessary for the expedition, and to prevent any dispute when they met at the rendezvous, which had been fixed for the latter end of March, but was afterwards, on account of the indisposition and death of the queen of France, postponed till Midsummer. Here the two princes swore mutually to maintain peace, and defend each others territories; and, in case either of the two should die, during the voyage, the other was to have his men and treasures to carry on the expedition. Richard soon after, at the instigation of Longchamp, sent for his mother Eleanor, Alice of France (sister to king Philip), his brother John, the two archbishops of Canterbury and York, and other English bishops, to come over to Normandy; and made John and his natural brother Geoffrey (archbishop of York) swear that they would not set foot in England for the space of three years, the term that he expected to be absent on the crusade; but soon after, at the intreaties of his mother, he released the former of his obligation, and gave the latter a licence to return thither.

He had, some time before, sent officers to all the ports in his dominions, to pick out a number of ships of the greatest burden, and had equipped a large fleet, well manned, victualled, and supplied with all necessaries for the intended voyage; and he now gave orders for these ships to sail for Marfeilles, there to wait to take him and his land forces on board. On this occasion he took the advice of his prelates and nobility in making several ordinances for preventing quarrels and bloodshed on board the fleet*, appointing proper persons to see them put into execution.

About this time Richard sent his prime minister and favourite, Longchamp (for whom he had obtained of the pope a legatine power), over to England, to prepare farther aids for his expedition, and to interpose for the protection of the Jews, who were now threatened with a general massacre. This he did not so much out of any regard to the sufferings of these poor wretches, as from the apprehension that their great riches might fall into the hands of their persecutors, and he not have the fingering of any part of them. This sufficiently appeared by the excessive impositions which the government afterwards laid upon the Jews. Longchamp began the first part of his mission by obliging every abbey and manor belonging to the crown, to furnish one palfrey and sumpter-horse, and every city in the kingdom to give double the number, for the use of those engaged in the expedition.

As to what regarded the Jews, the legate found on his arrival that a general thirst after their blood and effects, had seized upon the mad populace of England. At Lynn, their estates and properties had been pillaged, their houses burnt to the ground, and themselves murdered: the like fate these unhappy people had met with at Stamford, Norwich, St. Edmundsbury, and Lincoln; but the greatest persecution exercised against them was at York, on the sixteenth of March of this year, where the rabble had wreaked their more than barbarous fury upon five hundred men besides women and children. These poor wretches, finding themselves in danger from the rising storm, part of which had already fallen upon their brethren in other counties, had prevailed with the governor of the castle to give them refuge against the rage of the mob: hardly were they got within the gates when the high-sheriff came and required them to be delivered up, which the governor refusing to do, the people drew up in a body, and attacked the castle: at length the Jews offered a great sum of money to be permitted to retire with their lives; but enthusiasm, which absorbs every other passion, had taken such possession of the bigotted rabble, that they absolutely refused to give them quarter. Upon this an ancient rabbin proposed the killing themselves rather than to fall into the hands of uncircumcised enemies: this motion was unanimously agreed to, and they put their tragical and desperate resolve in execution in the following manner: every master of a family cut the throats of his wife and children first, then dispatched his servants, and concluded with the slaughter of himself. Is it not strange, that some of our monkish writers should have suffered their preposterous zeal to get so far the better of their understandings, and the common dictates of humanity, as not only to excuse, but even applaud this barbarity, because, say they, it tended to extirpate the enemies of our holy religion? But such are the effects of misguided zeal, that sanctifies inhumanity itself, and dares to suppose that bloodshed and cruelty can be acceptable to a God of mercy and love!

Longchamp made a strict but fruitless enquiry into the authors of the tumult; some few, indeed, were put under arrest, and fined, as having been abettors of this act: a poor satisfaction for the death of so many of their fellow creatures. Let us now turn our eyes from this scene, so shocking to every tender breast, and so disgraceful to humanity, and attend to Richard in his expedition.

The time of rendezvous now drawing near, Richard received the scrip and staff, the usual badges of pilgrims, from the hands of the archbishop of Tours, and advanced to Vezelay, where he was joined by the king of France. Their forces, when

* These regulations were: that if any one killed a man on board, he was to be tied to the corpse and flung into the sea: if any one was convicted to have drawn his dagger or knife to wound another, he was to lose his hand: if any one struck another with his hand, without effusion of blood, he was to be ducked thrice over head and ears in the sea: if any one gave his companion opprobrious language, he was for every offence to pay him so many ounces of silver: and if a man stole any thing, his head was to be shaved, boiling pitch was to be poured upon it, and feathers stuck into the pitch, that so he might be known; and the first land the ship made, he was to be set on shore. These are the first body of marine laws which we find in the English records; they seem to be a compound of the civil and Saxon institutions.

united, formed an army of no less than one hundred thousand men, at the head of which the two kings set out for Lyons; but finding it impossible to keep such a number together, each took a separate route; Richard marching to Marseilles, and Philip to Genoa.

Richard waited eight days at the first of these places for his fleet, which had been dispersed by a storm, and obliged to put into different ports in Portugal. During his stay here he received advices from England, by which he learned that Hugh de Pudsey, bishop of Durham, whom he had joined in commission with his favourite, Longchamp, had, by that insolent upstart, been arrested, and obliged to purchase his liberty by delivering up the castles of Windsor, Newcastle upon Tyne, the manor of Sadberg, with the county of Northumberland, and to give his own sons, Henry de Pudsey, and Gilbert de la Ley, as hostages for his quiet submission. Hereupon Richard, without expressing any farther resentment against his minion, contented himself with sending orders to him to restore to Pudsey the earldom of Northumberland and the manor of Sadberg, which that prelate continued to enjoy till the king's return from the Holy Land.

Richard, as I have before observed, continued for eight days impatiently expecting the arrival of his fleet; at length, conjecturing in part the cause of its delay, which might be protracted to a greater length of time than he could wait, hired twenty galleys and ten stout vessels, in which he embarked with his retinue, and, after touching at Naples, he continued his course to Messina, where he arrived on the twentieth of September. Here he found the king of France waiting with his fleet, and in a little time he was joined by his own, having left orders behind him for that purpose when he sailed for Marseilles. The Sicilians were struck with admiration at the sight of so great an armament, and Philip could not restrain an emotion of jealousy at seeing the forces of his vassal so much superior to his own; and an opportunity soon offered to mortify the king of England, which Philip took care not to let escape him.

As Richard proposed to pass the winter at Messina, and his sister Joanna, relict of the late king of Sicily, William II. came thither to stay with him, he thought it necessary for his own security to take possession of two strong castles lying on the Faro, or streight's mouth of Messina, one of which he put into the hands of his sister, for the accommodation of herself and retinue, and erected magazines in the other for the keeping of provisions for his army. This step, which, it must be confessed, had something arbitrary in it, gave the Messinese a jealousy that he wanted to make himself master of the island, and therefore they took every opportunity to quarrel with the English; especially on the third of October, when the inhabitants drove these latter out of their town, shut their gates, and lined their walls with soldiers to prevent their re-entry. The English, enraged at this treatment, flew to arms, and would have begun an assault upon the town, had they not, with great difficulty, been restrained by Richard. On the morrow the king of France, with several of his prelates and nobles, went to the place where Richard had his headquarters, there to hold a conference on the present state of affairs, and, if possible, prevent matters from coming to extremities; but whilst they were busy in consultation, a strong body of the citizens sallied out, in hopes of surprising Richard's person, and in the attempt killed several of his men and horses; and actually fell upon the quarters of Hugh le Brun, one of his commanders. The noise of the tumult reaching the king's ears, he immediately broke off the conference, sprung to his arms, ordered his guards to turn out, and, putting himself at their head, repulsed the citizens, and following them to the gates, attacked the city (into which Philip, who sided with the Messinese, had been admitted) with such resolution, that he entered it in despite of all the opposition made by the inhabitants assisted by the French, and planted the English colours on the bulwarks, not excepting even that part allotted for the French king's quarters. This Philip resented as an high affront and indignity, though he himself was certainly the most culpable, he having assisted in the defence of the place, and slain with his own hand three of the assailants.

Some very warm words passed between the two kings on this occasion; but Richard behaved with great modesty in this affair: he could not but be sensible that his setting up the English ensigns in the French division was a gross insult upon Philip; he therefore immediately gave orders for taking them down, protesting at the same time he had never intended the least affront to the king of France, but had acted in that manner purely to compel Tancred (the king of Sicily) to give him satisfaction for the injury done. To shew his sincerity, he delivered the custody of Messina to the Templars, till the difference between him and Tancred should be decided. This agreement being made, Tancred, who till then remained in Palermo, came to Richard at Messina, and consented to give him all that he demanded. He made a treaty with him, obliging himself to pay the queen-dowager of Sicily, sister of Richard, twenty thousand ounces of gold for her dowry; and as many to Richard, in lieu of certain legacies left by William the Good to Henry II. his father-in-law, and claimed by Richard as his heir*. At the same time, to cement their friendship, a marriage was agreed upon between Richard's nephew, Arthur, duke of Brittany (son of the deceased prince Geoffrey, Henry II's son), and Tancred's daughter: moreover, the king of Sicily promised to fit out ten galleys and six large ships for the service of the crusade. Upon these terms Richard solemnly swore to observe a strict peace and amity with Tancred, and subjected his dominions to the pope's censure in case he violated the treaty in any part. These two princes being thus, in appearance, reconciled, Richard made a present to Tancred of king Arthur's famous sword, to which the Britons had given the name of Caliburn.

Tancred, however satisfied he might outwardly appear with this reconciliation, could not brook a treaty which force alone had compelled him to sign. He would fain have engaged the French king in his quarrel, and made a league with him against
